STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The main question presented by this appeal is one of fact, and that is whether or not the deed made by George Swegle and wife to Charles Swegle on the 3d day of September, 1887, was intended as a mortgage or an absolute conveyance of the real property therein described. All other questions are subordinate to this. Since the decision of this court in Stephens v. Allen, 11 Or. 188, 3 Pac. Rep. 168, the law must be regarded as settled in this state that a deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol to have been designed and intended by the parties as a mortgage for the security of money, or to secure the performance of some act; and as was said in that case, "as such transaction receives its character from what the parties intended to make it at its inception, the ascertainment of that intention always becomes the important inquiry. This necessarily requires evidence of the situation of the parties, of the price fixed, in connection with the value of the property, the conduct of the parties before and after, and all the surrounding facts and circumstances, so far as they are adapted to explain the real character of the transaction." A brief reference to the facts disclosed by the record therefore becomes necessary. At the time of the execution of the deed in question, George Swegle was the owner in fee of the land in controversy, which was then of about the value of from $7,000 to $8,000. About the month of April, 1887, George Swegle borrowed $4,000 of Breyman Bros., for which he executed his promissory note, and a mortgage on said real property, to secure the same. In the month of August thereafter, Charles Swegle purchased said note and mortgage of Breyman Bros., paying the full face value therefor, and the same were regularly assigned to him without recourse. In the month of September, 1887, the deed in question was executed. A somewhat critical examination of the testimony of all of the witnesses shows that it was not intended as an absolute deed. The value of the property conveyed was nearly double the amount of the mortgage. Though careful and prudent in his financial matters, there is nothing in the evidence tending to show that Charles Swegle would strip one of his children of his property by only paying one-half of its value. On the contrary, before this deed was executed, he offered to carry the debt at 7 per cent., which was a lower rate than the note to Breyman Bros. bore. In addition to this, he told the plaintiff that he would sell the land, and that he should have all it would bring over and above the amount of the debt. The plaintiff testifies to this, and the tendency of the testimony of Mrs. Swegle, the widow of the deceased, J. G. Evans, W. F. Herran, and Robert Ford, and Leander Bender was to establish that fact. So entirely satisfied were several of the children of Charles Swegle, as well as the widow, of the justice of the plaintiff's claim, that they executed deeds of release to him of all interest in said real property. Being satisfied that the deed in question was executed as a security for money, it must be adjudged to be a mortgage to which will attach the right of redemption, and every other incident of a mortgage. Something was said upon the argument as to the insufficiency of the plaintiff's tender in writing made before the suit was commenced; but we do not think it necessary to pass upon that question at this term. The plaintiff could not make a tender in writing or otherwise of the amount actually due, for the reason that Charles Swegle had the possession of said land two or three years, and the rents and profits, to which the plaintiff was entitled, remained unaccounted for. He had the right to know the amount of these, and to have the same deducted from the amount due Charles Swegle. The balance remaining due is what he must pay, and that could not be known till an account was taken. Finding no error in the decree appealed from, the same must be affirmed.

RIGHT TO SET-OFF—ASSIGNMENT OF CHOSE IN ACTION.

1. Where an account for goods sold and delivered is definite and exists in the form of a debt, which was then due and payable at the time of the transfer, it is a proper matter of set-off.

2. The principle is well established that the purchaser of any thing in action, not negotiable, takes it subject to all the defenses which the debtor or promisor had at the time of the assignment.

3. An assignee of a chose in action, not negotiable, takes the thing assigned subject to all the rights which the debtor had acquired in respect thereto prior to the assignment, or the time notice was given of it.

4. The court may, in its discretion, relieve a party from default in failing to furnish a bill of items when it is made to satisfactorily appear that a good and sufficient reason existed for such failure, and one is furnished, etc.

Appeal from circuit court, Benton county; R. S. BEAN, Judge.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover the sum of $350, with interest, on a non-negotiable promissory note, made by the defendants to J. C. Young on the 28th day of August, 1888, and sold and assigned by him to the plaintiff, etc. The defendants admit the making of said note, but deny the assignment, and then allege affirmatively by way of set-off that the said Young on the 28th day of August, 1888, was indebted to James C. Taylor in the sum of $299.29 for balance due on account for goods and wares sold and delivered to the said Young by the said Taylor at his special instance and request, at the various dates and times therein specified, and that the said sum of $299.29 has not been paid, nor any part thereof; that on the 28th day of August, 1888, the said James C. Taylor sold and assigned the said account to the defendant L. L. Hurd; and that on the same day, for value received, he sold and assigned the undivided three-fourths of said account to the other defendants, and that the defendants in said action were the bona fide owners of said account since the 28th day of August, 1888. It is enough to say that an account for $63 in favor George Taylor was similarly assigned, and is set out as a defense, in substance, to the same effect. The reply denied all the material allegations of the complaint. Upon a trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $381, offset by accounts for $360.94, leaving a balance due the plaintiff for the sum of $20.06, for which judgment was rendered by the court, and from which the plaintiff appeals to this court.

L. Flinn, for plaintiff. W. S. McFadden and J. R. Bryson, for defendants.

LORD, J. (after stating the facts as above.) The principal question presented by this record relates to the defense of set-off. The objection is that the accounts for goods sold and delivered are not liquidated, and that the defendant ought not to be permitted to plead them as a set-off, because the defendants owned the accounts at the time of the execution of the non-negotiable note by them. The accounts are for goods sold and delivered, and the amount is ascertained and definitely fixed by arithmetical computation; and they exist in the form of a debt which the defendants claim were then due and payable at the time of the transfer. An itemized account of them was furnished the plaintiff, and there is no pretense of mistake, or that they were not just and valid; nor that the assignor of the plaintiff did not owe them, and defendants own them, and upon which they could have maintained action before the transfer. It is an old rule that, wherever the demand is so certain that an indebitatus assumpsit would lie, it is the proper subject of the set-off. Burgess v. Tucker, 5 Johns. 104. The defendants' demand was for money on an account for goods sold and delivered, and for its recovery an indebitatus assumpsit would lie; and this, as the authorities show, furnishes the test for its allowance as a set-off. In Smith v. Hule, 14 Ala. 202, it was held that a demand for the value of the corn delivered may be pleaded as an offset, though the price of the corn had not been agreed on, the court saying: "It has been held that a demand for which an indebitatus assumpsit would lie may be pleaded as a set-off to a debt due on a note, and that it is not necessary, to constitute a money demand, that the price should have been agreed for articles sold which compose it." The cases cited have no relevancy to the point involved, as note Boyer v. Clark, 3 Neb. 161, or Pierce v. Hoffman, 4 Wis. 291. As an indebitatus assumpsit will lie for goods sold and delivered, being a money demand in the form of a debt, necessarily goods sold and delivered is good matter of set-off, because the demand is liquidated, and the amount definitely ascertained and alleged, and a debt then due and payable at the time of the transfer. This result is fatal to the objection raised.

As to the next, the instrument upon which the action is brought is a non-negotiable note, and, before reaching the real objection urged, it is necessary to consider its assignment, and the subjects to which it is liable as set-off in the hands of the assignee. Our statute provides that, "in case of an assignment of a thing in action, the action of the assignee shall be without prejudice to any set-off or other defense existing at the time of or before notice of the assignment; but this section shall not apply to a negotiable promissory note or bill of exchange transferred in good faith and upon good consideration before due." Hill, Code, § 28. This section, and section 27, preceding it, requiring in most cases that the real party in interest be plaintiff, has enabled the assignee of a thing in action to sue in his own name; but in all other respects the rights of the parties remain unchanged. The principle is well settled that a purchaser of a thing in action, not negotiable, takes it subject to all the defenses which the debtor or promisor had at the time of the assignment, and which he could have made available as a defense. When the maker of a non-negotiable instrument is sued by the assignee, he may set up as a defense against him any such matter by way of set-off or other defense as he could have set up against his assignor. The complaint shows that the instrument upon which the action is brought is a non-negotiable note, and that the day after its execution it was assigned to the plaintiff. This entitled the defendant to set up any defense which he could have interposed against the assignor, and which existed at the time and before notice of the assignment. "An assignee," said Wright, J., "of a chose in action, not negotiable, takes the thing assigned, subject to all the rights which the debtor had acquired in respect thereto prior to the assignment, or to the time notice was given of it when there is an interval between the execution of the transfer and the notice." Callahan v. Edwards, 32 N. Y. 483. The defendants had acquired the accounts prior to the transfer, and owned them at the time the note was executed. They gave the non-negotiable note, and on the same day received a transfer of the accounts against the assignor of the plaintiff which was prior to the assignment. This shows that there was an existing indebtedness against the assignor of the plaintiff, then due and payable before, as well as at the time of, the assignment, upon which an action might have been maintained by the defendants. When the defendants, as promisors of such an instrument, were sued by the assignee, the defenses which they had at the time of the assignment against the original creditor alike avail to them against the plaintiff as the substituted creditor. When the plaintiff sued them on this note, it was then due and payable, and there existed two opposing demands in a perfect condition at the same time; and in such case, either may insist upon a set-off. Pom. Rem. § 163. "A set-off," said SANDFORD, C. J., "is made where the defendant has a debt against the plaintiff arising out of a transaction independent of the contract on which the plaintiff sues and desires to avail himself of that debt in the existing suit, either to reduce the plaintiff's recovery, or to defeat it altogether." Avery v. Brown, 31 Conn. 401. The accounts held by the defendants were mature for collection on their part, and complete as matters of set-off as the cause of action upon the note. As a consequence, the right of set-off existed at the time of the assignment, and the plaintiff took subject to it. This result obviates all objections urged upon this phase of the case, except the contention that, as the defendants owned the accounts at the time the note was executed, they ought not to be permitted to plead it as a set-off. While it is true that the giving of a note is prima facie evidence that an existing indebtedness of the payee to the maker is paid, yet the fact may be alleged and shown to be otherwise. The fact that the assignor of the plaintiff owed the defendants at the time they gave him their note, in the absence of any explanation, might be considered as a settlement between the parties; but such is not the case when it is alleged and proved that such indebtedness is not paid, and is offered as a matter of set-off. In Graves v. Shulman, 59 Ala. 406, the court say: "Although the giving of a note is prima facie evidence that a previous indebtedness of the payee to the maker is or has been discharged, it is allowable to allege and show in any particular case that in such case this is not true; and, in the plea under consideration, it is alleged that the prior indebtedness of the plaintiffs to the debt set up in the plea of set-off was not discharged." In the present case, it is distinctly alleged that the demands pleaded as a set-off are not paid, nor any part thereof. If, after the assignment, the defendants had promised the assignee to pay the note, there might be some force in the argument that the defendants ought to be estopped from setting up their demands. But, as the case stands, it is difficult to understand its applicability, or that the doctrine we have been considering encourages litigation. That argument, once earnestly urged, has long since been exploded, for practical experience has utterly refuted it. The position which the plaintiff, as assignee, occupied was the same which his assignor occupied at the time of the transfer; and, standing in his shoes, he must abide the consequences of his position, and cannot avoid defenses to which his assignor was liable at the time of the assignment.

This disposes of all questions, except one other to which little objection was urged, and which we shall dispose of by saying that the trial court may, in its discretion, relieve a party from default in failing to furnish a bill of items when it is made satisfactorily to appear that a good and sufficient reason existed for such failure at the time, and one is furnished. Robbins v. Butler, 22 Pac. Rep. 803. Judgment affirmed.

VENDOR AND VENDEE — FRAUD — SALE IN GROSS — WARRANTY.

1. In a suit by a vendee against the vendor in which fraud is relied upon as the grounds of relief, it must appear from the complaint, among other things, that the vendor knew that the representations relied upon were untrue, and that they were made with the intent to defraud the plaintiff. Rolfes v. Russel, 5 Or. 400, and Dunning v. Cresson, 6 Or. 241, approved and followed.

2. Where a tract of land is sold for a sum in gross, and not by the acre, and the quantity stated is qualified by the words "more or less," there is no warranty of the quantity, and there can be no abatement, if the number of acres is less than stated, nor compensation allowed for any excess.

Appeal from circuit court, Douglas county; R. S. BEAN, Judge.

This suit was commenced on the 11th day of April, 1889. The complaint, in substance, alleges that on the 9th day of November, 1889, the defendant S. Marks fraudulently and falsely, represented and told the plaintiff that a certain farm contained 169.09 acres, and thereby induced plaintiff to purchase the same from defendants; and plaintiff, not knowing how much land the farm did contain, and relying on the statements and representations of said Marks, did purchase said farm from defendants, and paid therefor the sum of $1,700. That the farm contained only 141.01 acres, instead of 169.09 acres, the quantity sold to plaintiff. That plaintiff was damaged $282.20 thereby. That on said 9th of November, 1889, plaintiff paid defendants $600 cash, and gave his note for the balance, ($1,100,) and a mortgage on said farm to secure the same. That plaintiff gave his note to defendants on the 13th June, 1885, for $151, and on the 23d July, 1886, for $50. That there was no consideration for the note of $1,100, except the balance of the purchase price of said farm, which balance, in fact, was only $817.80, and not $1,100, and it was by reason of the mistake as to the amount of land in said farm that the note was given for $1,100, instead of $817.80, the correct amount, and the amount intended. That plaintiff has paid on note for $1,100, December 18, 1883, $700; October 18, 1884, $100; November 9, 1885, $30; November 18, 1885, $100; April 16, 1887, $50; and upon note for $151, November 28, 1885, $100. That defendants still retain said three notes in their possession, and on April 2, 1889, plaintiff offered to pay them $50, in addition to what had been paid, and requested them to deliver up said notes, which they refused. Plaintiff prays that the defendants be enjoined from transferring said notes; that $282.80 be deducted from the note for $1,100, at its date, and that an account be taken between the plaintiff and said defendants of such sum as may be due them; and that said notes be delivered up, together with said mortgage, for cancellation, and for general relief. The answer denies each material allegation of the complaint. The answer then contains this further and separate defense: That on November 9, 1883, for $1,700, defendants, by deed, conveyed to plaintiff the following described premises, to-wit: East half of the donation claim of John W. Burch, which entire claim is there described, giving the courses and distances but not the number of acres contained; also the north-west part of the donation claim of A. J. Tiller, giving commencing corners and courses and distances, but not the number of acres contained,—reserving from said lands so conveyed, that certain parcel of land heretofore sold by J. R. Jennings to Ezekiel Lyttel, which deed is referred to in deed of defendants, as recorded in Douglas county, Or., which land, it is said in defendants' deed, comprises all of the donation claim of J. W. Burch, lying on the north side of Cow creek, and was dated May 23, 1863. That said deed of defendants to plaintiff does not mention the number of acres intended to be conveyed, and was so understood between the plaintiff and defendants at the time. That plaintiff has ever since been in possession of the whole of said property, which is the same land referred to in plaintiff's complaint. The reply denies that the donation claim of Burch is described in plaintiff's deed, and alleges that it is described as follows, giving courses and distances: Containing in township 30 S., range 6 W., 221.18 acres, and in township 30 S., range 5 W., 97 acres; also the north-west part of land claim of A. J. Tiller, giving courses and distances, containing 60 acres, more or less,—reserving from the above-described premises, and not herein conveyed, that certain 50 acres heretofore sold by J. R. Jennings and wife to Ezekiel Lyttel, comprising all the claim of Burch on the north side of Cow creek. Denies that the deed from defendants to plaintiff is without mention of the number of acres intended to be conveyed, but alleges that said deed does mention that the Burch claim contains 318.18 acres, and the east half is 159.09 acres, and, except 50 acres, is 109.09 acres. Denies that defendants delivered possession to plaintiff of all the lands intended to be conveyed, but alleges that it was expressly stated by S. Marks, and so understood by plaintiff and defendants at the time the deed was executed, that the east half of the claim on the south of Cow Creek contained 109.09 acres, and the whole of said farm contained 169.09 acres, when in fact the east half of said claim south of Cow creek contained only 81.01 acres, and the whole of said farm contained only 141.01 acres. Upon these issues, the court below tried the case, and rendered a decree against the plaintiff dismissing the suit, from which he has appealed to this court.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) 1. It is nowhere alleged in the complaint that, at the time Marks made the representations complained of, he knew that the farm did not contain 169.09 acres, or that they were made with the intent to defraud the plaintiff. By omitting these allegations, the plaintiff fails to make a case in his complaint which would entitle him to any relief on the ground of fraud. Rolfes v. Russel, 5 Or. 400; Dunning v. Cresson, 6 Or. 241.

2. But the plaintiff's counsel argued that mistake is alleged in the complaint, and that, of itself, is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to relief. Waiving all question as to the insufficiency of the pleading on this point, we will proceed to examine the facts briefly. The plaintiff holds under a deed from Marks and Wollenburg and wife, dated the 9th of November, 1883. The consideration expressed in the deed is $1,700. The premises conveyed are described as follows: "The east half of that certain donation land claim of John W. Burch, which entire donation claim is described as commencing at a point 6.14 chains west and 22.30 chains south, from the corner of sections 24 and 25 in T. — S., R. 6 west, (claim No. 61;) thence east 23 chains; thence north 58.50 chains; thence west 74 chains; thence south 36.20 chains; thence east 50.80 chains; thence south 22.30 chains, to the place of beginning,—containing in township 30 S., R. 6 west, 221.18 acres and in township 30 S., R. 5 west, 97 acres. Also the north-west part of the donation land claim of A. J. Tiller, commencing 20.63 chains south, and 7.16 east, from the north-west corner of section 30 in township 30 S., R. 5 west; thence running east 29.50 chains; thence south 20.34 chains; thence west 29.50 chains; thence north 24.30 chains, to the place of beginning,—containing 60 acres, more or less. Reserving and excepting from the above-described premises, and not herein conveyed, that certain fifty acres heretofore sold by J. R. Jennings and wife to Ezekiel Lyttel, which said deed therefor is recorded in volume No. 2 of deeds, page 599, in the clerk's office of Douglas county, Oregon, and which land, so excepted from this conveyance, comprises all of the land of the said donation claim of J. W. Burch lying and being on the north side of Cow creek, which said deed is dated May 23, 1863." This deed contained general covenants of warranty, but did not specify the amount of land conveyed. The deed of Jennings and wife referred to conveys to Lyttel "all of the land belonging to the donation land claim of John Wesley Burch lying on the north side of Cow creek, containing fifty acres, more or less." Marks and Wollenburg, by the reference which they make to this last-named deed in their deed to the plaintiff, have made its descriptive words a part of their deed as completely as if they were written out at large in such deed; so that the plaintiff was bound to know that all of that part of the Burch claim north of Cow creek was conveyed away. The descriptive words in no manner fix the amount. Whatever may have been the plaintiff's impression, as to the amount of land contained in the farm purchased from Marks and Wollenburg, his own evidence shows that it was a purchase of the farm in gross, and not by the acre. "Question. What did you agree to pay him for this farm? Answer. I went and looked at the farm, and wrote him that I would give him $1,700 for the farm." These facts clearly bring this case within the principle that, where a tract of land is sold for a sum in gross, and not by the acre, and the quantity stated is qualified by the words "more or less," there is no warranty of quantity, and there can be no abatement, if the number of acres is less than stated, nor compensation allowed for any excess. 2 Suth. Dam. 250, and authorities cited in note 2; Noble v. Googins, 99 Mass. 231; Canal Co. v. Emmett, 9 Paige, 168; Board v. Younger, 29 Cal. 179; Cram v. Bank, 42 Barb. 434; 2 Warv. Vend. 925. These authorities effectually dispose of the appellant's contention, and require the affirmance of the decree appealed from, and it is so ordered.

STATE V. LAWRENCE.

LARCENY—INDICTMENT—ROBBERY.

1. An indictment which charges that L. on the 28th day of October, 1890, in the county of M. and state of Oregon, did feloniously in and upon G. L. make an assault, and him the said G. L. did put in fear and in danger of his life and of great bodily harm, and one silver watch, of the value of $10, did forcibly, violently, and against his, the said G. L.'s, will feloniously steal and carry away the said watch, and then and there being the personal property of the said G. L., will not sustain a conviction of the crime of larceny from the person.

2. An indictment for the crime of robbery under section 1742, Hill's Code, is defective, which fails to charge that the offense was committed by force and violence, or by putting in fear of force and violence, or assault, as the case may be.

3. A conviction for the crime of larceny from the person cannot be sustained under an indictment for robbery, which fails to charge that the property was taken from the person.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; L. B. STEARNS, Judge.

The defendant was indicted for the crime of robbery, and convicted of the crime of larceny from the person. The charging part of the indictment is as follows: "The said Abe Lawrence, on the 28th day of October, A. D. 1890, in the county of Multnomah, and state of Oregon, did feloniously in and upon one Geo. Lebo made an assault, and him, the said Geo. Lebo, did put in fear and in danger of his life and of great bodily harm, and one silver watch of the value of ten dollars did forcibly, violently, and against his, the said Geo. Lebo's, will, feloniously take, steal, and carry away, the said watch then and there being of the personal property of said Geo. Lebo, contrary," etc. No bill of exceptions is contained in the record, and the sole question therefore is whether or not the indictment is sufficient to sustain the judgment of conviction.

Gilbert J. McGinn, for appellant. T. A. Stevens, Dist. Atty., and W. T. Hume, for the State.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) Section 1742, Hill's Code, defines the crime for which the pleader attempted to indict the defendant. That section provides: "If any person not being armed with a dangerous weapon shall by force and violence, or by assault, or by putting in fear of force and violence or assault, rob, steal, or take from the person of another, any money or other property which may be the subject of larceny, such person, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years." It will be observed that this indictment fails to charge that the property in question was taken from the person of George Lebo. The jury having convicted the defendant of the crime of larceny from the person, he was sentenced to the penitentiary for a crime not charged in the indictment.

The indictment is fatally defective in another particular. It is not charged that this crime was committed "by force and violence, or by putting in fear of force and violence or assault." It is the violation of the sacredness of the person by any of the means enumerated in the statute whereby one's property is taken which the law punishes, and not the mere fact that a larceny is committed. The pleader ought therefore to aver that the property was taken from the person by some of the means mentioned. The defendant may have used force and violence, or assaulted the prosecutor, or put him in fear of force and violence or assault, yet if he did not rob, steal, or take from the person the property in question by some one or more of the means enumerated, the crime is not made out. If the crime were properly charged and any of the acts mentioned in the statute were committed at the time the property was taken, a jury would have no difficulty in reaching a correct conclusion. Counsel for appellant cite section 1765, Hill's Code, which provides: "If any person shall commit the crime of larceny by stealing from the person of another, such person shall," etc. From this he argues that, inasmuch as the taking from the person is not charged, that part of the verdict of the jury is to be rejected as surplusage, and the cause remanded to the court below, with directions to sentence the prisoner for the crime of petit larceny. But we are not satisfied that such disposition of the cause would be proper. The grand jury were evidently of the opinion that a felony had been committed, and aimed to charge the defendant therewith. If the defendant has committed a felony there is no legal reason why he should not be tried for that crime, if the court below and district attorney so elect. The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the cause be remanded to the court below for such further proceedings as may be according to law and the practice of that court.

BURGLARY—INDICTMENT—APPEAL—RECORD.

1. An indictment for burglary which charges that M. on the 3d day of November, A. D. 1890, in the county of M., and state of Oregon, did unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously break and enter a dwelling-house, namely, the dwelling-house of one E. A. C., with the intent on the part of him, the said M., to commit the crime of larceny therein, is insufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. Where the error relied upon on appeal appears from the judgment roll, no bill of exceptions is necessary.

3. The objection that the facts stated in an indictment do not constitute a crime may be taken for the first time in the appellate court, and is not waived by failing to demur or move in arrest of judgment in the trial court.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; L. E. STEARNS, Judge.

The defendant was indicted by the grand jury of Multnomah county, and convicted, from which judgment this appeal is taken. There is no bill of exceptions, and the only error relied upon for a reversal is the insufficiency of the indictment to sustain the judgment. The charging part of the indictment is as follows: "The said John Mack on the 3d day of November, A. D. 1890, in the county of Multnomah, and state of Oregon, did unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously break and enter a dwelling-house, namely, the dwelling-house of one E. A. Cunningham, with intent on the part of him, the said John Mack, to commit the crime of larceny therein, contrary," etc.

Gilbert J. McGinn and S. H. Green, for appellant. T. A. Stevens, Dist. Atty., and W. T. Hume, for the State.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) This record presents but a single question, and that is the sufficiency of the indictment. The pleader by this indictment attempted to charge the crime of burglary defined and made punishable by section 1758, Hill's Code. That section punishes any person who shall break and enter any dwelling-house in the night-time, in which there is, at the time, some human being, with intent to commit a crime therein; or, having entered with such intent, shall break any such dwelling-house in the night-time; or be armed with a dangerous weapon therein; or assault any person lawfully therein. The indictment fails to charge that the breaking and entry was in the night-time, or that there was in the house some human being. Under this section, these are a part of the essential elements of the crime of burglary, without which the defendant is not brought within the statute punishing that offense. Section 1759 makes the same acts punishable if committed in the day-time, and, for the reason already suggested, a conviction could not be sustained under this section. Section 1760 punishes whoever shall break and enter any building within the curtilage of any dwelling-house, but not forming a part thereof, or shall break and enter any building or part thereof, booth, tent, etc., in which property is kept, with the intent to steal therein, or commit any felony therein. The indictment in this case does not charge any of the elements of burglary under this section. Counsel for the state cite State v. McGinnis, 17 Or. 332, 20 Pac. Rep. 632, in which there was no bill of exceptions, and the court refused to examine the errors relied upon; but the appellant attempted to bring into the record by affidavit the facts upon which he relied. But here the error is in the judgment roll; in the indictment itself, in that it fails to charge a crime. Such an error is not waived by silence or cured by judgment. Counsel for the state also cite State v. Jarvis, 18 Or. 360, 23 Pac. Rep. 251. In that case the indictment charged both incest and rape, and we held that, if the objection had been taken by demurrer in the court below, it would have prevailed; but, not having been so taken, it was waived. The distinction is manifest. In the one case a crime is charged in the indictment; in the other it is not. It is true in the Jarvis Case more than was necessary to constitute a single crime was charged, but that did not necessarily vitiate the indictment. In this case there is not enough charged. In State v. Bruce, 5 Or. 68, this court held that the particular objection made to the indictment in that case was waived by failing to demur; but that there might be no misunderstanding of the ground upon which the decision was placed, the court, by BONHAM, J., added: "This reasoning of course does not apply to an indictment which is subject to the objections raised by the first and fourth grounds of demurrer as specified by statute, (Crim. Code, §§ 123, 131.)" These sections are numbered 1322 and 1330 respectively of the present Revision. For the reason that the indictment in this case fails to charge a crime, the judgment must be reversed; but no order for the defendant's discharge will be made, for the reason that the objection may probably be obviated by another indictment, if the court below shall so direct.

HUBBARD v. TOWN OF MEDFORD.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ESTABLISHMENT OF FIRE LIMITS.

The grant to a municipal corporation of power to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires necessarily implies the right to establish fire limits, and prohibit the erection of wooden buildings therein.

Appeal from circuit court, Jackson county; L. R. WEBSTER, Judge.

In October, 1889, the common council of the town of Medford duly passed an ordinance for the prevention of fires, and the protection of persons and property endangered thereby, which, among other things, established fire limits, and provided that no wooden buildings should be built within said limits. On February 24, 1890, the plaintiff was tried and convicted before the recorder's court for a violation of the provisions of said ordinance, and fined $50. On a writ of review this judgment was affirmed by the circuit court of Jackson county, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

H. K. Hanna, for appellant. Francis Fitch, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The only question which we are required to decide in this case is, does the city of Medford have authority under its charter to establish fire limits, and prohibit the erection of wooden buildings therein? The provisions of the charter of Medford, so far as they are applicable to the case in hand, are as follows: The board of trustees shall have power—"First. To adopt resolutions and by-laws, and make ordinances, not repugnant to the laws of this state, or of the United States. * * * Seventh. To regulate the storage of gunpowder, tar, pitch, resin, and all other combustible materials, and the use of candles, lamps, and other lights in stores, shops, stables, and other places; to prevent, remove, and secure any fireplace, stove, chimney, oven, or boiler, or other apparatus which may be dangerous in causing fire, and to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires. * * * Tenth. To prevent and restrain any riot or disorderly assemblage in any street, house, or place in town, and to provide for the public security, peace, and tranquillity; to provide and maintain either or both a day and night police; to regulate the rate of speed upon all railroads within the corporate limits of the town." Laws 1889, pp. 363, 364.

The contention of appellant is that, before a municipality can establish fire limits, and prohibit the erection of wooden buildings therein, the power to do so must be conferred by express legislative grant, and that, since no such express grant is contained in the charter of defendant, the ordinance in question is void. A municipal corporation can exercise no powers but such as are granted in express terms, or necessarily or fairly implied as incident to those expressly granted, or essential to the manifest object and purposes of the corporation. The charter is the organic law. From its charter its powers are originally derived, and to its charter every attempted exercise of power must be ultimately referred. As its powers are conferred by its charter, so they are necessarily limited by it, and the corporation is prohibited from exercising those which are not authorized. Any act or attempted exercise of power which transcends the limits expressed, or necessarily inferred from the language of the charter, is beyond the authority of the corporation, and is therefore void. City of Corvallis v. Carille, 10 Or. 139; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 89. While a corporation can exercise no powers but such as are expressly conferred by the act by which it is incorporated, or are necessary to carry into effect the powers thus conferred, or are essential to the manifest object and purposes of the corporation, yet, when an express power is granted, there is also impliedly granted the power necessary to carry it into effect. City of Portland v. Schmidt, 13 Or. 17, 6 Pac. Rep. 221. The charter of defendant expressly confers upon it the power "to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires." The grant of this power necessarily carries with it the power to enact any and all reasonable rules, regulations, or ordinances necessary to carry into effect the powers thus granted. The object sought to be accomplished by this provision is the prevention of damages to, and destruction of, property by fire, and, unless the municipality, through its constituted authorities, has the power to enact ordinances necessary to accomplish that purpose, the grant is of no avail. The power to provide for the prevention of fires is granted in express terms, but the mode of exercising it is vested in the trustees, who are the chosen representatives of the whole people, and the sole legislative body of the corporation. They are presumed to act for the best interests of the entire inhabitants of the town. The power, however, being an implied one, all ordinances passed in virtue of it must be reasonable and not oppressive, and must be reasonably calculated to attain the object sought; that is, the prevention of fires. Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) §§ 319, 327. The prevention of fires and their spread is of prime importance to every community. Every precaution possible should be taken to prevent the destruction of property and the danger of life incident to conflagration, and for this purpose as great a degree of interference with personal rights is permitted as under any other power of a municipal corporation. In cities and densely populated towns, the first step usually taken is to establish fire limits, and prescribe the material of which buildings erected therein shall be constructed. Owing to the extreme importance of such regulations, and the necessity therefor, it has been held that municipal corporations have the power to enact ordinances of this kind under their general police powers. Id. § 405; Horr & B. Mun. Ord. § 222; Mayor v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 651; Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403; Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575. These authorities proceed largely upon the theory that the erection of wooden buildings in cities and towns compactly built would be so eminently dangerous to surrounding property that the public necessity requires that they be prohibited. The authorities on this question are however not harmonious, and there are many decisions holding a contrary doctrine to those above referred to. Mayor v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261; Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 312; City of Keokuk v. Scroggs, 39 Iowa, 447; Kneedler v. Borough of Norristown, 100 Pa. St. 368. But none of these cases, except Mayor v. Thorne, hold that an express grant to a municipality of powers "to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires" does not confer the authority to establish fire limits, and prohibit the erection of wooden buildings therein. The case of Mayor v. Thorne was a suit by the city of Hudson to enjoin the defendants from erecting a building upon a vacant lot owned by them, intended to be used as a hay-press, in violation of a city ordinance, and was decided in 1838. What was said by Chancellor WALWORTH in relation to the power of the city to restrict the erection of wooden buildings has been considered as dicta, and the authority of the case on that question is much impaired by the criticism it has received by the courts and text-writers. But it is unnecessary for us to pursue the examination of the question of the right of a city to enact ordinances of this kind under general police powers any further, or express any opinion thereon. The charter of defendant expressly grants to it the power to prevent fires, which we think necessarily implies the right to establish fire limits, and prescribe the kind of buildings to be erected therein. It was so held by CAMPBELL, J., in the case of Alexander v. Town Council, 54 Miss. 659, and ANDERS, C. J., in City of Olympia v. Mann, ante, 337. The judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

REPLEVIN — PLEADING—GENERAL DENIAL—COUNTER-CLAIM.

In an action of replevin by a mortgagee for the possession of mortgaged property, the defendant in possession thereof may, for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's right of recovery, prove, under the general denial, a sale of the property by her to the plaintiff, subsequent to the execution and delivery of the mortgage, and his refusal to take the goods and pay her the contract price. Further held, that in such action, where the plaintiff is permitted to retain the goods, the defendant may plead such sale as a counter-claim, and, if maintained on the trial, may recover a judgment against the plaintiff in the alternative for a return of the property, or for the difference between the amount of plaintiff's lien on the property and the price agreed on in the sale thereof.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Franklin county; A. W. BENSON, Judge.

STRANG, C. Action for replevin. Plaintiff held a chattel mortgage upon a stock of millinery goods, store furniture and fixtures, in possession of the defendant. By the terms of the mortgage the goods were to remain in possession of the defendant until condition broken, or the plaintiff deemed himself insecure. The plaintiff, deeming himself insecure, demanded possession of the goods, which was refused. He then commenced his action of replevin in the district court of Franklin county, Kan., April 23, 1887. Defendant first answered by a general denial, and afterwards filed an amended answer, in which she admitted the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage sued on, but averred that, after the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, the plaintiff agreed to purchase of her the entire stock of goods, furniture, and fixtures, at a price to be determined by an invoice to be taken by Mr. Holt, the agent of the plaintiff, and to pay her the difference between the value of the goods so ascertained and the amount of plaintiff's lien in cash. She also alleges that Mr. Holt, under the instructions of the plaintiff, took an invoice of the goods, furniture, and fixtures, and that, after the defendant had submitted to the interruption and inconvenience necessarily incident to the taking of the invoice, the plaintiff failed and wholly refused to carry out his said agreement to take the goods, and pay the defendant therefor the difference between the amount of the invoice and the amount of the plaintiff's note, notwithstanding she offered the plaintiff the goods according to said agreement, and demanded the money due her thereon. The invoice of said goods amounted to $1,259.09, and the furniture and fixtures to $335.75,—a total of $1,494.84. There was a third defense in the amended answer, in which defendant claimed damages for the wrongful taking of the property by the plaintiff. The plaintiff replied to the general denial, and the case went to trial by the court and jury. Verdict for the defendant for $808.37, as the value of her interest in the property, and as damages, $28.29. Afterwards, on motion for a new trial, the court required the defendant to remit $88.14 of the amount of her interest in the goods, and $3.09 from the amount of her damages, which was done; whereupon the court overruled the motion for a new trial, and entered judgment upon the verdict as modified for $720.23, as the interest of defendant below in the goods, and $25.20 for damages.

The first ground for reversal discussed by the plaintiff in his brief is the refusal of the court to require the defendant, in the trial below, to elect upon which defense set out in her answer she would rely. Plaintiff suggests that the second and third defenses set out in the answer are inconsistent with each other. The second defense sets out a sale of the goods replevied by the defendant to the plaintiff after the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, and his refusal to carry out the contract of sale. This defense is based upon matters arising subsequent to the execution of the plaintiff's mortgage. The third count in the answer sets up matters and things which, if they amount to a defense, relate to the original transaction between the parties. This count may contain some things that are not matters of defense at all, but no motion to make it more definite and certain was interposed, and no demurrer was pleaded to it. Whatever matter of defense it stated was not inconsistent with the second defense. If the second defense failed, she might still have whatever benefit could be derived from the matters stated in her last defense. The sale of the goods subsequent to the making and delivery of the note and mortgage was not inconsistent with the defendant's version of the original transaction sought to be detailed in the third count.

The plaintiff complains of the action of the court in overruling his objection to the following question: "Who first suggested the mortgage being given?" This was objected to as being incompetent. It cannot be said that this question was incompetent. It would be immaterial, unless followed by something rendering it material; but, as a preliminary question, it was not incompetent. The next question objected to was: "You may state all the conversation." To this question the plaintiff objected, but stated no ground of objection, and the court properly overruled it. The following question was asked: "Did you read it [the mortgage] before you signed it?" The answer was: "Mr. Deford read it, but I did not understand it." There was no objection to this question, but plaintiff objected to the answer, failing, however, to assign any ground of objection, and he made no motion to strike the answer out. This ruling cannot be complained of. The next question was: "What part of it was it that you didn't understand?" This question was objected to as incompetent, and sustained by the court; showing the court to be with the plaintiff, so far as the substance of this part of the examination was concerned, as soon as the counsel put himself within the rule, and stated his ground of objection.

The next complaint is the ruling of the court against the plaintiff's objection to the following question: "What would have been the aggregate value, in your judgment?" This question was probably not competent, since, if the sale of the goods by the defendant to the plaintiff is enforced, the invoice of the goods is their fair value; and, if said sale is not enforced, the plaintiff is only required to return to the defendant any surplus in his hands after paying his debt and costs. But, under the instructions of the court, and the verdict of the jury, the admission of this evidence is not prejudicial error. The court instructed the jury that, if they found the existence of the contract of sale contended for by the defendant, the value of the goods would be the invoice of the same, made by Holt. The jury evidently found for the defendant on the allegation of sale of the goods by her to Deford, and in enforcing said contract considered the amount of the invoice of the goods as the value of the goods. But if the plaintiff is right in his argument upon his tenth assignment of error, when he says that the jury should have found what the whole property was worth, then this question might have been competent and proper.

Plaintiff complains of the exclusion of testimony. We do not think any error exists here. The witness was asked her understanding in relation to the matter of inquiry, and if she understood certain things from either Deford or Miss Hutchinson. Her understanding was not evidence. What she understood from Deford or Miss Hutchinson was not evidence. What she heard Miss Hutchinson say in regard to the matter might have been, but she was not asked that question.

The sixth complaint relates to the charge of the court. The averment is that the court erred in telling the jury that it was necessary that plaintiff "should have some reasonable ground for deeming himself insecure." The instruction, as a whole, shows that the court did not instruct the jury that the plaintiff should have some reasonable grounds for deeming himself insecure. After using the above words, the court adds: "But that is not the question we are trying here. If he deemed himself insecure, he must be the sole judge of that question, and we are not trying the question of whether he had reasonable grounds or not, but the fact whether or not he deemed himself insecure." We do not think the instruction, as a whole, misled the jury.

We think the instruction complained of in the seventh assignment is the law. If, subsequent to the delivery of the note and mortgage, and while the defendant was in the actual possession of the goods, the plaintiff purchased the goods of the defendant, and agreed to pay her the difference between the amount of his lien thereon and the invoice of the goods, he waived his rights as mortgagee, and stood upon his rights as vendee; and, the goods being in the defendant's actual possession, she had a right to hold them until he paid her the purchase price, or the difference between his lien and the amount of the invoice.

The next error assigned relates to the instructions of the court, in which the court told the jury they might find the value of the fixtures from the evidence. There is, at least, no reversible error in this instruction, when considered in connection with the evidence, the verdict of the jury, and its modification by the court. Holt did invoice the fixtures. The evidence shows that he put them down in the book, and attached a value to them. It is true he put them in at the price the defendant said they were worth, instead of putting them in at a value fixed by himself; but he had a right to do so, and, having done so, they were none the less invoiced because of the fact that he had them put in at a price fixed by her. He might have taken her judgment upon the goods, and if he had, and had actually put them in at a valuation fixed by her, it would still have been his invoice. A little figuring shows that the jury took the fixtures at the invoice. The invoice of the goods and fixtures was $1,494.70. The amount of the plaintiff's lien, including the sum paid the First National Bank, taken from the invoice of the goods and fixtures, leaves the amount of the defendant's interest in the same as found by the jury: and, taking the amount of the goods from the amount of the goods and fixtures, the remainder is the invoice of the fixtures. It follows that the jury accepted the invoice of the fixtures as taken, and did not find the value of the fixtures from the evidence; and hence the instruction did no harm. But the court finally required the defendant to remit $88.14 from the amount found by the jury, and the probability is that the court cut down the price of the fixtures that much, which would likely place them at a fair valuation.

The failure of the court to instruct the jury in relation to matters set up in the third count of defendant's answer did not work any injury to the plaintiff, since it is patent that the jury gave that defense no consideration. They took the invoice as to the value of the goods, and the damages found was evidently the interest on the sum the jury found as due the defendant from the plaintiff on the sale of the goods.

The tenth and eleventh errors relate to the verdict, and the action of the court in modifying it. There is nothing in the complaint as to these matters that requires this court to reverse. The jury in effect found the aggregate value of the property. They said the defendant's interest in the property was $808.37; that her interest in the property remained at that sum, after paying the First National Bank mortgage and the amount due the plaintiff on his mortgage; and, as we have already said, the whole value of the property is thus shown, and is $1,494.70. It was not necessary in this case to find the general value of the property. Earle v. Burch, 33 N. W. Rep. 254.

The plaintiff also complains because the court did not grant him a new trial. The evidence on the application for new trial was conflicting, and that which was new was impeaching in its character. All of this was addressed to the discretion of the trial court. Not being satisfied that the court abused its discretion, its ruling will not be disturbed. These are all the questions that are seriously discussed in the plaintiff's brief. In his oral argument, however, counsel for plaintiff discussed another, and perhaps the most important, question of the case. In this argument he claimed the second count of defendant's answer could not be set up in this action; that this action is replevin, an action in tort, and the defendant's cause of action, being founded on contract, cannot be set off against the plaintiff's second cause of action. In the argument the cause of action set up in defendant's second count was treated as a set-off. Considering it in this light, the question is not free from doubt. But should the cause of action complained of be considered as a set-off? Is it not rather a counter-claim? Paragraph 4178, Gen. St. 1889: "The counter-claim mentioned in the last section must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the petition, as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action." A counter-claim must be a claim existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff to an action under such circumstances as that a several judgment might be had between them in relation thereto; and, first, it must arise out of the contract set forth in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim; or, second, it must arise out of the transaction set forth in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim; or, third, it must be connected with the subject of the action. The cause of action set out in the defendant's second count is a cause of action existing in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff under such circumstances as that a separate action might have been maintained thereon in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff, and, if maintained, a several judgment rendered therein. In fact the plaintiff claims that the defendant should have so proceeded. The cause of action set out in the defendant's answer as her second defense did not arise out of any contract set forth in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim. If any contract may be said to be the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, it was that contained in the plaintiff's mortgage on the defendant's goods, which is a distinct contract from that set up as the foundation of the defendant's second cause of action. Did said cause of action of the defendant arise out of the "transaction" set forth in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim? What is to be understood by the word "transaction," as found in our statute? In Remedies and Remedial Rights, by Pomeroy, in discussing a statute like ours, the author says: "As already stated in a former chapter, the difficulty in arriving at the true interpretation of the term 'transaction' lies in the fact that it had no strict legal meaning before it was used in the statute. Being placed in immediate connection with the word 'contract,' and separated therefrom by the disjunctive 'or,' one conclusion is certain, at all events, namely, that the legislature intended by it something different from and additional to 'contract.' The most familiar rules of textual interpretation are violated by the assumption that no such signification was intended. The only question at all doubtful is, how far did the law-makers design to go, and how broad a sense did they attach to the words? Is it to be used in the widest popular meaning, or must it be narrowed into some limited and technical meaning, and thus be made a term of legal nomenclature?" Section 769. From the same author we learn that the whole of a fraudulent scheme, or all the connecting statements and acts constituting a cheat, would form a transaction in its broadest sense; and so we may say that the connecting acts and statements, oral and in writing, concerning a trade, may be in the same sense a transaction. A contract is the result of a transaction, while the transaction covers all things done and said which result in a contract. In Woodruff v. Garner, 27 Ind. 4, Judge FRAZER puts it thus: "The plaintiff's cause of action is the alleged fraud of the defendant in procuring the deed sought to be rescinded. The defendant's cause of action averred in the counter-claim does not arise out of the plaintiff's cause of action, for it cannot even exist consistently with it. If the fraud alleged by the plaintiff was perpetrated, then the defendant cannot have any right of action whatever, so the defendant found it necessary to deny the fraud. But the deed sought to be set aside constitutes a part of the transaction upon which the plaintiff and defendant both rely for a recovery. It is the link which forms the direct connection between the two diverse causes of action. The transaction set forth in the complaint was not simply the alleged fraud,—it was the entire business or matter of agreeing to sell and purchase the land, and of executing and delivering the deed in pursuance of such agreement. The plaintiff averred that the defendant was guilty of fraud, and such fraud was therefore a part of the transaction, according to the plaintiff's version. The defendant's cause of action arose out of the same transaction; in fact, it was the entire transaction, except the element of fraud, which he asserted did not exist. The term 'transaction' refers to the actual facts and circumstances from which the rights result, and which are averred, and not to the mere form and manner in which the facts are averred." "Transaction," then, as employed in our Code, would seem to include all that is said and done in connection with a purchase and sale or other trade, and all that is said and done in connection with the perpetration of a fraud or cheat. WOODRUFF, J., in Bank v. Lee, 7 Abb. Pr. 372, 389, uses the following language: "This division of the section shows that there may be a counter-claim when the action itself does not arise on contract, for the second clause is expressly confined to actions arising on contracts, and allows counter-claims in such or any other causes of action also arising on contract; and this may embrace probably all cases heretofore denominated 'set-off,' legal or equitable, and any other legal or equitable demand, liquidated or unliquidated, whether within the proper definition of set-off or not, if it arise on contract. The first subdivision by its terms assumes that the plaintiff's complaint may set forth, as the foundation of the action, a contract or a transaction. The legislature, in using both words, must be assumed to have designed that each should have a meaning; and, in our judgment, their construction should be according to the natural and ordinary signification of the terms. In this sense, every contract may be said to be a transaction;

but every transaction is not a contract."

The form of plaintiff's action is in tort. The cause of his action, as set forth in his petition, is the alleged wrongful detention of the goods and fixtures described in his petition. This cause of action, technically considered, does not arise out of a contract, though it would not be far out of the way to say the note and mortgage are the foundation of the plaintiff's claim. In the light of our Code, and judicial interpretations of similar Codes, can we look beyond the technical cause of action, to the whole transaction set forth in the petition as the plaintiff's cause of action,—that is, to the taking of the note and mortgage, the allegation of insecurity, the demand and refusal to deliver the property, and the detention of them by the defendant,—and say that the defendant's second defense arises out of the "transaction" set forth in plaintiff's petition, and thus sustain said defense? Some cases go quite as far as this. Bank v. Lee, 7 Abb. Pr. 372; Judah v. Trustees, 16 Ind. 56-60; Bitting v. Thaxton, 72 N. C. 541-549. But we prefer, so far as this case is concerned, to put the matter upon what we consider safer ground, and justify the defendant's second cause of action upon the ground that it is directly connected with the subject of the plaintiff's action. In Bank v. Lee, above cited, which is referred to with approval in Pomeroy in his work cited herein, (section 773, and note,) Justice WOODRUFF reaches the conclusion that, even if the defendant's cause of action does not arise out of the "transaction" set forth in the complaint, it is directly and immediately connected with the subject of the action. This was an action in trover for damages for the conversion of certain bills of exchange. The answer was pleaded as a counter-claim. It set up the drawing of the bills, their indorsement by plaintiffs, their delivery to the Ohio Trust Company, their transfer to the defendants for full value, and without notice, demand of payment, non-payment, and notice thereof to plaintiffs, and prayed judgment against the plaintiffs as indorsers for the amount due on the drafts. The judge says: "The subject of the action is either the right to the possession of the bills of exchange or the bills themselves. The defendant's counter-claim is not only connected with, but is inseparable from, either or both. The object of the action is damages, but the subject is the bills of exchange, or the right to their possession." Again, referring to Pomeroy, we quote: "Some judges have said that in all possessory actions, and all actions to establish property, the 'subject of the action' denotes the things to assert a right over which, or to obtain the possession of which, the action is brought,—as the land in ejectment, and many equity suits, or the chattels in replevin." The author himself puts it thus: "It would, as it seems to me, be correct to say, in all cases, legal or equitable, that the 'subject of the action' is the plaintiff's main primary right. Thus, the right of property and possession in ejectment and replevin, the right of possession in trover or trespass, the right to money in all cases of debt and the like, would be the subject of the respective actions."

So far as the case at bar is concerned, it is immaterial whether we treat the chattels themselves, for the possession of which the action is brought, as the subject of the action, or adopt the other view, and say that the "primary right of the plaintiff," to-wit, his right to recover the possession of the chattels described in his petition, is the subject of the action; for, in either view of the matter, the defense complained of relates to the subject of the action, since it affects equally the chattels themselves and the plaintiff's right to recover their possession. The defendant would have had a right, under the general denial, to prove her contract of sale set up in her second defense, for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff was not entitled to the possession of the property, the possession of which he sought. The plaintiff's right to recover the possession of the goods is founded upon his mortgage. But if the defendant's contention that she sold the goods to him subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, by which sale he was to pay her the difference between the sum of his own lien on the property and the lien in favor of the national bank, and the invoice of the goods, is true, she had a right to refuse their delivery until he paid her the money coming to her on the sale. Under the general denial, she is entitled to any defense that defeats the plaintiff's right to recover the possession of the property, but not to prove a cause of action in her favor against the plaintiff. Can the defendant, by pleading the sale, recover a judgment against the plaintiff for a balance her due? It seems clear to us that she can, under our statute relating to counter-claims. Since the adoption of Codes in most of the states, the doctrine of set-off and recoupment has undergone much change. In New York, the former rule that in an action for a tort, a counter-claim, no matter whether arising on contract or based upon another tort, could not be allowed, has been so far modified as to allow the interposition of a counter-claim in the full sense of the Code, whether arising on contract or based upon a tort, in an action for a tort, whenever such counter-claim is founded upon a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or whenever it is connected with the subject of the action. Wat. Set-Off, § 616; Woolen Mills v. Eull, 37 How. Pr. 299; Dougherty v. Stamps, 43 Mo. 243; Kisler v. Tinder, 29 Ind. 270; Tinsley v. Tinsley, 15 B. Mon. 454; Railroad Co. v. Thompson, 18 B. Mon. 735. The action was brought for injuries done the plaintiff's boat while passing through the canal, caused by a break in the canal, alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. The defendant set up a counter-claim that the break itself was caused by the plaintiff's negligence, and prayed a judgment for the damages. This counter-claim was sustained, the court saying: "If it does not arise out of the transaction set forth in the complaint, it certainly is connected with the subject of the action." McArthur v. Canal Co., 34 Wis. 139-146. "A claim on the part of the defendant for the price and value of the identical goods which are the subject of the action is the cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or is at least connected with the subject of the action, and is strictly a counter-claim." Thompson v. Kessel, 30 N. Y. 383. "Since the Code, however, of 1852, it seems if the defendant's demand is sufficient, a defendant may not only defeat a plaintiff's claim by recoupment, but recover a balance notwithstanding the former rule * * * that a defendant could only use his claim to defeat that of the plaintiff." Woolen Mills v. Eull, 37 How. Pr. 301; Ogden v. Coddington, 2 E. D. Smith, 317. "Counter-claims under the Code [since 1852] embrace both set-offs and recoupments, as they were understood prior to that time." Pattison v. Richards, 22 Barb. 140. "But while the counter-claim authorized by the Code embraces both set-off and recoupment, it is broader and more comprehensive than either." Vassear v. Livingston, 13 N. Y. 256; Beardsley v. Stover, 7 How. Pr. 204. "It secures to the defendant the full relief which a separate action at law, bill in chancery, or a cross-bill would have secured him on the same state of facts." Woolen Mills v. Eull, 37 How. Pr. 301; Gleason v. Moen, 2 Duer, 642. "It may be for either liquidated or unliquidated damages, (Schubart v. Harteau, 34 Barb. 447.) and for unliquidated damages arising on contract, different from the contract on which the action is brought, (Lignot v. Redding, 4 E. D. Smith, 285.) and of an equitable or legal nature." Woolen Mills v. Eull, 37 How. Pr. 301; Currie v. Cowles, 6 Bosw. 453. "It is not required that the counter-claim itself shall be founded in, or arise out of, the contract set forth in the petition; but it is sufficient that it arise out of the transaction set forth in the petition, or is connected with the subject of the action." Tinsley v. Tinsley, 15 B. Mon. 454-459; Wadley v. Davis, 63 Barb. 500; Bank v. Lee, 7 Abb. Pr. 372-389; Walsh v. Hall, 66 N. C. 233-237. The counter-claim is allowed, though the plaintiff's form of action is in tort. "The plaintiffs, trustees of the Vincennes University, sue to recover the value of certain bonds belonging to the corporation, received by the defendant as its attorney, and converted by him to his own use. He admits the receipt and detention of the securities, and alleges, by way of counter-claim, that the university was indebted to him for certain professional services, particularly described, including his services in procuring these very bonds, among others, to be issued to it by the state, and prays judgment for the amount of such indebtedness. In pronouncing upon the validity of this answer as a counter-claim, the court says: "The point is that the action is in the form of trover,—an action ex delicto,—and that under such action the defendant cannot avail himself of any claim which he may have against the plaintiffs for services rendered, or money expended on their behalf, even if it was in the recovery of the identical property which is the subject of the action. We are clear it was the intention of those who initiated and inaugurated the present Code of Procedure that parties litigant might, and perhaps should, determine in each suit all matters in controversy between them which could legitimately be included therein, keeping in view their substantial rights. As proceedings so distinct as those were at law and in equity are no longer required to be separated, but are now blended in one action, we are unable to see any reason for requiring two actions to determine a controversy in which the rights of each party are so dependent upon the rights of the other as in the case at bar." Judah v. Trustees, 16 Ind. 56-60; Blitting v. Thaxton, 72 N. C. 541-549; Bank v. Lee, 7 Abb. Pr. 872; Ayres v. O'Farrel, 4 Rob. (N. Y.) 668, 10 Bosw. 143; Barhyte v. Hughes, 33 Barb. 320; Taylor v. Root, *43 N. Y. 335.

After a careful reading of our Code in relation to counter-claims, and a somewhat thorough examination of the books upon the question involved in this last assignment of error, we conclude that the defendant not only had the right, under her general denial, to prove the matter set up in her second count to defeat the plaintiff's cause of action, but that, having pleaded it, she should be allowed to prove it as a counter-claim, as an affirmative cause of action against the plaintiff, and recover in this case a balance against the plaintiff. We therefore recommend that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered. All the justices concurring.

YORK DRAPER MERCANTILE CO. v. LUSK.

SALES—FAILURE TO DELIVER—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. In an action by the buyer against the seller for breach of contract for the delivery of corn, the measure of damages is, as a general rule, the market value of the corn at the time and place of delivery, less the contract price.

2. In such case, when the seller, after his contract of sale is made, notifies the buyer that he will not fill the contract, held, that in the absence of any evidence on the part of the defaulting seller, that the buyer, after notice that the seller would not fill the contract, and before date of delivery, could have purchased corn in the market of the place of delivery, upon such terms as to have mitigated his loss, the measure of damages remains the same.

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Rice county; ANSEL R. CLARK, Judge.

M. A. Thompson, for plaintiff in error. Bailey & Foley, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. August 2, 1887, the defendant contracted to sell and deliver to the plaintiff at Dodge City, Kan., all the corn he then owned, at 80 cents per hundred pounds. The said corn was in crib at Stafford, Kan., and amounted to 5,091 bushels, or 285,096 pounds. The jury found the corn was to be delivered in a reasonable time. On the same day, August 2d, after the contract was completed between the parties, the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff at Dodge City, which was received there on the 3d, notifying him (the plaintiff) that he would not deliver the corn at 80 cents per hundred pounds, but said he would deliver it at 85 cents per hundred. And on the next day, August 3d, the defendant wrote the plaintiff at Dodge City that he would not deliver the corn at 85 cents, which letter was received by plaintiff, August 4th. August 3d corn was worth 80 to 85 cents per hundred at Dodge City. August 8th it was worth $1 per hundred, and continued at that price until the 1st of September, when it went to $1.15. The case was tried to a jury, which gave a verdict for the plaintiff for $153.31. The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The only question in the case is, what is the proper measure of damages? The plaintiff claimed the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the price of corn at the time and place of delivery, and asked the court to so charge the jury. The court refused to charge the jury as requested, and instructed them that the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the price of the corn at Dodge City at the time the defendant notified the plaintiff that he would not deliver the corn. This instruction, and the refusal of the court to grant a new trial, are complained of as error.

It is well settled that the general rule for the measure of damages in cases like this is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the article purchased at the time and place of delivery. Stewart v. Power, 12 Kan. 596; Gray v. Hall, 29 Kan. 704. Where the buyer refuses to accept the goods purchased, Benjamin on Sales lays down the rule as follows: "Sec. 1118. The date at which the contract is considered to have been broken is that at which the goods were to have been delivered, not that at which the buyer may give notice that he intends to break the contract, and to refuse accepting the goods." Phillipotts v. Evans, 5 Mees. & W. 475; Follansbee v. Adams, 86 Ill. 13; Kadish v. Young, 108 Ill. 170. We do not find the exact converse of this rule stated in Benjamin, but we know of no reason why it should not be equally the law. "The same doctrine prevails in cases where the contract is to be performed on a certain day, and before that time the vendor declines to carry out the contract." Wood, Mayne Dam. § 205; Leigh v. Pater-son, 8 Taunt. 540; Phillipotts v. Evans, 5 Mees. & W. 476. The time of delivery, and not the time when the seller gives notice that he intends to break the contract, is the rule. Thus where the defendants renounced a contract for the delivery of iron rails, it was held that the time when the contract was to be considered as broken was at the time of delivery. Windmuller v. Pope, 107 N. Y. 674, 14 N. E. Rep. 436, (February 11, 1889.) "If the vendor puts it out of his power to comply with his contract by a sale of a portion of the goods to another, before the time stipulated for the delivery, the vendee is entitled to the difference between the contract price and the market price of all the goods purchased at the time and place of delivery." Field, Dam., § 247; Crist v. Armour, 34 Barb. 378. "In the absence of any evidence on the part of the defendants that the plaintiffs could have gone into the market and obtained another similar contract on such terms as would mitigate their loss, the measure of damages was the sum of the difference between the contract price and the market price at the period of delivery." Benj. Sales, § 1333. "As to the effect of breach of contract of sales, when the bargain was for delivery by installments, it is held that, in the absence of any evidence on the part of the defaulting seller that the buyer could have gone into the market and obtained another similar contract, on such terms as would mitigate the loss, the measure of the damages is the sum of the difference between the contract price and the market price at the several periods of delivery." 5 Wait, Act. & Def. 623; Brown v. Muller, 3 Eng. R. 429; Ex parte Llansamlet Tin Plate Co., 6 Eng. R. 689, there cited. The rule of the last two citations requires the defaulting seller, if he wishes to take his case out of the general rule as to damages, as above stated, to show by proof that the vendee could have gone into the market, and purchased the goods he wanted without loss. This seems to be a very proper rule. The goods purchased may be of a kind not readily found in the market, but, if they may be had in the market, it would seem to be more in accord with fairness to require the defaulting seller to prove that the goods could readily have been procured in the market without loss to the vendee than to require the vendee to show that he could not obtain the goods in the market. In the case at bar, if the plaintiff could not have obtained the amount of corn purchased of the defendant in the market, and thus saved himself from partial or total loss from defendant's default, they would be entitled to damages under the general rule. And, in the absence of any proof on the part of the defaulting seller that the corn could have been purchased by the plaintiffs so as to save themselves, they should have been allowed their damage under the general rule, and recovered the difference between the contract price, and the value of the corn at Dodge City at the time of delivery. The delivery was to be within a reasonable time. The evidence shows that it would take from one to two weeks to shell and deliver the corn. The average time as fixed by the evidence would probably be a reasonable time. The average time would, under the evidence, be about 10 days. Considering, then, the reasonable time for delivery to be ten days, the measure of damages would be the difference between the contract price and the value of the corn at Dodge City about the 13th of August, 1887. But, as this case goes back for a new trial, the question of reasonable time will be one for the jury.

There is another matter we desire to call attention to which should have some force in this case. The defendant, after accepting, by wire, on August 2, 1887, the proposition of the plaintiffs to purchase all his corn at 80 cents per hundred, wrote them a letter which was received by them the next day, in which he said he would not fill the contract at 80 cents per hundred, but would fill it at 85 cents. On the 3d he wrote them another letter, received by them at Dodge City, on the 4th, in which he said he would not fill the contract at 85 cents, and did not state any price at which he would fill it. Under such circumstances, the plaintiffs could hardly know what to do, as they did not know how soon they might receive another declaration from the defendant, and it may be questioned whether, if this case had been, in other respects, taken out of the general rule, the general rule should not still apply, because of the uncertainty as to what the defendant would do. Under the circumstances of this case we recommend that it be reversed and sent back for a new trial.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

WOFFENDEN v. BOARD SUP'RS PIMA

(Supreme Court of Arizona. Jan., 1875.)

COMPENSATION OF JURORS—MANDAMUS.

1. Jurors are entitled to full pay though excused from daily attendance.
2. Mandamus will issue to compel the commissioners to allow such claims.

Petition for writ of mandamus.

Hugh Farley, for petitioner. John Titus, for respondents.

TWEED, C. J. In the matter of the petition of Richard Woffenden for a writ of mandamus against the board of supervisors of Pima county, all the material facts set forth in the petition are admitted by the answer of the respondents. They are substantially as follows: At the October term of the district court held in and for the county of Pima for the year A. D. 1874, the chief justice ordered a venire to issue for the summoning of trial jurors for the term. Of those summoned and in attendance during the term certain jurors were excused from daily attendance for a portion of the term when their services as jurors were not required. The trial jurors were summoned to appear on the 16th day of November, and the jurors in whose behalf this petition is presented were in attendance upon the court as trial jurors from the 16th day of November until the 26th day of December, except when excused from daily attendance, as above stated. After the trial jurors were discharged for the term, the clerk of the court refusing to include in the certificates given to jurors, as to the time of attendance, "the days in which such jurors had been excused by the court from actual attendance," such jurors applied to the court to have said days included in said certificate, whereupon the court ordered that the clerk issue to said jurors separate certificates for the time during which such jurors had been excused from personal attendance. The clerk delivered to said jurors the certificates contemplated by said order of the court, and the same being presented to the board of supervisors as claims against the county, were disallowed. Certain of said jurors have assigned their claims for such services to the petitioner, who is now the owner and holder of the same.

The writ of mandamus will not be granted to control the action of any inferior court, board, or officer, where their acts are of a judicial character, or in which they are called upon to exercise discretion; but when their acts are ministerial only, and they fail or refuse to perform any act required by law, and the party injured has no other speedy and adequate remedy, such party is entitled to this writ. The admission by respondents that the jurors named in the exhibits accompanying the petition were summoned, were in attendance, and were excused by the court for certain days during the term, is conclusive of their right to the usual compensation, and of the regularity of the clerk's certificate, and leaves the board no discretion in the matter. Their duty was to audit the claims. We do not intend to say that the clerk's certificate would always be conclusive; he might purposely issue a false certificate, and in such a case the board might, as provided in sections 474-479 of the civil practice act, concerning mandamus, in their answer to the petition, raise the question of fact. The court would then order the question of fact to be settled by a jury, and, on the finding of a jury, the court would grant or deny the writ as justice might require, it being always remembered that the writ will not be granted where the party has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. But in this case the admission by respondents of the facts set up in the petition are equivalent to an admission that the clerk's certificate was properly issued, and left no discretion in the board to reject the claim. Let peremptory writ issue, as prayed for by petitioner.

APPEAL—TIME OF TAKING—DISMISSAL.

An appeal from an order dismissing an appeal from justice's court not perfected and entered within 30 days after judgment rendered, in accordance with Act Ariz. § 1, regulating appeals from justices of the peace, will be dismissed.

Appeal from district court, Pima county.
Morgan & Price, for appellants. Farley & Pomroy, for respondents.

FRENCH, C. J. This is an appeal from the order of the district court dismissing the appeal to that court from the justice's court, and also from the order of the district court denying defendants' motion to set aside said order of dismissal. It appears from the first page of transcript that the judgment was rendered in the justice's court on the 15th day of March, A. D. 1880; that an appeal was perfected, except payment of costs, on March 24, 1880, and that on that day the papers were ordered to be transmitted to the district court on the payment of the appeal costs of four dollars; that the papers were not transmitted to the district court, or there filed, until May 8th; and that the appeal costs then remained unpaid. Section 1 of act to regulate appeals from justices' courts reads as follows: "Any party dissatisfied with a judgment rendered in a justice's court may appeal therefrom to the district court held at the county in which such justice's court is situated. Such appeal shall be perfected, and the papers filed in the district court within thirty days after the rendition of the judgment in the justice's court; and, if the appeal is not perfected, and the papers are not filed in the district court, within such time, the district court shall, on the production of a certificate from the justice, to the effect that an appeal has been taken, but not perfected, or that the papers have not been ordered up, or the proper costs not paid, or any other necessary step not taken, dismiss the appeal at the costs of the appellants. In which case, a certificate of dismissal shall be transmitted under the seal of the district court to the justice's court, with a statement of the costs in the district court; and no other or further appeal shall be taken." Appeal is the creature of statute. Without statutory authority there is no appeal, or right of appeal. A party, therefore, invoking the statute must conform to its provisions, or lose his right of appeal. But this act (section 42) affirmatively provides that appeals from justices' courts shall be taken and determined only in the manner herein provided. It appears from the record, and also from the justice's certificate, that the papers in this cause were not filed in the district court until May 8th, more than 50 days from the time of the rendition of the judgment, (March 15th,) and that the appeal costs had not been paid. Under either of these circumstances,—failure to pay the appeal costs, or to file the papers in the district court within 30 days after judgment in justice's court,—the peremptory provision (section 1, above recited) is that the district court shall dismiss the appeal. Courts cannot disregard the direct and positive provisions of the statute. The appeal is utterly without merit, and the orders appealed from have therefore been affirmed, with damages.

2. The appeal being from the judgment, the statement of evidence on motion for new trial forms no part of the transcript, in the absence of stipulation that it shall stand as the statement on appeal.

Appeal from district court, Mohave county.

A. E. Davis, for appellant. Murphy & Blakely, for respondent.

DUNNE, C. J. This cause was commenced in a justice's court, and was a money demand for $250. Ralph obtained a judgment there for $150. Grounds appealed to the district court. Judgment was there given in favor of Ralph, for $62.50, and costs. Grounds appeals to this court from the judgment.

An appeal to this court does not lie in such a case. The appellate jurisdiction of this court is established by law, as follows, (Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 365:) "Sec. 3. The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases when the matter in dispute exceeds one hundred dollars, when the legality of any tax, toll, or impost, or municipal fine is in question, and in all criminal cases amounting to felony, on questions of law alone. Sec. 4. The supreme court shall have jurisdiction to review, upon appeal or other proceeding provided by law, (1) a judgment in an action or proceeding commenced in the district courts, when the matter in dispute exceeds two hundred dollars, or when the possession of land or tenements is in controversy, or brought into that court from another court, and to review, upon the appeal from such judgment, any intermediate order involving the merits, and necessarily affecting the judgment; (2) an order granting or refusing a new trial, sustaining or overruling a demurrer, or affecting a substantial right in an action or proceeding." As this case was not commenced in the district court, and is not one of those which could be heard here in any event, if the amount in dispute exceeded $100, the appeal must be dismissed.

Even if the appeal could be entertained, the judgment of the court below would be affirmed. Appellant asks us to set aside the judgment, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support it, but he has furnished us no evidence to examine. The transcript contains a statement of evidence which was used on the motion for new trial, but there is no statement on appeal, nor any stipulation that the statement used on motion for a new trial should stand as the statement on appeal. There is no appeal here from the order denying a new trial. The appeal is from the judgment only. In such case the only thing before the court is the "judgment roll," as defined by statute, and, no matter how many other papers the clerk may choose to embody in the transcript, this court cannot act upon anything but the judgment roll. The statute prescribes means by which this roll may be made full enough to cover every point made on the appeal, viz. by allowing a party to file a statement of points and evidence, even when the appeal is directly from the judgment. Then the party has also his motion for a new trial, and his appeal from an order denying it. In this case the party appealing has come up with a naked appeal from the judgment, and no statement whatever on appeal. In this case the judgment roll consists of an account filed in a justice's court, and a copy of the judgment in the district court, and nothing else. Comp. Laws, p. 417, § 205. It is not claimed by the appellant that there is any error in this part of the transcript; neither, on examination, do we find any. The appeal is dismissed, with costs.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—PREFERENCES.

Assignments giving preferences are valid as against creditors who do not proceed in the way provided by the bankruptcy law to set them aside.

John A. Rush, for appellant. G. H. Oury, for respondent.

DUNNE, C. J. One Strode, being on the 3d of June, 1873, insolvent, preferred certain of his creditors, the plaintiff, Ford, being of the number, and assigned to Ford for himself, in trust for the other preferred creditors, certain property in payment of his indebtedness to them, and possession of the property was delivered, and it is admitted that the assignment was for the purpose of paying bona fide existing debts. Certain other creditors of Strode sued, and Hayes, the defendant herein, as sheriff, attached the property held by Ford under the assignment, and sold the same upon execution, whereupon Ford sued the sheriff for the value of the property so taken from him, and got judgment therefor in the court below. Hayes, the sheriff, appeals.

Counsel for appellant claims that, under the existing bankrupt laws of the United States, an insolvent cannot prefer creditors. He cites Chancellor KENT, in Riggs v. Murray, 2 Johns. Ch. 565, to the effect that, "as we have no bankrupt laws, the right of the insolvent to select one creditor, and exclude another, is applied to every case, and the consequences of such partial payments are extensively felt and deeply deplored." Appellant herein states, what is undoubtedly the law, that, unless a bankrupt act makes such assignments void, they stand good, although they work a hardship on the creditors who are left out. We have the United States bankrupt law in force in this territory, which furnishes relief in such cases. But how? By declaring all such assignments void per se? By no means. The bankrupt law merely provides that any creditor who has been left out in the case of an insolvent debtor assigning his property may file his petition, cause the insolvent debtor to be declared a bankrupt, have all assignments which were made to a creditor within four months, or to any other person within six months, prior to the filing of the petition, set aside, bring the property into a common fund, and make an equal distribution of it; but, even when a creditor proceeds strictly under the bankrupt act, he cannot touch assignments to creditors made more than four months prior to the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings. In notes of decisions in Bump's Bankruptcy, p. 471, it is declared: "After the lapse of four months, the preferences—simple preferences which an insolvent debtor may have made—are to be held valid, as against all the world, so far as the preferred creditors are concerned." See the 12 cases therein cited. But the appellant is not proceeding under the bankrupt act, and its provisions therefore afford him no relief in this case. The law views such assignments with an unfriendly eye, and legislatures pass bankruptcy laws to enable a creditor to set them aside; but, unless he proceed regularly under the bankrupt law, they stand good. It is because they do stand good in law that bankrupt acts are necessary to enable a creditor to avoid them. Judgment affirmed, with costs.

TRANSCRIPT ON APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the transcript consists only of the complaint, answer, findings of fact, and conclusions of law, judgment, notice of appeal, and clerk's certificate, all regular on their face, the judgment cannot be disturbed, as the proceedings will be presumed regular.

FRENCH, C. J. The only papers contained in the transcript in this case are the following: The complaint, answer, findings of fact, and conclusions of law, the judgment, notice of appeal, and clerk's certificate. Nothing whatever is asked of the court in the brief of appellant. It simply discusses matters of law, none of which can by any possibility be raised on this record, and no relief or action of this court is asked for, or even suggested. There is no statement, no exceptions, none of the evidence, no specifications. The transcript contains only the six papers aforementioned, which are all regular on their face.

Error must be affirmatively shown. In the notice of appeal, certain averments are made. For example, it is there (in the notice of appeal) averred "that the court erred in finding of fact that there was no fraud on the part of defendant." There are many reasons why this proposition cannot be reviewed, or even considered, by the appellate court: (1) Because there is not a word of the evidence in the record. How, without any of the evidence, can the appellate court determine whether the finding is sustained by the evidence or not? (2) There was no exception or objection whatever taken to any of the findings in the court below. (3)

There was no motion for a new trial. The findings of the court below will not be reviewed on appeal unless there was a motion for a new trial. Gagliardo v. Hoberlin, 18 Cal. 395; Allen v. Fennon, 27 Cal. 69; People v. Banvard, Id. 475. No motion for new trial having been made, the findings are conclusive as to the facts. It is averred, secondly, in the notice of appeal, "that the court erred in its conclusions of law that the defendant was the rightful owner of said lots; that the court erred in decreeing the defendant in lawful possession, and that he is the legal owner, and entitled to the possession of said lots." These are general averments, made for the first time long after the trial, that the court erred. There are no specifications whatever. When, where, or wherein did the court err? Legal errors of the court should be pointed out. They should be excepted to in a legal manner, as the statute prescribes. Both the statute and practice require that the party alleging error shall specify and point out specifically the alleged error, wherein it occurred; put his finger, as the decisions express it, upon the precise error. It is never sufficient to allege error in a general manner. The same may be said of the fourth averment in the notice of appeal.

If the facts claimed in plaintiff's brief, as established by the pleadings, etc., were believed by plaintiff to be so established, she should have moved the court for a decree in plaintiff's favor, and excepted to the action of the court, if refused. So, all through the proceedings in the court below, if any ruling or action of the court was against the plaintiff's rights, an exception should have been taken. The same in regard to the findings and decree. If error was committed, the court below should have had at least an opportunity of correcting it; and, if not remedied, then upon proper exceptions and statement, or bill of exceptions, it might be corrected here.

The case is one purely in equity. In an equity case there is no right of trial by jury. The case was heard by the court without a jury, and the pleadings, findings, and decree are all regular upon their face, without any statement, bill of exceptions, or any evidence. They cannot be changed or disturbed by the appellate court. The appellate court will presume in favor of the judgment below, unless the record clearly shows error. Thompson v. Monrow, 2 Cal. 99; Kilburn v. Ritchie, Id. 146. The supreme court will not presume error, or that facts exist which would show error. If the court below commits error in its finding or judgment, that error, or the facts necessary to establish it, must be shown affirmatively by the appellant. Herriter v. Porter, 23 Cal. 385. All intendments must be in favor of sustaining the judgment of courts of original jurisdiction; and, to disturb such judgment, it is not sufficient that error may have intervened, but it must be affirmatively shown by the record. Nelson v. Lemmon, 10 Cal. 50. If the court makes a finding of facts, but does not include a finding upon one of the issues raised, and the judgment rendered is based upon that issue, the presumption will be that the court found upon that issue in such a way as to sustain the judgment. Sears v. Dixon, 33 Cal. 326. Every intendment is in favor of a judgment of a court of record; and, until the contrary be made clearly to appear, the appellate court is bound to suppose that it was based on proper evidence. Grewell v. Henderson, 7 Cal. 291. In the light of the foregoing authorities, and all authorities in equity practice and proceedings, and the practice of appellate courts, the record in this case is worthless for the purposes of an appeal, and utterly without merit, and the appeal is frivolous.

POWER OF MARRIED WOMAN TO CONTRACT—PLEADING.

1. Act Nov. 10, 1864, (How. Code Ariz. c. 32, § 1.) gives a married woman control of her separate property, and permits her to contract and convey as if unmarried. Amendatory Act Dec. 30, 1865, (Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 300, c. 32, § 6,) gives the husband control of the wife's separate estate and provides for his joinder and her privy examination. Second Amendatory Act Jan. 22, 1871, (Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 310,) gives to the wife, if 21 years old, exclusive control of her property, and declares that the husband need not join in conveyances. Held, that a married woman 21 years old could contract to convey her personal property without a privy examination.

2. It is not a ground of general demurrer to a complaint that it does not aver that defendant was 21 years of age.

J. P. Hargrave and J. A. Rusk, for appellants. A. E. Davis, for respondent.

TWEED, J. The appeal is from the district court, second judicial district, Mohave county. As appears by the complaint, the action was brought to enforce the performance of a verbal contract entered into by the defendant Jenny H. Fisher, a married woman, for the sale and delivery of certain personal property to the plaintiff, the same being her separate property, and claimed and held by her as such. A demurrer to the complaint was interposed, on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer, and, from the judgment thereon, the appeal is taken. The counsel for the respondent relies upon two points made in his brief, and argued at the hearing of the cause: (1) That the sale or alienation of the property mentioned in the complaint was not evidenced or accompanied by any instrument in writing, signed by the said Jenny H. Fisher, and by her acknowledged upon an examination, separate and apart from her husband, before a proper officer, and that the same was therefore void; (2) that it is nowhere alleged in the complaint that the said Jenny H. Fisher is of the age of 21 years.

Upon the points first made, the counsel cites section 6 of amendments to chapter 32, p. 306, Comp. Laws, approved December, 1865, and insists that the act relating to the separate property of married women, approved January 22, 1871, (Comp. Laws, p. 310,) modifies the section cited to the extent only that the wife need not be joined with her husband in a sale or alienation of her separate property, but that such sale or alienation must be made or accompanied by some written instrument signed by her, and by her acknowledged upon an examination separate and apart from her husband, etc. It is pertinent, in considering this point, to refer to the provisions of the law upon the subject prior to the passage of the act 1865, hereinbefore referred to. The first section of chapter 32, How. Code, approved November 10, 1864, and passed at the first session of the legislature of the territory, reads as follows: "The real and personal property of every female acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal, to which she may afterwards become entitled, by gift, grant, inheritance, devise, or in any other manner, shall be and remain the estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for the debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband, and may be contracted, sold, transferred, mortgaged, conveyed, devised, or bequeathed by her, in the same manner and with the like effect as if she were unmarried." The chapter was amended by the act of December 30, 1865, hereinbefore referred to, the sixth section of which reads as follows: "The husband shall have the management and control of the separate property of the wife during the continuance of the marriage, but no sale or other alienation of any part of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by instrument in writing, signed by husband and wife, and acknowledged by her upon an examination separate and apart from her husband before a justice of the supreme court, probate judge, or notary public; or, if executed out of the territory, then acknowledged by some judge of a court of record, or before a commissioner appointed under the authority of this territory to take acknowledgments of deeds." The act of January, 1871, reads as follows: "Married women of the age of twenty-one years and upwards shall have the sole and exclusive control of their separate property, and may convey and transfer lands, or any estate or interest therein vested, in or held by them in their own right, and without being joined by the husband in such conveyance, as fully and perfectly as they might do if unmarried." It will be seen that the act of 1864, the first legislation upon this subject had in the territory, placed the wife upon precisely the same footing with unmarried women as to any contract, sale, transfer, or mortgage of her separate property. The husband had no legal interest in such property, nor need he in any manner be consulted as to its disposition. She was competent to make contracts concerning it by parol or in writing, in the same manner as any other person might do as to his or her separate property. Then, in 1865, the law was changed, and the entire control of the property was given to the husband, guarded, however, by requiring proof of the wife's consent to any alienation, and herein arose the necessity for the provision as to an examination and acknowledgment separate and apart from her husband. We have examined these several statutory provisions with care, and we cannot adopt the construction which the counsel for the respondent applies to the act of 1871. On the contrary, we think it clear that that act was intended wholly to exempt married women of the age of 21 years and upwards from the operation of section 6 in the act of 1865 and to place them precisely where they stood in regard to their separate property, under the law of 1864, leaving said section in full force as to married women under that age, who might well be supposed to need the security from imposition provided by the act of 1865, more than persons of more mature age.

The second point made by the respondents is not well taken. It does not appear from the complaint that the defendant Jenny H. Fisher was under the age of 21 years. If such was the fact, it might have been pleaded as matter of defense, but the failure to aver in the complaint that she was of the age of 21 years is not ground for a general demurrer. Judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, and it is so ordered.

(1 Ariz. 243)

MARRIED WOMEN—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEED—EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. Act Ariz. 1871, allowing a married woman to control and convey her separate property "as fully and perfectly as she might do if unmarried," and repealing all inconsistent acts, repealed the requirement of Acts 1865, § 6, of a separate acknowledgment apart from the husband. Following Miller v. Fisher, 1 Ariz. 232, ante 651.

2. Act Ariz. 1871, giving a married woman exclusive control of her separate property, repeals the provision of Act 1865, § 9, that rents and profits of separate property shall be common property, and under control of the husband, and she may acquire separate property by purchase with such rents, though Act 1865, § 2, recognizes its acquisition only by "gift, bequest, devise, or descent."

3. Evidence that on one occasion the husband disclaimed any interest in the land, and that, while the wife was negotiating its sale as her separate property, he was present and made no objection, is admissible in ejectment by her grantees to recover possession from her husband, as tending to show that the land was hers, and therefore capable of conveyance by her separate deed, and to rebut any presumption that it was common property, arising from the fact that it was acquired for a moneyed consideration during coverture.

DUNNE, C. J., dissenting.

TWEED, J. This action was ejectment for three quarter sections of land being in Pima county, and contiguous to other lands described in the complaint by their legal subdivisions, and as being generally known as the "Robledo," "Moreno," and "Duran" ranches. In this complaint, the plaintiff alleges that he was seised in fee of the premises on the 11th day of February, 1874, and while so seised, to-wit, on the 5th day of July, 1875, he was ousted by the defendant. The answer denies that the plaintiff was ever seised of the premises, or was ever entitled to the possession of the same, or any part thereof; denies that the defendant entered into the possession of the premises while the plaintiff was so seised as alleged in the complaint; and denies that he unlawfully withheld, or at any other time has withheld, the possession of the premises from the plaintiff; alleges seisin in himself of one quarter section of the lands on the 1st of October, 1873, by virtue of a deed of bargain and sale, for the consideration of $500, from Abram Moreno and his wife, Mariana Moreno, to Anna C. Woffenden, the wife of the defendant, bearing the date above mentioned; and alleges seisin of the other two quarter sections on the 10th day of December, 1873, by deed of bargain and sale of that date, for the consideration of $2,100, from Ygnacio Robledo and Romula Robledo, his wife, to the said wife of the defendant; alleges that the said Anna C. Woffenden was, on the 1st of October, 1873, and on the 10th day of December, 1873, and still was at the date of the answer, the wife of the defendant. On the trial, the plaintiff offered in evidence a deed for the premises from Anna C. Woffenden to the plaintiff, made February 11, 1875, for the consideration of $5,000. Defendant's counsel objected to the admission of the deed on three grounds: (1) That the acknowledgment was defective, having been taken before a justice of the peace, not a proper officer; (2) that it did not contain the declaration required by the statute as to the person signing the same having been examined separate and apart from, and without the hearing of, her husband, etc.; (3) that it had not been shown that Anna C. Woffenden had power to convey the premises; that it had been admitted in open court, by plaintiff's counsel, that from August, 1872, the said Anna C. Woffenden had been and then was the wife of the defendant; and that no showing had been made or offered that the premises were her separate property. Those objections were collectively sustained by the court, and the plaintiff excepted to the ruling.

Assuming for the present that the premises in controversy were the separate property of the grantor, and passing for the present also the question whether any acknowledgment on the part of the grantor of the deed was necessary to entitle it to be received in evidence in the case between the parties, was the acknowledgment defective in having been taken before a justice of the peace, or in that it was not made upon an examination separate and apart from, and without the hearing of, her husband? In Miller v. Fisher,

1 Ariz. 232, ante, 651, (decided at the last term of this court, on a hearing had before a full bench,) it was held, without dissent on the part of either member of the court, that, under the act of 1871, it was not necessary that a contract by a married woman of the age of 21 years and upwards, as to her separate property, should be evidenced by a writing signed by her, and acknowledged by her upon an examination separate and apart from her husband, etc. We are now asked to reconsider the ruling, and adopt the theory that the act of 1871 operated to change the law in this regard to this extent only: that the wife may convey without being joined with the husband in the conveyance, but must still acknowledge the execution of the instrument separate and apart, etc., as required by the act of 1865. One year has passed since the decision in Miller v. Fisher was made and published, and important rights have doubtless grown up and vested under the construction which we then gave to the statutes in question. In such a case, the reasons for overruling a former decision should be very clear and conclusive. Besides this, unless it very clearly appears that the former ruling was erroneous, the court may properly consider whether the construction given to the statute by its former decision on the ruling it is now urged to make is most beneficial to the parties whose rights are to be controlled thereby. Conceding, then, for the present, that there may be reasonable doubts as to the former ruling, does the construction thus given to the statute deprive the wife of any substantial rights, or in any manner make such rights less secure? Does it deprive her of any safeguard in the control or disposition of her separate property, or make less simple or safe the rules for its disposal? In other words, is or was the provision in our statutes requiring this acknowledgment of a contract or conveyance by the wife on an examination separate and apart from her husband, etc., of any practical use whatever? Of course there can be no doubt that, under the act of 1871, the wife may convey her separate property by her deed, without being joined by her husband. This she may do without any consultation with, or consent from, him. To what end, then, having executed a deed for her separate property, should she be required to go before a notary or other officer and make this acknowledgment upon an examination separate and apart from her husband, etc.? If she desires to convey her property, she may do so without his knowledge. If the husband has coerced or overpersuaded her into the execution of the conveyance, and she has been submissive to his will, is she likely to assert her own wishes and make the acknowledgment when in the presence of a notary? If this "safeguard," so called, for the wife's interest was ever, under any law for the conveyance of her separate property, of any practical value, (which we very much doubt,) there can be no doubt that, under a law allowing the wife to convey without being joined with her husband, and without his consent or even knowledge, such a provision is a vain thing, a needless, useless requirement,

But the statute, in Howell's Code of Conveyance, (Comp. Laws, pp. 362, 363, § 22,) which it is insisted should be taken in connection with the act of 1865, provides "that upon this examination, separate and apart from the husband," etc., "the wife shall be made acquainted with the contents of the conveyance," etc.; and it was gravely and earnestly urged by counsel for respondent that this was an important safeguard to the wife, the presumption of law being that the wife would not know the character of the instrument until so informed by the officer taking the acknowledgment; and it is not without some regret that we admit that there were American authorities cited sustaining the counsel in his position. What is the basis of such a presumption? It must be found, if anywhere, in the supposed ignorance or stupidity of the wife. Before her marriage, if of the age of 21 years, and after her husband's death, the law presumes her competent to buy and sell and convey property, and supposes she acts in such matters as intelligently as if she were of the opposite sex; but, during the existence of the marriage relation, somehow this condition of ignorance and stupidity is supposed to settle down upon her, to benumb her faculties, to cast a cloud upon her intelligence, to be lifted only by the death of her spouse, or other severance of the marriage bond. We are quite sure that the presumption contended for by the counsel for the respondent, that a woman of mature years, and an American wife ceases from the day of her marriage to know what she is doing in the execution of a conveyance until advised of the contents of the instrument by a notary or other officer, obtains nowhere else than in a court of justice, and should no longer obtain there; and we are equally certain that the legislature of Arizona, in enacting the law of 1871, which gives to the wife the sole and exclusive control of her separate property, enabling her to convey the same without being joined by her husband, "as fully and perfectly as if unmarried," did not intend that any such presumption of the wife's ignorance or stupidity should obtain hereafter.

Again, as to the utility of the provision for this acknowledgment of the wife upon an examination separate and apart, etc. It is somewhat remarkable, considering the learning and research which have been bestowed upon the matter, that not a case has been reported, so far as we can discover, wherein it appears that this "safeguard," so-called, even in a single instance, operated to protect the interest of the wife, or to save her from coercion or imposition. We do not remember the citation of such a case, nor have we in our own experience, nor in our association with the legal profession, known or heard of any case where the provision ever operated as a safeguard to the wife in any respect whatever. Again, while we deem the provision referred to to be valueless to the wife as a safeguard against the coercion of the husband and impositions from others, the provision is not simply harmless, but has been the occasion of frequent fraud and wrong, for it has often happened that when a wife has joined her husband in a conveyance under laws requiring her to do so, and her acknowledgment has been made to the officer separate and apart as fully and completely in all respects as required by law, and the officer purposely or ignorantly has failed to write the certificate of acknowledgment in the exact form required, the wife, being controlled by the husband, has refused to aid in the correction of the error, and the purchaser is left without a remedy. It is very safe to say that greater frauds and more injustice have resulted from the requirement of this form of acknowledgment on the part of the wife than would belikely to obtain when the wife's acknowledgment may be taken as in other cases. Again, the provision, if valueless to the wife, is not harmless. It treats the wife as an inferior person, especially liable to coercion and imposition, and as being incapable of caring for and guarding her own interests as other sane persons are capable of doing. If our statutes of 1864 and 1865, which counsel for respondent insists are still in force, are so, and not repealed by the act of 1871, the woman who married yesterday, and was possessed of a fortune acquired by her own learning, labor, or skill, cannot to-day make a valid sale of a dilapidated sewing-machine without putting the contract in writing, and going before a justice of the supreme court or other officer and acknowledging, upon an examination separate and apart from her husband, upon being made acquainted with the contents of the instrument, (which she may have written herself,) that she executed the same freely and voluntarily, etc.

We will now examine the several acts of our legislature bearing upon the question under consideration, and in the light of these enactments revise the decision in the case of Miller v. Fisher; for, if that decision was erroneous, if it clearly appears that the law was not what it was declared to be in that case, the construction we then gave to the statute must be overruled, however beneficial that construction may appear to be to those whose rights and interests are involved in the question. Section 1, c. 32, "Of the Rights of Married Women," Howell's Code, reads as follows: "The real and personal estate of every female acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal, to which she may afterwards become entitled by gift, grant, inheritance, devise, or in any other manner, shall be and remain the estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for the debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband, and may be contracted, sold, transferred, mortgaged, conveyed, devised, or bequeathed by her in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried." Section 2, c. 42, Howell's Code, "Of Conveyances," reads as follows: "A husband and wife may, by their joint deed, convey the real estate of the wife in like manner as she might do by her separate deed, if she were unmarried." Section 19, same chapter, reads as follows: "A married woman may convey any of her real estate, by any conveyance thereof executed and acknowledged by herself and her husband, and certified in the manner hereinafter provided, by the proper officer taking the acknowledgment." Section 21, same chapter, reads as follows: "Any officer authorized by this chapter to take the proof or acknowledgment of any conveyance whereby any real estate is conveyed, or may be affected, may take and certify the acknowledgment of a married woman to any such conveyance of real estate." Section 22, same chapter, reads as follows: "No such acknowledgment shall be taken unless such married woman shall be personally known to the officer taking the same to the person whose name is subscribed to every conveyance as a party thereto, or shall be proved to be such by a credible witness; nor unless such married woman shall be made acquainted with the contents of such conveyance, and shall acknowledge, on an examination apart from, and without the hearing of, her husband, that she executed the same freely and voluntarily, without fear or compulsion or undue influence of her husband, and that she does not wish to retract the execution of the same." The next section prescribes merely the form of the certificate of acknowledgment, and need not be quoted. The same chapter designates the officers who may take acknowledgments of deeds in the territory, among whom are notaries public and justices of the peace of the proper county.

In the case of Miller v. Fisher the court overlooked the provisions in the statutes of conveyances contained in the Howell Code and quoted above; and, regarding the first section, "Of the Rights of Married Women," Howell's Code, as controlling upon the questions as to what the law was upon the subject in 1864, held that it was the intention of the legislature by the act of 1871 to reinstate married women of the age of 21 years and upwards as to their rights to their separate property to the same status in which they stood, as was supposed by the court, under the provisions referred to in the act of 1864, "Of the Rights of Married Women." An attempt was made by the counsel for the respondent to reconcile this section with the several sections of the chapter on conveyances, above quoted, but to us the provisions of those two chapters seem irreconcilable. The first section quoted authorizes the wife "to contract, sell, transfer, mortgage, convey, devise, or bequeath her separate property in the same manner and with the like effect as if she were unmarried." Her conveyance, as soon as made, would become effectual. The delivering of the deed by her would divest her of all interest in the property without any acknowledgment whatever; whereas, under the section referred to in the chapter on conveyances of the year 1864, the wife's deed of her separate property would be a nullity until acknowledged as in that statute provided. Standing alone, and uncontrolled by other provisions, there can be no doubt that, under the first section of the act of 1864, a married woman, without being joined by her husband, could convey her separate property in the same manner and without other observances as to forms or acknowledgment than would be required if she were unmarried, and it was so considered by the court in deciding the case of Miller v. Fisher; for, as has been already stated, in passing upon that case, the court only looked to this section as controlling the law upon this subject under the original Howell Code, overlooking the provisions touching the matter in the chapter on conveyances. But, giving effect to the provisions in the last-named chapter, the husband must join in the conveyance, and the manner and form of the conveyance is clogged by the condition of the wife's acknowledgment separate and apart before the deed can become effectual for any purpose whatever. The Howell Code was prepared in great haste, immediately after the organization of the territory, and acted upon at the first session of our legislature, and there was little time for careful consideration of the provisions of the statutes of other states which were incorporated into the Code, and it is not derogating from the just praise to which its author and the legislature are fairly entitled to say there was much that was incongruous and unsystematized in its provisions. We have quoted the statutes bearing upon the subject of the wife's acknowledgment as they stood at the adjournment of the session of the legislature of 1864. In 1865 an act was passed, the first section of which reads as follows: "All property, both real and personal, of the wife owned by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property; and all property, both real and personal, owned by the husband before marriage, and that acquired by him afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be his separate property." The second section of the same act provides "that all property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, except such as may be acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be common property." The third, fourth, and fifth sections of the same act provide for inventory and registration of the separate property of the wife; and the sixth section, from the operation of which, in Miller v. Fisher, we held married women of the age of 21 years and upwards exempt as to this acknowledgment, by force of this act of 1871, reads as follows: "The husband shall have the management and control of the separate property of the wife during the continuance of the marriage, but no sale or alienation of any part of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by an instrument in writing, signed by the husband and wife, and acknowledged by her upon an examination, separate and apart from her husband, before a justice of the supreme court, probate judge, or notary public, or, if executed out of the territory, then acknowledged before some judge of a court of record, or before a commissioner appointed under the authority of this territory to take acknowledgment of deeds." It will be observed that this section does not provide that the wife shall be "made acquainted with the contents of the instrument"

she is executing, nor that she shall acknowledge upon an examination, separate and apart, that she executed the same "freely and voluntarily, without fear or compulsion or undue influence of her husband, and that she does not wish to retract the execution of the same," as provided in the act of 1864, on conveyances; but the observance of these requirements of the last-mentioned act was probably contemplated by section 6 of the act of 1865, now under consideration.

We have set out the several enactments bearing upon the question we are considering up to the time of the passage of the act of 1871. That act is in these words: "Section 1. Married women of the age of twenty-one years and upwards shall have the sole and exclusive control of their separate property, and may convey and transfer lands or any estate or interest therein, vested in or held by them in their own right, and without being joined by the husband in conveyance, as fully and perfectly as they might do if unmarried. Sec. 2. All acts, and parts of acts, so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed." It was under this act, with its repealing clause, that this court held, in the case of Miller v. Fisher, the provisions of the sixth section of the act of 1865, and all former provisions upon the subject under consideration, inoperative as to married women of the age of 21 years and upwards. It is true that in that case the question before the court was as to the right of a married woman to make a conveyance of her separate personal property without a writing so acknowledged, etc.; but this section referred to in the act of 1865 includes "all the separate property of the wife," and provides that no sale or other alienation of any part of such property shall be made, except by such writing, so acknowledged, etc. Upon the argument in that case, and we think in the brief of the counsel for the respondent therein, the attention of the court was called to some of the leading authorities cited by the counsel for the respondent in this, and the same positions insisted upon which are now urged, that the act of 1871 only operated to repeal the provisions of section 6 of the act of 1865 so far as it required that the wife should be joined by her husband in the conveyance, etc., and yet the court were unanimously of the opinion that the provisions in that section touching the acknowledgment of married women of the age of 21 years and upwards were swept away by the act of 1871. And, as the court then held, the majority of the court now hold that, by the act of 1871, the legislature, in providing that a married woman's separate property should no longer be left to the management of her husband, but should be under her own sole and exclusive control, and that she might convey and transfer the same as fully and perfectly as if unmarried, intended in all respects to place the wife of the age of 21 years in precisely the same attitude, as to the conveyance of her property, as if she were a feme sole; that she should no longer be hampered with conditions and provisions in the transfer and conveyance of her separate property which are not imposed upon unmarried women. Among all the rules for the construction of statutes, so liberally quoted by the respondent's counsel, no one is more likely to lead to a true interpretation of the intention of the legislature in an enactment than that of giving to its language and scope the meaning it would convey to the common mind. It was upon such a reading of this act of 1871 that this court held that the acknowledgment separate and apart, etc., by the wife, as to her separate property, was no longer necessary to her conveyance thereof. The act was certainly calculated to mislead those acting under it, if it is to be construed as requiring any other act, or the observance of any other formula, on the part of a married woman than is required of an unmarried one. We think it clear that the legislature intended by the act just what any person of ordinary intelligence would understand by it, and would receive and adopt as its obvious meaning; and we have no doubt that the common understanding of intelligent persons as to the meaning of the act would be in precise accordance with the construction we gave to it in Miller v. Fisher.

Again, had the act been intended in this regard only to relieve married women from being joined in a conveyance of their separate property by their husbands, and not to extend further, it seems to us the legislature would have used other terms than those with which the section concludes, and would have said, "as fully and perfectly as if so joined," rather than the terms, "as fully and perfectly as they might do if unmarried." Certainly such a wording of the statute would make the construction given to it by the counsel for the respondent much more plausible than the terms therein used, but the counsel for the respondent insists that the requirement as to the acknowledgment contained in section 6 of the act of 1865 does not operate as a hindrance or obstruction to the perfect freedom of the wife in conveying her property; that the requirement has to do with the "mode" only, and that not in such a way as to prevent her from conveying as fully and perfectly as if unmarried. Is this so? Unnecessary machinery impedes, and is an obstruction in, the prosecution of any work, and every useless formula, the observance of which is required in the transaction of affairs, is a limitation upon the freedom exercised in the performance of the act, and that the requirements of this section of this acknowledgment does not leave the wife to convey as fully and perfectly as if she were unmarried seems to us very clear. In fact, the wife cannot convey perfectly where such an acknowledgment is required. Without the certificate of the officer she cannot convey at all. "No sale or other alienation of any part of such property can be made," etc., without this writing and acknowledgment, is the language of the act of 1865. That of 1871 is that she may convey as fully and perfectly as if unmarried. To illustrate: Jane, a married woman, and Sarah, unmarried, each own a lot in Tucson. They both sell to a purchaser, who waits upon them while they write the deed. Each writes the deed for the lot she intends to convey. Each signs and seals her deed, and in the same manner, and each delivers her deed to the purchaser and demands the contract price for the property. The purchaser hands the price of the property to Sarah, but says to Jane: "This is not your deed, nor can it become so until you go before a notary or other officer, get him to inform you of the contents of the deed you have just written, make an acknowledgment on an examination separate and apart from your husband, etc.; and then, if the certificate of the officer is in proper form, your conveyance will be complete, and you will be entitled to the purchase money." Each has executed and delivered her deed in the same manner, and the act of 1871 provides that the married woman may by herself, without being joined by her husband, convey as fully and perfectly as if unmarried; and yet, while the deed from Sarah has passed the title to the purchaser, that from Jane is wholly without effect until she and an officer have done something not necessary to be done to give effect to Sarah's deed.

Again, the bad uses to which the cumbersome machinery of this requirement is put, could hardly be more apparent than in the case before us, where the husband seeks to defeat the wife's deed—a deed which it is very clear he would never have moved her to make, and one made wholly against his wishes—by setting up that she has not, by any acknowledgment made upon an examination separate and apart from himself, shown that he himself has not coerced or even persuaded her to execute it. We conclude this branch of the case by adhering to the ruling made in Miller v. Fisher, believing the act of 1871 is and was intended by the legislature to be a complete enfranchisement of the wife in the control or conveyance of her separate property from every badge of infirmity or serfdom, and relieving her from all humiliating conditions in regard thereto not imposed upon other persons. This acknowledgment, then, separate and apart, etc., not being regarded in the conveyance of the separate property of the wife, it follows that no acknowledgment of the deed was necessary to entitle it to be received in evidence in this case, (the defendant not being a purchaser,) if it sufficiently appeared that the property intended to be conveyed was the separate property of Anna C. Woffenden.

What constitutes, then, the separate property of the wife, under the act of 1871, taking into consideration the act of 1865? The act of 1865, already quoted, so far as it affects this question, provides that "all property, real and personal, of the wife, owned by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property." The same act provides that the husband shall have the management of the wife's separate property, and that the rents and profits of the separate estate of either husband or wife shall be common property, and that the husband shall have the entire management and control of the common property, with absolute power to dispose of the same as of his own separate estate. The act of 1871 gives the sole and exclusive control of her separate estate to her if she be of the age of 21 years, with the right of disposing of the same free from any influence of and without the consent of her husband. This sole and exclusive right of control by the wife of her separate property is wholly inconsistent with the rights of the husband to the rents and profits. Of what value to the wife would be the right to control and convey if, upon the lease or conveyance, the rent, on one hand, and the purchase money, upon the other, became at once community funds, under the absolute control of the husband? By the fourteenth section of article 11 of the constitution of California it is provided that "all property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned or claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property." By an act of the legislature of that state regulating the relation of husband and wife it was enacted: "The husband shall have the entire management and control of all the common property, with the like absolute powers of disposition as of his own separate estate, and the rents and profits of the separate estate of either husband or wife shall be deemed common property," etc. Upon a question as to the constitutionality of this enactment, raised in the case of George v. Ransom, 15 Cal. 322, the court uses the following language: "We think the legislature has not the constitutional power to say that the fruits of the property of the wife shall be taken from her and given to the husband or his creditors. If the constitutional provision be not a protection to the wife against the exercise of this authority, the anomaly would seem to exist of the right of the property in one, divested of all beneficial use,—the barren right to hold in the wife, and the beneficial right to enjoy in the husband. One object of the provision was to protect the wife against the improvidence of the husband, but this object would wholly fail in many instances if the estate of the wife were reduced to a mere reversionary interest, to be of no avail to her except in contingency of her surviving her husband." The court further says: "The common law recognized no such soleism as a right in the wife to the estate, and a right in some one else to use it as he pleased, and to enjoy all the advantages of its use. It is not perceived that property can be in one, in full and separate ownership, with a right in another to control it and enjoy all of its benefits. The sole value of property is in its use. To dissociate the right of property from the use in this class of cases would be to preserve the name, the mere shadow, and destroy the thing itself, the substance. It would be to make the wife the trustee for the husband, holding the legal title, while he held the fruits of that title. This could no more be done, in consistency with our ideas of property, during the life-time of the wife than for all time."

The act of 1865, as has been seen, which prescribes what property shall be the separate property of the wife, contains also the antagonistic provision that the husband shall have the management thereof, and of the rents and profits of the same. The act of 1871 repeals these antagonistic provisions by giving to the wife the sole and exclusive control of her separate property, which carries with it the right to use and invest the fruits thereof. Under the law of 1865, whatever of fortune belonged to the wife at her marriage, or came to her in any manner afterwards, either as the fruits of her separate property or otherwise, was taken wholly from her use and control, and given to the sole management of the husband. She might have been possessed, before her marriage, of ample means to supply her wants, and gratify her tastes, free from the control of any one, but on the day of her marriage, and by the act of marriage, she is divested of the right to use one dollar's worth of this property as her own. It makes no difference what the kind and character of the property may be. If she had a carriage, it is no longer her own; she may not even use it except by leave of her husband. If she have money, the husband may demand and take possession of it, doling it out to her, if at all, in such pittance as to make her keenly sensible of her condition of serfdom. This was the law of 1865, and these the conditions to which every woman in Arizona had to submit in contracting marriage under it. We are advised by recent decisions of the United States courts of the effect to the decree of confiscation of the property of those recently in rebellion against the government, and understand the effect of such a decree of confiscation to be wholly to deprive the offender of all right to use and control, or in any manner interfere with, the property confiscated in his lifetime, though at his death it may pass to his heirs. Under the act of 1865, as it stood before the enactment of 1871, the wife possessed of a fortune on the day of her marriage, by entering into this relation, lost as wholly and completely all right to the use and enjoyment of her separate property as if the same had been confiscated for rebellion against the government. The decree of confiscation, in the one case, and bride's marriage certificate, in the other, would operate alike, and take from rebel and matron, with admirable completeness and impartiality, all right to use, appropriate, and enjoy the least even of the treasures owned and held by them when either entered into matrimony, on the one hand, or committed an act of rebellion, on the other. It seems to us the penalty, so to speak, imposed by the law of 1865 upon women for entering into the marriage relation was unnecessarily severe. It was to get rid of these obnoxious provisions that the act of 1871 was passed. The law as it stood before that act was passed, instead of fostering and encouraging marriages, was framed as if for the very purpose of preventing women possessed of property from entering upon this relation. The more enlightened legislation of 1871 says to every woman contracting marriage in our territory: "You shall have the sole and exclusive use and control of your separate property, and may bestow, convey, and transfer the same when and how you will, as fully and perfectly as if unmarried." We think the act of 1871 adds to the methods by which the wife may obtain separate property that, instead of being confined to several methods of gifts, bequests, devises, and descent, she may add to her separate property by purchase; that she may use the rents and profits of her separate property by investing them in the purchase of other property, lands, or personal property; and that such property, when so purchased, is not "acquired," in the sense in which that word is used in the first section of the act of 1865. We conclude, then, that the wife of the age of 21 years, in addition to the property owned by her at her marriage, and in addition to that afterwards acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, may acquire property, real or personal, by purchase, if the purchase money be of the separate funds of the wife; and that the rents and profits of her separate property are her separate funds. In another case now before us we may consider this matter more fully. Post, 662. The fact, then, that the property intended to be conveyed by the deed offered in evidence was granted to Anna C. Woffenden for a moneyed consideration is not conclusive that the property was common property; for, if the moneyed consideration was of her own separate funds, had and owned by her before marriage, or received by way of rents and profits from her separate property after marriage, the property was her separate property, and under her sole and exclusive control.

We pass the question as to the presumption that all property conveyed to the wife for a moneyed consideration is common property, as necessarily involved in this case, if it appears, as we think it does, from the transcript, that evidence was offered and ruled out which would go strongly to support the theory that the property was the separate property of Anna C. Woffenden at the time of the conveyance by her to the plaintiff and appellant herein; for, admitting the legal presumption to be as above stated, such presumption may be rebutted and overcome by proof that the property was purchased with the separate funds of the wife.

It is, however, insisted by counsel for the respondent that no evidence was offered by the plaintiff showing or tending to show that the property in controversy was the separate property of Anna C. Woffenden. Passing the question as to the order in which this proof should have been offered, was such evidence offered at all? On the examination of the witness Charauleau, the witness was asked: "To whom was the sale of the ranches communicated when the same was being made?" The statement goes on and reads: "The offer upon the question was to prove that, when the sale was made by Anna C. Woffenden to the plaintiff of the ranches in contest, the defendant was informed of it by her in presence of the plaintiff; that he did not then question Mrs. Woffenden's ownership, nor her right to dispose of the property in question, but allowed the contract to proceed, and the consideration of five thousand dollars to be paid, without any question or objection." The court ruled that there was no deed in evidence, and inquired of the plaintiff's counsel what he meant by "sale." Counsel answered "that he meant a contract for the conveyance of the property in controversy, to be consummated, as it afterwards was, by deed." We understand from the transcript, as above quoted, that, upon putting the question to the witness, the plaintiff's counsel offered to prove by the witness the matters set out in substance; that, while negotiations were in progress between Mrs. Woffenden and Charauleau for the sale of the ranches, the defendant was present; that she was treating the ranches as her separate property, and the defendant in no manner questioned her right so to do, but permitted the negotiation to go on, and the plaintiff herein to pay the purchase money, etc. As we understand from the transcript, the court not only sustained the objection made by the defendant's counsel to the question put as leading, but also ruled the evidence offered should be excluded; that is, the court would not permit the plaintiff to prove by the witness the matter he offered to prove, had there been no objection to the form of the question. We have no doubt that in this the court erred. The offer was not by oral testimony to establish and prove a contract for the conveyance of lands; it was to show that the property being negotiated was the wife's separate property, as evidenced by the conduct of her husband while she was negotiating the sale thereof, and treating it as her own. Giving full force to the legal presumption contended for by the counsel for the respondent that the property was common property, it might still be shown to be the wife's separate property; for, though obtained by her by grant for a moneyed consideration, if this moneyed consideration was of her separate funds, the property would be her separate property. Now, when she was so negotiating a sale of this property, bargaining it for a price with the view of conveying it, would not the fact that the husband was present, and made no objection to the negotiation, nor in any manner questioned her right to the property as her separate property, be evidence strongly tending to show that the property was her separate property, and obtained by her separate funds? The title of the property vested in her by virtue of the deeds from her grantors, if the purchase money was of her own funds; if not, then the property became common property. The evidence offered was to show that the defendant himself, being present, assented to her treating the property as her separate property, which, it is assumed, he would not have done had the property been purchased with his separate funds, or with the common fund.

Again, the plaintiff offered to prove by the witness Wise that the defendant, in 1874, "disclaimed in the witness' presence any interest in the ranches in controversy, and expressed his determination never to return to them." The deed from Abram Moreno and Mariana Moreno, his wife, and from Ygnacio Robledo and Romula Robledo, his wife, conveyed the title of the property to Anna C. Woffenden, to vest in her as her separate property if purchased by her separate funds; otherwise, to become common property. If it was common property, the defendant certainly had an interest in it. Was not his disclaimer of any interest in the property evidence tending to show that the property was the separate property of the wife? The husband has control of the common property, and, if these lands had been purchased with means from the common fund, would he not have known it, and would he have disclaimed any interest in them? Had the defendant paid for the property out of his own means, or out of the common funds, would he be likely to make such disclaimer? At any rate, such disclaimer was proper evidence to go to the jury, as tending to show that the property was the separate property of the wife. It would have been more regular for the plaintiff, when offering the deed from Anna C. Woffenden in evidence, to have offered in connection therewith the evidence above referred to. The deed and this evidence should then have gone to the jury, under instruction from the court to the effect that, if the evidence satisfied them that the property was purchased by the separate funds of the wife, it was her separate property, and that the deed was sufficient to convey the same. This evidence was a sufficient predicate for the introduction of the deed, and probably the deed would have been offered after this evidence was offered and ruled out, had not the court excluded the deed on the ground that the certificate of acknowledgment was defective. It is apparent that the court held that the deed, even with this evidence, could not properly be admitted to go to the jury. We think both should have been received under instructions as above indicated.

We have considered this case upon the hypothesis that it is the presumption of law that all property acquired by either spouse after marriage, otherwise than by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, is common property; but, while we have so considered the matter in this case, we would not be understood as adopting the correctness of this presumption, stated as broadly as it is in the authorities cited. The current of the authorities cited, principally from California Reports, is to the effect that all acquisitions by either spouse for a moneyed consideration, during the existence of the marriage, is presumptively common property. It seems to us that there are grave objections to the rule as stated in these authorities. A legal presumption should certainly accord with the probable fact. Common property, under our law, can only accumulate after marriage, and, if either spouse, who married yesterday, to-day purchases and pays for property of the value of $10,000, could the presumption arise that the property is common property? Would it not, on the other hand, appear certain that the property so purchased was not common property, that it must have been paid for by the separate funds of one or the other? And, under the authorities referred to, if so paid for by the separate funds of either spouse, it would become the separate property of such spouse. It appears to us that no presumption can arise like that referred to, applicable to all cases, as is assumed by the authorities referred to, but that the legal presumption as to ownership would vary with the different facts and circumstances surrounding each case. It follows from the conclusions at which we have arrived that the judgment of nonsuit herein must be set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, and it is so ordered.

PORTER, J., concurs.

DUNNE, C. J., (dissenting.) I dissent from the judgment. At the close of this term there was a change in the organization of the court,—a newly-appointed member of the court was daily expected to arrive. It was not known how soon he would come, nor how soon the opinions of the court could be prepared and filed. It was deemed advisable by the majority of the court to enter the judgments in the last few cases heard, and allow the opinions to be filed afterwards. As I am the judge who is retired, I am obliged to write my opinion without having before me the opinion of the majority of the court. I cannot, therefore, say how far I dissent from the opinion of the court; and, not knowing on what reason the majority of the court will ground their decision, I must, at the risk of being prolix, review all the grounds of error assigned, and express my opinion on each one separately.

I will first notice the preliminary objection made by respondent as to the lack of authentication of the statement. Rule 12 of this court reads as follows: "Exceptions to the transcript, statement, the bond or undertaking on appeal, or to the notice of appeal, or to its service or proof of service, or any technical objection to the record affecting the rights of the appellant to be heard on the points of error assigned, must be taken at the first term after the transcript is filed, and must be noted in writing and filed at least one day before the argument, or they will not be regarded. In such case the objection must be presented to the court before the argument on the merits." This case was set for argument for January—. On that day court opened, but, without calling any case, or in any way considering this or any other case, adjourned of its own motion until January—. On January—, court opened, pursuant to adjournment, and called this case for argument. Respondent, before proceeding to this argument on the merits, produced a preliminary objection to the transcript, noted in writing, filed the day before the argument, and showed proof of service of same on counsel for appellant the day before the argument. Counsel for appellant opposed the hearing of the motion, arguing that it ought to have been noted the day before the day set for the argument of the case, and not the day before the actual argument; and the majority of the court refused to hear the preliminary objection of respondent, on the ground that it had not been noted in time, to which ruling I dissented. Believing, therefore, that the objection ought to have been heard, I will consider it. The objection was that the statement in the transcript was not properly authenticated, and should therefore not be regarded by the court. The provisions concerning authentication of statements are settled by our statute, (Comp. Laws, p. 437, § 343,) as follows: "The statement, when settled by the judge, shall be signed by him, with the certificate that the same has been allowed and is correct. When the statement is agreed upon by the parties, they or their attorneys shall sign the same, with their certificate that it has been agreed upon by them, and is correct. In either case, when settled and agreed upon, it shall be filed with the clerk." In this it appears that the signature alone of the judge or the attorneys is not sufficient, but there shall also be a certificate that the statement is allowed or "has been agreed upon by them, and is correct." The whole case in the appellate court often turns upon the facts set up in the statement. It is, in such instance, upon those facts that the whole action of the court is based. The statute explicitly provides that there shall be clear and express proof of the truth of the statement. The mere signature of the judge to the statement is not sufficient. He must formally certify that he has allowed the statement, and that it is correct. So the mere signature of the attorneys is not sufficient. There must also be a certificate stating that they have agreed to the statement, and that it is correct. In this case there is no such certificate, nor any attempt at any certificate whatever. At the foot of the statement appear the names of the attorneys, nothing more. They certify to nothing. If the statute said merely that the statement should be attested by the judge, the parties, or their attorneys, a mere signature would doubtless be sufficient; but, where the statute expressly states that there shall be a certificate, and declares what that certificate shall state, I do not think that it is a reasonable compliance with the statute to omit the certificate altogether. I am of opinion, therefore, that a statement so presented is not entitled to the notice of this court, and that this appeal stands upon the judgment roll alone. In that no error appears, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

Accepting, however, for the purposes of this opinion, that the unauthenticated statement embodied is true, the following appears: This was an action in ejectment. Plaintiff alleged seisin in fee of the premises in controversy on the 11th of February, 1874; that the defendant entered thereon July 5, 1875, while plaintiff was so seised, and withholds to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $10,000; and that the value of the rents and profits during such withholding is $250 per month. Defendant denies that plaintiff was ever seised or entitled to the possession of said premises; denies damages; and alleges that he is the legal owner of said premises, and in possession thereof, stating his title; that plaintiff claims title from defendant's wife by deed, she having no power to sell; that said deed was made to defraud the defendant; and that plaintiff knew thereof; and prays cancellation of said deed. It was established on the trial by plaintiff's evidence that Anna C. Woffenden, from whom plaintiff claimed to have purchased the lands sued for, was from August, 1872, ever since has been, and now is, the wife of the defendant; that the title of these premises stood in her name; that this title consisted of patents from the United States to her grantors, and deeds of purchase from them to her for a moneyed consideration, made during her coverture; and that the only documentary title plaintiff claimed was a conveyance from her alone to plaintiff, made during such coverture.

The first error assigned is as to action shown at folio 40 of transcript. Plaintiff opened his case by taking the stand himself, as the first witness in his own behalf. The first relevant evidence offered was that plaintiff was asked "to describe the whole property bought by him of Anna C. Woffenden, lands and all." Objected to as inadmissible, because: (1) No foundation laid for oral description of lands purchased, no proof of purchase itself having been made. (2) Evidence offered incompetent to prove purchase; should be in writing; no foundation to prove contents of lost writing. Objection sustained. The ruling on this objection was immaterial, as will appear in the consideration of the fifth assignment of error.

The second assignment of error is as to action taken at folio 42. Plaintiff offered in evidence deed to himself of premises from Anna C. Woffenden. Objected to: (1) Defective acknowledgment; (2) that it has not been shown that the person executing said deed had power to convey the premises described therein. Objection sustained. Here was an objection to the order of proof. Merely proving a conveyance to plaintiff in ejectment is nothing, unless plaintiff shows that the person conveying had power to convey the legal title. Otherwise the court might be delayed for days at any time, and the record uselessly incumbered by the introduction of irrelevant conveyances. The court has the right to protect itself against such a practice. Therefore the order of testimony has been left to the discretion of the court. No abuse of this discretion is shown. It is not shown that plaintiff offered any reason for not introducing the requisite preliminary evidence at that time, nor that he assured the court he would subsequently produce it. There was no error therefore in excluding the deed at that time, the ruling as to the acknowledgment being immaterial, the deed itself being properly excluded on other grounds.

The third assignment of error is for action, commencing at folio 43½. Plaintiff, testifying in his own behalf, being asked on direct examination, "To whom was the sale of the ranches communicated when the same was being made?" offered to show that defendant, the husband, knew of the sale being made by his wife, and said nothing. Objected to as (1) leading; (2) inadmissible, no proof of negotiations; (3) incompetent, as oral, to prove agreement of sale; (4) immaterial, no power in wife to sell having been shown, and this being incompetent evidence to show such power. Sustained. The evidence was immaterial. Granting it proved all that was claimed,—that it proved that the husband stood by and saw his wife agree to sell real estate of common property,—the most it would show would be equitable title in plaintiff, not sufficient to recover upon in ejectment against the holder of the legal title in possession. If it was separate property of the wife, which she might sell without her husband's consent, as she could do here if it were separate property, then his knowledge or assent was also immaterial. It must have been either common or separate, and therefore the evidence was immaterial in either case, and was properly excluded.

The fourth assignment of error was in action declared at folio 47½. "Plaintiff's counsel again offered in evidence the deed of Anna C. Woffenden to the plaintiff for the property in controversy, with an acknowledgment of that date, November 2, 1875." The action was begun September 6, 1875; and acknowledgment taken after commencement of the action, taken on the trial of the cause, is immaterial to show title in plaintiff at the commencement of the action. None of the other objections sustained to the deed on its first offer had been cured in the mean time. The only additional reason shown for the introduction of the deed was this subsequent acknowledgment, and that was of no benefit to plaintiff in this action. Before any other action was had which is assigned as error, the plaintiff introduced, without objection, patents from the United States for the premises in controversy to the grantors of defendant's wife, and deeds of purchase from them for a moneyed consideration to defendant's wife during her coverture. Plaintiff stated the object of this introduction to be as follows: "These deeds were offered in evidence to show that Mrs. Woffenden, at the date of the deed to plaintiff, was the absolute owner of the premises in controversy, and also to show her power to convey to the plaintiff." The granting clauses in said conveyance to the wife are to her and her heirs and assigns. There is no habendum clause in either of them. In neither of them is there anything said at all in any way as to her having or receiving the premises, or any part thereof, as separate property.

The next and fifth assignment of error is as follows: "In excluding evidence that the plaintiff in this case was in the adverse, prior, and notorious possession of the real property in controversy; that the defendant never questioned the plaintiff's right of possession, but disavowed any interest of his own in said property, and declared his intention never to return to it." This evidence was offered after the admission of the documentary title last before described, showing title in the wife of the defendant from the United States by deeds of purchase during coverture, and which, the transcript says, though received, were not admitted by the court as proving power in the wife to convey to the plaintiff. To this offer, now made, to prove that plaintiff was in adverse, prior, and notorious possession of the premises, defendant objected (1) that the evidence is inadmissible, because title by adverse possession must be specifically pleaded, and must have continued five years in order to give the possessor title against the party holding the legal title, it appearing that the legal title is in the defendant; (2) that the offer does not claim to cover the period of five years, and is therefore incompetent to prove title by adverse possession; (3) that, under the evidence already admitted in this case, title by adverse possession cannot be shown, since plaintiff has already shown, by the documentary evidence of title before alluded to, that the legal title is in the defendant from the United States government, than which no title can be prior. Objection sustained. To that portion of the offer proposing to prove abandonment by acts and declarations of defendant, defendant objected that the testimony offered was incompetent to prove title in the plaintiff, or to prove abandonment by defendant, it having been shown that the legal title was in defendant by patent from the United States. Objection sustained. The answer to all these points in the fifth assignment of error, as also to the first assignment, is that the plaintiff himself proved that the legal title was in the defendant, under patents from the United States issued about 18 months prior to the commencement of the suit. That such was the legal effect of plaintiff's proof, I will now discuss; but that, such being the legal effect of plaintiff's proof, it could be material to permit plaintiff to describe the lands, or to contradict his own testimony by attempting to prove prior or adverse possession to sustain an action in ejectment against such a defendant with such title, I will not discuss. Plaintiff proved patents from the United States, for the premises in controversy, to the grantors of defendant's wife, and conveyances from them to her for a moneyed consideration, during her coverture. What is the legal effect of such a proof? Did the property become the separate property of the wife by such conveyances? Or does the law presume it to be the common property of both husband and wife? Our statute on the subject is as follows: "Sec. 2. All property acquired after the marriage by either husband or wife, except such as may be acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be common property. Comp. Laws, p. 306. Under a similar law in California, the courts have held that all property acquired by either spouse during the marriage by purchase is presumed to be common property, and that this presumption can be overcome only by clear and satisfactory proof that it was acquired by the separate funds of one or the other, and that the burden of proof lies on the party claiming the property as separate. Smith v. Smith, 12 Cal. 224, opinion by Judge FIELD, who cites a great many cases in support of that declaration. This doctrine is confirmed and adhered to in California in Meyer v. Kinzer, Id. 247; Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127; Mott v. Smith, 16 Cal. 533; Burton v. Lies, 21 Cal. 87; Adams v. Knowlton, 22 Cal. 283; Riley v. Pehl, 23 Cal. 71; McDonald v. Badger, Id. 393. I believe that to be the true rule in the matter. Plaintiff offered no proof whatever to overcome this presumption, although his attention was specially called to this defect of proof by the objection made as to the order of testimony. The conveyances themselves contain no word which shows any intention to pass the property to her as her separate property. There is no proof in the case that she ever owned any separate property, or ever had any rents or profits of any separate property. There was nothing on which to found any inference that it was in any way possible that these premises might be her separate property, beyond the naked fact of her taking the property by a deed of purchase, in which case the presumption stands that it is common property, until overcome by clear and satisfactory proof to the contrary. In this territory, it is not necessary for the wife to join in a deed for common property. She has no control over it whatever. A conveyance from her alone can in no case pass any legal title. Therefore, as against this defendant in ejectment, the deed was properly excluded. If the deed from defendant's wife to plaintiff was properly excluded, on the ground that she had no power to convey the premises, they being common property, then it is immaterial what other and further objections to it were sustained by the court. If one good objection was made and sustained, it does not matter whether the other objections were good or not. If only one insuperable objection to the admission of the deed was made, and remained unremoved, the exclusion of the deed cannot have been error. Admit, for the argument, that all the other objections to the deed were bad, and that all the rulings in those other objections were wrong; the plaintiff was not injured thereby, because the result would have still been the same,—the deed must still have been excluded, for lack of power in the wife to convey common property. It is urged, arguendo, that, the objection that the acknowledgment of the deed was defective having been sustained, it was useless for the plaintiff to prove power in the wife to convey, as the deed would still have been excluded. The transcript does not show on which of the two grounds of objections urged—viz.: (1) Defective acknowledgment; (2) defect of power to convey—the deed was excluded. But plaintiff afterwards tried to meet the objections as to defective acknowledgment by getting a new acknowledgment of the deed, but he did not try to cure the other defect, viz., a failure to show power to convey. It is immaterial whether he cured the first defect or not, so long as he left the second fatal defect uncured. It is true that, if the plaintiff had cured the second defect, the court might still have excluded the deed, on account of the acknowledgment; but had the second been cured, and had the court still excluded the deed because of the acknowledgment, then, if that were error, it would be material; but, with that second defect, of lack of power to convey, left uncured, the ruling of the court, so far as it affected the matter of the acknowledgment, is entirely immaterial.

The sixth and last assignment of error is that the court erred in nonsuiting plaintiff. When plaintiff rested his case, his proof stood as above described, viz., legal title in the defendant. When a plaintiff shows this in ejectment, under a complaint relying solely on seisin in fee, and no offer to amend having been made, all of which is the case here, he must be nonsuited. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of nonsuit ought to be affirmed.

APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS TO TRANSCRIPT—RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

1. Under rule 12 of supreme court of Arizona, requiring exceptions to the transcript to be noted at least one day before argument, the exceptions must be noted before the day set for hearing though the case is not reached that day.

2. Act Ariz. 1871, § 1, giving a married woman exclusive control of her separate property, repeals the provision of Act 1865, § 9, that rents and profits of separate property shall be common property and under the control of the husband, and she may acquire separate property by purchase with such rents, though Act 1865, § 2, recognizes its acquisition only by "gift, bequest, devise, or descent." Following Charauleau v. Woffenden, 1 Ariz. 243, ante, 653.

DUNN, C. J., dissenting.

Titus & Hughes, for appellant. Farley & Pomroy, for respondent.

TWEED, J. The appeal is from the first district, Pima county. Counsel for the respondent, before submitting his argument upon the merits of the case, asked to be heard upon a preliminary motion to strike out from the transcript certain portions thereof as not being properly certified, citing the twelfth rule of this court as entitling him to be heard upon such motion. The rule invoked reads as follows: "Exceptions to the transcript, the bond, or undertaking, on appeal, or the notice of appeal, or to its service, or proof of service, or any technical objection to the record affecting the rights of the appellant to be heard on the points of error assigned, must be taken at the first term after the transcript is filed, and must be noted in writing, and filed at least one day before the argument, or they will not be regarded. In such case, the objection must be presented to the court before the argument on the merits." On the 10th of January, the case was set for argument on the 13th. It was not reached until the 24th of that month. On the 21st the counsel for respondent noted in writing and filed his objections to the transcript, and on the 24th, when the case was called for argument, asked to be heard upon his motion to strike out. The court declined to hear the motion argued, and counsel for the respondent excepted to this ruling. The object of the rule is obvious. It is intended to enable the court, as early as is practicable, to dispose of all preliminary objections to a hearing upon the merits of the cases to be brought before it for consideration; to hear such objections as early as possible for its own convenience, and for the convenience of the appellant, who might be permitted, in case of error or mistake in copying exhibits, or otherwise, to correct the same in season for a hearing at the term. The rule requires that the exceptions to the transcript be noted at least one day before the argument, or that they be disregarded. When a case is set for argument, and no exceptions are noted and filed before the day so fixed, we think all exceptions to the transcript should be deemed to be waived. It was with this view of the intention and spirit of the rule cited that we declined to hear the motion of respondent's counsel; and we take occasion to say here that, while we do not wish to encourage any laxity in practice in appeals to this court, we shall avoid, as far as possible, allowing technical objections to stand in the way of a hearing upon the merits of such cases as may come before us. There are obvious reasons why the supreme court of a territory like ours should, by liberal rules, liberally construed, aid litigants to obtain a hearing upon the merits of cases brought before it by appeal.

We will now consider the case as presented to us. On the 2d day of July, 1875, a judgment was rendered by the judge of the district court, first district, Pima county, in favor of the plaintiff herein, in an action then pending in said court for forcible entry and detainer, wherein the plaintiff herein was plaintiff, and the defendant herein was defendant. The premises in controversy in that action, and for which judgment of restitution was had in favor of the plaintiff, were three quarter sections of land lying contiguous to each other in Pima county, and known as the "Robledo," "Moreno," and "Duran" ranches. The plaintiff in this action asks to recover the rents and profits of the premises above mentioned from the 10th of April, 1874, up to the 2d of July, 1875, the period, as is alleged, during which the defendant wrongfully withheld the premises from the plaintiff. Also to recover the value of a quantity of corn and a growing crop alleged to have been upon the premises at the time of the unlawful entry of defendant, and by him converted to his own use; and, among other articles of personal property, two horses and three yoke of oxen, of the alleged value of $250, etc. The defendant in his answer claims ownership of the premises described in the complaint, admits that plaintiff was owner of one-half of the growing crop, denies plaintiff's ownership of the horses and oxen, and alleges that he, the defendant, is the owner thereof. On the trial, the defendant introduced evidence tending to show that certain of the personal property, the oxen and horses, were purchased by him from Anna C. Woffenden, the wife of the plaintiff, and that this property was purchased by her separate means, and was her separate property. Upon cross-examination, plaintiff, in answer to questions touching the purchase of this property, says: "I got that property at home. My wife bought it. She bought it with money belonging to both of us. What is hers is mine. I did not furnish any money directly to pay for it. I did not furnish any money."

Among other instructions, the court charged the jury as follows: "The title to the ranches is not here in question, nor to be considered by you. Whatever of the other property in controversy was acquired by the plaintiff and his wife subsequent to their marriage is common property, and, as such, subject to the management and disposition of the husband, and the wife had no authority to sell the same, unless you find that she was authorized thereto by her husband as any other agent might be. The presumption of its being common property would be removed if you find that said property was taken in exchange for the separate property of either spouse, or was acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent; but such proof must be clear and satisfactory. * * * You must also find that said property was owned by her before marriage with the plaintiff, or acquired afterwards in the manner above described, in order that she might give a complete title thereto as against her husband; or you must find that she was the authorized agent of the husband to sell the same," etc. The court also gave the following instructions: "If you find that any of the property in controversy is rents, issues, and profits of the separate property of either spouse, it is common property by the laws of this territory, and subject to the management of the husband, with like power of disposition as over his own separate estate, and no marriage contract in derogation of these rights is of any force or effect." The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $1,000, itemized as follows: For one-half of the crop of 1874, $750; three yoke of oxen valued at $150; one horse valued at $40; and 1,500 pounds of corn valued at $60. Both these instructions were excepted to by counsel for the defendant, and their being given is assigned as error. In the first of these instructions we understand the learned judge to charge to the effect that to constitute separate property in the wife, when the property is obtained after marriage, it must have come to her by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, or it must have been obtained in exchange for her separate property; that she could not sell any portion of her separate property and invest the means derived from such sale in other property, and hold the same as a part of her separate estate, but that such property so purchased would become common property, and subject to the management and disposal of her husband. Both of these instructions are erroneous. The first section of the act of January 22, 1871, entitled "An act relating to the separate property of married women," reads as follows: "Married women of the age of twenty-one years and upwards shall have the sole and exclusive control of their separate property, and may convey and transfer lands or any estate or interest therein vested in or held by them in their own right, and without being joined by the husband in such conveyance, as fully and perfectly as they might be, if unmarried." The second section repeals all acts and parts of acts so far as they conflict with these provisions. The sole and exclusive control, and the right to convey as if unmarried, given by this statute to the wife, involves the right so to control and convey for her own separate use and benefit; it involves the right in the wife to sell any of her separate property, and to invest the proceeds of such sale in the purchase of other property for her own use; it also involves the right of the wife to the rents and profits of her separate property, and its use by her in the investment of the same as she may choose.

To say that the wife shall have the sole and exclusive control of her separate property, and that she may sell and transfer the same as if unmarried, and then to attach to such right the condition that when in controlling such property she receives the rents and profits thereof, such rents and profits shall become common property and under the exclusive management of the husband, and that when she sells and conveys her separate property, the receipts of such sale, or the property in which she invests such receipts, shall become common property, and pass wholly beyond her right to use the same, or her control thereof, is affixing a condition to the right given to her which utterly destroys the right itself. We have no doubt that under this statute the rents and profits of the wife's separate property are as absolutely hers, and as completely under her control, as the property of which they are the fruits; and that she may use such rents and profits, and the proceeds derived from the sale of any of her separate property, in the purchase of other property, and that such property so purchased will remain a part of her separate estate; and we have no doubt that every provision of our statutes in force when this act of 1871 was passed, limiting the rights or powers of the wife as to her separate property by making the rents and profits thereof or the receipts for the sale thereof or the property purchased therewith, common property, to be managed and controlled by the husband, was in conflict with the provisions of this act, and was repealed by the repealing clause thereof. If the instructions under consideration are correct, from the day of the wife's marriage, however ample her separate means may be, she is wholly deprived of their use and enjoyment. She may not gratify her taste by the purchase of a single article for the adornment of her person, nor bestow upon a needy relative, be the same father, mother, brother, or sister, such aid as their needs may require, and such as she may desire to relieve; she may not even of her own fortune provide for the education of her own children, if she have such when married, but must depend wholly upon the will or whim of her husband in the use of means which may have been acquired by her own labor, learning, and skill before her marriage. Practically, this ruling places the wife in the same status in which she stood under the act of 1865 as to her separate property, the only effect given to the act of 1871 being to give the barren right to convey without being joined with the husband, and places the proceeds of her separate property, as well as the rents and profits thereof, wholly in the hands and under the control of the husband.

The act of 1865, above referred to, in its first section prescribes that "all property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property." The second section provides that "all property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, except such as may be acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be common property." The ninth section of the same act takes from the wife all beneficial interest in her separate property by giving to the husband the management and control of the same, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, making the rents, issues, and profits, common property. It was doubtless the intention of the legislature, by the act of 1871, to get rid of the obnoxious provision in the act of 1865, by which the wife's separate property became, in effect, common property, and subject to the management and control of the husband. The act of 1871 gives to the wife perfect freedom in the control, use, and enjoyment of her separate property, and makes her wholly independent of her husband in regard thereto.

We hold further that the act of 1871 adds another method to those provided in the second section of the act of 1865, by which the wife may acquire property after marriage; that the right to the sole and exclusive control of her separate property, and the right to sell and convey the same free from the interference of her husband, involves the right in her, and for her own use, to purchase property with the means she may derive from such sale, or by the investment of the rents and profits of her separate estate. These views accord with the decision of this court at this present term in the case of Charauleau v. Woffenden, 1 Ariz. 243, ante, 652. The instructions as given must be presumed to have influenced the jury in their verdict as to certain of the personal property in controversy. We do not deem it necessary to pass upon other matters occurring at the trial, and assigned as error. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial; and it is so ordered.

PORTER, J., concurs.

DUNNE, C. J. I dissent. 1. The same condition of facts exists in this case as to the objection to the statement as in the case of Charauleau v. Woffenden, ante, 652, (decided at this term of the court,) and for the same reasons there stated I consider there is nothing before this court in this transcript but the judgment roll, in which no error appears, and that the judgment for that reason should be affirmed.

2. Accepting, however, the unauthenticated statement as true, it appears therefrom that plaintiff had obtained judgment against defendant for forcible entry and detainer of certain premises. He then brought his action for damages consequent and attendant upon said entry and detainer, under Comp. Laws, p. 369, § 24. He alleged $3,600 damages for rents and profits, and $1,890 damages for personal property on said premises taken by defendant at the time of entry. There are two crops spoken of in the testimony,—the crop of 1874 and the crop of 1875. As to the crop of 1874, defendant admits its value to be as charged in the complaint, but claims he owned one-half of it. The crop of 1875 defendant claims was planted by him during the time he was adjudged to be in unlawful possession of the premises. Defendant undertook to prove the value of the crop of 1875, to show that he had placed articles of value on the premises of which plaintiff got the benefit, and defendant stated that he offered proof on this point as having a bearing on the question of damages. Excluded, wherein appellant assigns error No. 1.

We are governed here by the common law, in the absence of statutory provisions. At common law, a trespasser could not prove value of improvements made by him as a set-off to damages for trespass. By statute here, in ejectment, where defendant enters in good faith, under color of title adverse to plaintiff, he may prove value of improvements made by him as a set-off against damages. But there is no provision for doing it as against damages for forcible entry and unlawful detainer. The exclusion was not error.

Assignment No. 2 is that the court refused to allow defendant to prove ownership of the premises on which it had been adjudged he had forcibly entered, the value of the crop of 1874, and the animals in contest, in mitigation of damages. It was not error to exclude evidence of title in defendant. Title of the land could not be raised in this action; and concerning the allegation that it was error to exclude evidence of the value of the crop of 1874, there is nothing in the transcript to show that any evidence was offered concerning the value of the crop of 1874; besides, the defendant admitted in his answer the value of the crop of 1874 to be as charged in the complaint. The latter portion of the assignment, that the court excluded evidence of the value of the animals in question, is not warranted even by the unauthenticated statement. The unauthenticated statement shows no such exclusion, but, on the contrary, shows that evidence as to the value of the animals, and all about their purchase, and that of other property and its value, was admitted, without objection.

Assignment No. 3 was for refusal to permit defendant to ask a certain question at a certain time. Even if that were error, the unauthenticated statement shows it was cured by allowing the same question to be asked later in the examination of the same witness.

The fourth assignment of error is a duplication of assignment No. 2,—that the court excluded evidence of title to the land,—and is answered in the remarks on that assignment.

The assignments from 5 to 15 inclusive are for error in instructions. The only one of these instructions about which I understand there is serious contest is No. 10, instructing the jury that the rents, issues, and profits of the separate property of either spouse are common property, under the law of this territory. It is argued that the adjudications of the supreme court of California are against the doctrine of this instruction. Section 9, p. 307, of our Compiled Laws, declares, in express terms, that the rents and profits of the separate property of either spouse are common property. Our law on this subject is taken from the California law. Section 9 in the California law is the same as our section 9. In 1860 the supreme court of California construed section 9. We adopted section 9 in 1865, presumptively with notice of the construction given to it in California. The supreme court of California held that section 9 of the California law was inoperative in its declaration that the rents and profits of the wife's separate property should be common property. But why? Because it was, as they say, in conflict with the constitution of California, and that the legislature had not the power to modify the law of the constitution; that the constitution gave to the wife separate property; that at common law a right to separate property gave the right to the rents and profits thereof as separate property also; and that the legislature had no power to say it should be otherwise. But in this territory the matter is not governed by constitutional provision; all the rights the wife has are fixed by the legislature. Our legislature has power to say the wife shall have no separate estate at all. It has power to say just what estate she may have is separate property. They have said that she shall have what the court in California calls a "reversionary interest;" one which, the court continues, can "be of no avail to her, except in the contingency of her surviving her husband." The court speaks of it as "a barren right." But is it such a great anomaly to allow the head of the family to control the usufruct of his wife's property, and dispose of it for the maintenance and care of the family, the support and education of the children, and to have some enjoyment of it also himself, perhaps, while the property itself is put safely beyond his control? He cannot divest the wife of the property owned by her; that is secured for her children, if she so desire. Is there anything against public policy or contra bonos mores in such a law? Have not the legislature of Arizona power to make such a law if they like? If they choose to adopt one feature of the law of California recognizing separate property in the wife, have they no power to say that certain conclusions drawn therefrom by the courts of California shall not obtain in Arizona? Five years after that decision was rendered in California, declaring that rents and profits followed the separate estate, and were separate property in that state, the legislature of Arizona deliberately declared that in Arizona the rents and profits should be common property. What is to hinder their doing so? There is no parity in the legislation on the subject. In Arizona, it is all the act of the legislature. In California, the law is partly statutory and partly constitutional, and of course nothing in the statute may contravene the constitution. But make the cases similar: Suppose that section 14, art. 11, of the California constitution, were followed by a section declaring that, though certain property should be the separate estate of the wife, the rents and profits of that estate should be common property, would not the courts give force to both sections? Necessarily they would, because both sections would then be of equal authority, and would be capable of standing together. So they are in this territory. The statutes are all of equal authority, are all in pari materia, must all be taken together, and force given to all.

There is a fourth objection, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. There was no motion for a new trial. Such an objection is available only on motion for a new trial, so as to give the court an opportunity to submit the case to another jury. The objection cannot properly be considered here. But, nevertheless, what is the objection? The only controverted facts on which the jury gave a verdict were as to the ownership of three oxen and one horse. The only evidence as to the ownership of this property was that of the plaintiff, from whose wife defendant claimed to have bought this property. He said, in substance: "My wife did not own any of this property before marriage. It was all acquired since. My wife bought it with money belonging to both of us. What is hers is mine. I did not furnish any money directly to pay for it. I did not furnish any money." Plaintiff showed he had used these animals in putting in his crop. On this evidence, in substance, the jury by their verdict practically declared that this was common property. Even if it should be conceded that this was against the evidence, what power did the court below have to correct it? The court was bound to receive the verdict. The defendant did not ask for a new trial. The court was, therefore, compelled to enter judgment. The defendant cannot now raise any objection to the verdict on that ground. He had his day in court on that point, and allowed it to go without objection.

The last objection urged is that the verdict is excessive, and ought to be reduced. Plaintiff was entitled to the value of the rents and profits of the premises. He gave evidence that the use of the premises was worth $1,500 for the time they were withheld. The defendant admitted that plaintiff owned one-half of the crop of 1874, and that that one-half was worth $750, and owned corn worth $60, making $810. That was all the jury gave him except $190 for three yoke of oxen and one horse. I do not think the verdict was excessive, particularly when in an action like this the law says the damages may be trebled. The damages were not trebled in this case, nor raised in any amount beyond that awarded by the jury, and no motion was made for a new trial on the ground that the damages given were excessive. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

VACATING DECREE.

A decree entered after issue joined, and reciting that the case came on for final hearing on bill, answer, and argument of counsel, and decreeing that the injunction theretofore issued be made perpetual, "or until the further order of this court," is final, and, in the absence of mistake or surprise, cannot be opened after the expiration of the term at which it was rendered.

Appeal from district court, Pima county. Titus & Hughes, for appellant. Farley & L'oumroy, for respondent.

PORTER, J. This case arose upon a complaint in the nature of a bill of equity by the plaintiff, a married woman, to enjoin the defendant, her husband, from interfering with her separate property, or with the "rents, issues, and profits thereof." The complaint is as follows: "Complaint. Anna C. Woffenden, plaintiff, v. Richard Woffenden, defendant. Anna C. Woffenden, the above-named plaintiff, complains of Richard Woffenden, the above-named defendant, and alleges: (1) That defendant and plaintiff are husband and wife; that they had intermarried at Tucson, in the county of Pima, territory of Arizona, on or about the — day of —, A. D. 1872, and ever since have been, and are now, husband and wife. (2) Plaintiff further alleges that she is of the age of twenty-one years and over. (3) That on the 13th day of August, 1873, for the purpose of preventing difficulties and misunderstandings arising between them, articles of agreement were entered into, made, and signed by said defendant and this plaintiff, a copy of which articles of agreement, marked 'Exhibit A,' is hereunto annexed, and prayed to be made a part of this complaint; that by said articles of agreement said defendant covenanted, promised, and agreed to and with the said plaintiff that he, the said defendant, would not in any manner seek to control or derive any benefit from the separate property of plaintiff, nor from the rents, issues, and profits of said property. (4) Plaintiff further alleges that on the 7th day of October, 1873, the said defendant, in violation of his aforesaid covenant, promises, and agreements, and in violation of the legal rights of said plaintiff over her separate property, served notices upon the tenants of said plaintiff to pay the rents due and owing on the separate property of plaintiff to said defendant. Wherefore the plaintiff demands judgment (1) that the said defendant be enjoined from exercising any control or authority over the separate property of said plaintiff, or the rents, issues, and profits thereof; (2) for the costs of this suit."

The contract referred to is as follows: "This indenture made and entered into this 13th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, between Richard Woffenden and Anna Charauleau Woffenden, his wife, both of the village of Tucson, in the county of Pima, and territory of Arizona, in consideration of the mutual promise and agreement of the said parties made to each other before marriage, and to prevent difficulties and misunderstandings arising between them in the future, witnesseth: That, in consideration of the premises and of the covenants, promises, and agreements hereinafter contained of the said Anna C. Woffenden, the said Richard Woffenden does hereby covenant, promise, and agree to and with his said wife, Anna C. Woffenden, that, while the said parties shall live together as man and wife, the said Richard Woffenden will, from his own separate property and means, pay and defray all the household expenses, of every class and description, necessary to the comfortable maintenance of himself and his wife, the said Anna C. Woffenden; those hereinafter expressly provided for by the said Anna C. Woffenden. And the said Richard Woffenden further covenants, promises, and agrees to and with the said Anna C. Woffenden, his wife, that he will not in any manner seek to control or to derive any benefit from the separate property of his wife, the said Anna C. Woffenden, nor from the rents, issues, and profits of the said property, and that he will pay and defray all his private and individual expenses, including his own clothing, etc., from his own separate property and means. And, in consideration of the premises and the covenants, promises, and agreements hereinbefore contained of the said Richard Woffenden, the said Anna C. Woffenden, wife of the said Richard Woffenden, does hereby covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said Richard Woffenden that she, the said Anna C. Woffenden, will, from her own separate property and means, pay and defray all expenses incurred by her in keeping and maintaining one or more horses, with the carriage or other vehicle used with the same, and will also pay and defray from her own separate property and means all her own individual and private expenses, including her own clothing, etc., and that she will not in any manner seek to control or to derive any benefit from the separate property of her husband, the said Richard Woffenden, nor from the rents, issues, and profits of the said property. In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have hereunto, and to another of like tenor and date, set their hands and seals the day and year first above written. RICHARD WOFFENDEN. [Seal.] ANNA C. WOFFENDEN. [Seal.] Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of ———."

Upon which the judge at chambers directed this order: "This complaint will be heard on Monday, the seventeenth instant, at ten A. M. of that day, on not less than four days' notice to the defendant, and in the mean time the property and interest of the plaintiff not to be in any manner or degree prejudiced or interfered with by the defendant. November 10, 1873. JOHN TITUS, Judge, etc. Filed November 10, 1873. O. BUCKALEW, Clerk. By S. W. CARPENTER, Deputy." And, upon hearing, the following order for injunction was entered: "Order for Injunction. Anna C. Woffenden, Plaintiff, v. Richard Woffenden, Defendant. To Richard Woffenden: (1) The above-named plaintiff having commenced an action in the district court of the first judicial district of the territory of Arizona, in and for the county of Pima, against the above-named defendant, and having prayed for an injunction against said defendant, requiring him to refrain from certain acts in said complaint, and hereinafter more particularly mentioned, (2) it is therefore ordered by me, the judge of the said district court of the first judicial district, that, until further order in the premises, you, the said Richard Woffenden, and all your counselors, solicitors, and agents, and all others acting in aid and assistance of you, and each and every one of you, do absolutely desist and refrain from exercising or attempting to exercise any control or authority whatever over the property, both real and personal, or any part thereof, in the possession of and owned by the said Anna C. Woffenden at the time of her marriage, together with all such property, both real and personal, which the said Anna C. Woffenden has acquired since her said marriage, or the rents, issues, and profits thereof. November 18, 1873. JOHN TITUS, Judge, etc. Indorsed: Filed, November 18, 1873. O. BUCKALEW, Clerk. By S. W. CARPENTER, Deputy."

An answer was filed in the case November 28, 1873, as follows: "Answer. Anna C. Woffenden, Plaintiff, v. Richard Woffenden, Defendant. The defendant answers to the complaint. (1) And for a first defense denies—First, that he did agree with the plaintiff as alleged, or at all; second, that he has in any way interfered or attempted to control the separate property of said plaintiff. (2) And for a further and separate answer and defense alleges—First, that the articles of agreement between plaintiff and defendant, referred to in the complaint, were signed by the defendant without the defendant's knowledge of the contents thereof, and with the full and explicit understanding with plaintiff's counsel that the same was void, and did not affect or abridge any of the material rights of the said defendant; second, that the plaintiff has not performed the conditions of the said articles of agreement, but, on the contrary, has wholly omitted in defraying the expense of keeping and maintaining one or more horses, with the carriage or vehicle, as set forth in said articles of agreement, and has acted towards him, the said defendant, in such a manner as to foment strife, and encourage difficulties and misunderstandings between plaintiff and defendant as man and wife. Wherefore the defendant demands that the action be dismissed at the cost of plaintiff; that the injunction granted by this court be discontinued; and that plaintiff be perpetually enjoined from further prosecution of this said action. Filed December 1, 1873. O. BUCKALEW, Clerk. By S. W. CARPENTER, Deputy."

At the regular December term, 1873, the cause having come on regularly for hearing, the court gave the following judgment in the case: "Copy of Judgment. Anna C. Woffenden, Plaintiff, v. Richard Woffenden, Defendant. This cause, having come on regularly for hearing on the tenth day of December, A. D. 1873, and being argued by the parties' respective counsel, O. F. McCarty, Esq., for the plaintiff, and L. C. Hughes, Esq., for the defendant, was by the court taken under advisement and consideration. Now, on this fifteenth day of December, A. D. 1873, the decree of the court therefore is that, this cause having come to a final hearing on bill, answer, and argument of counsel, therefore, and in consideration thereof, it is now hereby ordered and decreed that the injunction heretofore issued, and still existing in the case, ought to be, and the same is, made perpetual, or until the further order of this court. Done in open court this fifteenth day of December, A. D. 1873. Indorsed: Filed December 15, 1873. O. BUCKALEW, Clerk. By S. W. CARPENTER, Deputy."

It does not appear that any other proceedings were had in the case until nearly two years afterwards, during which time three regular terms at least of the court had intervened; but on August 4, 1875, the defendant gave notice of motion, in the same court that entered the foregoing judgment, that he would move that the injunction in this action be dissolved, and the court, on a hearing on the original pleadings and argument of counsel, made the following order: "Order Dissolving Injunction. Anna C. Woffenden, Plaintiff, v. Richard Woffenden, Defendant. At a regular term of the district court of the first judicial district of the territory of Arizona, in and for Pima county, held at the court-house August 16, A. D. 1875. And now comes, as well the said plaintiff by her attorneys, Messrs. Titus & Hughes, as the said defendant by his attorneys, H. Farley and H. B. Summers, and thereupon this action comes on for a hearing before the court, on motion of defendant's attorneys to dissolve the injunction heretofore granted in said cause. On reading the complaint of plaintiff and the answer of defendant herein, and on motion of H. Farley, Esq., counsel for defendant, and after hearing Messrs. Titus & Hughes, Esqs., counsel for plaintiff, in opposition, it is ordered that the injunction granted on the eighteenth day of November, A. D. 1873, against the above-named Richard Woffenden, be vacated and dissolved. E. F. DUNNE, Judge First District Court, A. T. Indorsed: Filed August 16, 1875. Jos. B. AUSTON, Clerk."

We are of the opinion that the court below erred in entertaining the motion to dissolve the injunction in this case, and in dissolving the same, as, by the record of all the proceedings, it appears conclusive that the same case had already been fully and finally heard and decided. We cannot come to other conclusions, for it is apparent that all the facts of the case were the same before the court on both hearings. The language of the notice of motion to dissolve is that the documents to be used on said motion were the complaint, answer, and order for injunction, and records of the court, and no other cause or reason is assigned for asking the court to set aside a judgment entered by it nearly two years previous. It is urged by defendant that the last clause of the judgment, "or until the further order of this court," is conclusive that the judgment was not intended as a final judgment of the court, and was subject to reversal at any time. While the language is peculiar, it does not have to us such significance. The judgment recites that the cause "came on regularly to be heard." The case had already gone through the stages ordinary in this class of cases,—an order restraining defendant, then a temporary injunction, then at regular term of court issue joined, complaint and answer verified by both parties, arguments of counsel. The judgment recites that, having come to a final hearing on bill, answer, and argument of counsel, it is now hereby ordered and decreed that the injunction heretofore issued, and still existing in this case, ought to be, and the same is, made perpetual. The whole subject-matter of the motion was then res judicata. If this was clearly the judgment of the court, if issue had been joined, and the case had been before the court on its merits,—and the record clearly shows that it was as fully so in the hearing when the injunction was made perpetual as when the order from which this appeal was taken was entered,—then we hold the rule to be, and that governs this case, that "a court cannot open a decree, after there has been a regular trial and judgment upon the merits, after the term at which the decree was entered had expired. Its jurisdiction over the decree at the end of the term is exhausted, except, perhaps, in cases where it is shown that a mistake, accident, or surprise, or negligence of counsel occurred by which a decision on the merits was prevented." None of these grounds were alleged, nor do they appear to have existed. Freem. Judgm. § 100, and authorities there cited; Shuford v. Cain, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 302.

As to just what the court meant by the closing words of the order cited and relied upon by counsel, we are not clear, except that they do not detract from the proposition that the judgment was a final judgment of the court. If the court meant to say that the injunction was final until the court changed it by direction of an appellate court, it effected nothing. If the court meant to keep the judgment under its control after deciding it after a hearing on its merits, it plainly exceeded its power, and the closing clause should not be regarded on appeal. In Freeman on Judgments, the learned author, commenting upon the authorities upon this subject, says: "The interests of society demand that there should be a termination to each controversy." Section 96. Courts have no power, after fully deliberating upon causes and ascertaining and settling the rights of parties, to add clauses in their judgment authorizing the losing party to apply at a subsequent term to have the judgment against him set aside. The law does not permit any judicial tribunal to exercise a revisory power over its own adjudications after they have, in contemplation of law, passed out of the breast of the judge. Bank v. Moss, 6 How. 31. "If a vacillating, irresolute judge were allowed to thus keep causes ever within his power to determine and redetermine term after term, . . . litigation might become more intolerable than the wrongs it intends to redress." Freem. Judgm. § 96. The rule laid down in Hill v. City of St. Louis, 20 Mo. 584, (and we hold it a safe one.) is, "Leave granted in one term to set aside the judgment at the next term is void;" and this appears to be the construction in effect claimed by the respondent: that the injunction was decreed to be, after a final hearing, perpetual, but that the closing clause, "or until the further order of this court," is to be construed as a license to the losing party to ask the court at some future day, under more favorable circumstances, again to pass upon the question.

It will not be denied that the judgment making the injunction perpetual in this case is certainly a final judgment, in the ordinary form, if the concluding clause is omitted, and that it was founded upon proceedings ordinarily had in such cases. If, then, it was proper for the court to have added it in this case, and if it is proper for this court to give to it the effect claimed by respondent, then it would follow that a district court could, if so disposed, keep any and all judgments within its control by adding the words here found at the end of its judgment. If the clause in this case renders the judgment interlocutory, and not subject to appeal, but only to be set aside or modified by the court that entered it, the same formula attached to the judgment from which the appeal is taken, or to any other judgment, would necessarily affect it in a similar manner. The rule was announced in the case of Baldwin v. Kramer, 2 Cal. 582, "that, after the expiration of a term of the district court, no power remains in it to set aside a judgment or grant a new trial." And the learned judge adds: "A different doctrine would lead to great uncertainty, and possibly to gross abuse. There must be a time when the rights of the parties are to be considered determined, and for litigation to cease." And for this purpose the law has wisely fixed the rule here indicated. Applying the rules before stated to this case, we are of opinion, as already indicated, that they effectually dispose of the same. It therefore does not appear necessary to examine the record of errors, either of law or of fact, committed on the trial of the cause. The order vacating and dissolving the injunction must be set aside.

NOTICE OF APPEAL—NEW TRIAL.

1. Appeal from a judgment cannot be entertained where the notice of appeal was not filed for more than a year.

2. Appeal from an order denying a new trial cannot be entertained where the order is not brought up in the record, as provided by Comp. Laws Ariz. §§ 344, 345, 348.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

Murat Masterson and Farley & Pomroy, for appellant. John A. Rush, for respondents.

FRENCH, C. J. The appeal from the judgment in this case cannot be entertained, for the reason that the notice of appeal, the first step towards perfecting an appeal, was not filed until more than one year had elapsed after the rendition of the judgment appealed from. The appeal from the order denying a new trial cannot be sustained, because the order from which the appeal is taken, is not brought before us in the record. The order appealed from should form the basis of the transcript on appeal. Comp. Laws, p. 437, §§ 344, 345, 348. But, if the order appealed from were in the record, it would be of no avail in this case. It fully appears from the record and the arguments in this case that there was a defect in the testimony; that plaintiff, who appears to have had a good cause of action, continuously failed, both on the trial and on his motion for a new trial, to make his case. On the trial failing for defects of testimony, and on his motion for a new trial utterly failing to make any legal showing why a new trial should be granted, the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it has been so ordered.

FOSS v. NEWBURY.

VENDOR AND VENDEE — STATUTE OF FRAUDS—FRAUD OF VENDOR—DAMAGES—SET-OFF.

1. A contract to grant or convey an easement in order to be enforceable must be evidenced by a writing executed according to the statute of frauds.

2. Where the sale of real estate is induced by the fraud of the vendor, although such fraudulent representations may be in reference to a matter within the statute of frauds, the vendor will be liable for damages to his vendee.

3. In a suit to enforce the payment of a note and mortgage given for the purchase price of land, the defendant may recoup the damages resulting to him from plaintiff's fraud.

4. A written agreement can be relieved against on account of fraud.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

This is a suit to foreclose a mortgage on certain real estate in Clatsop county, given by defendants to plaintiff. The answer admits the execution of the mortgage, but, as a defense thereto, alleges that it was given to secure a portion of the purchase price of the real estate described therein; that this land was valuable only on account of the growing timber thereon for logging and manufacturing purposes, and situate about one-quarter of a mile back from the John Day river, and the only ingress and egress from the land, and the only way logs and timber cut therefrom can be removed to market, is over and across a tract of land lying between it and the John Day river belonging to one E. C. Ronell; that at the time defendant purchased this land of plaintiff, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding him, the plaintiff falsely and fraudulently represented that he owned in his own right two certain logging roads, and the right of way thereon, leading from the land purchased over and across Ronell's land to the river over which logs and timber could be transported, and agreed for and as part of the consideration for the purchase of the land described in the mortgage that he would grant and give and secure the proper conveyances therefor to defendant; that defendant, relying upon such false and fraudulent representations, and believing the same to be true, purchased the land described in the mortgage for the sum of $1,700, paying in cash $1,000, and executing the note and mortgage for the balance; that he has conveyed the land purchased, but has neglected and refused to secure to defendant the rights of way across Ronell's land, or either of them, or any right of way, or to procure for defendant the proper, or any, conveyance for said right of way, though frequently demanded; that defendant, relying upon said representations, entered upon the land purchased of plaintiff, and fitted up and maintained a logging camp and logging outfit, at great expense, and cut a large amount of timber and logs thereon, and was, in September, 1887, proceeding on said rights of way to remove said logs and timber to market, when he was prohibited from so doing by Ronell, this being the first time he was informed that plaintiff was not the owner of said rights of way, and he was compelled to and did pay Ronell $200 for the privilege of moving and hauling the timber cut over and across the rights of way; that, prior to paying said sum of $200 to Ronell, he notified plaintiff, and demanded the rights of way, and plaintiff then informed him that he was not the owner thereof, and was unable to execute or secure the proper conveyances therefor, but then and there agreed to repay him the said sum of $200, but has failed and refused so to do; that, at the time defendant purchased the land, he relied solely upon the false and fraudulent representations of plaintiff, and was not aware of their untruthfulness, and that he informed plaintiff, and plaintiff well knew, that his object in purchasing said land was to operate and maintain a logging camp thereon; that, without said rights of way or logging roads, the premises purchased by him would be of no greater value at the time of his purchase than $1,000, and, but for said rights of way or logging roads, he would not have given more than $1,000 for said land. The answer alleges a tender of the amount due, less the sum of $200 paid Ronell for the right to cross his land. A trial in the court below resulted in a decree in favor of defendant, from which this appeal is taken.

W. W. Thayer, for appellant. C. W. Fulton, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is contended on behalf of plaintiff that the answer of defendant only alleges a parol agreement to convey to him the logging roads across Ronell's land, made contemporaneous with the agreement for the sale of the premises described in the mortgage, and that such an agreement is within the provisions of the statute of frauds, and void; that an easement, being an interest in land, can only be acquired by a grant, and ordinarily by deed, or what is deemed to be equivalent thereto, is not denied. Washb. Easem. 23. A parol license merely is not sufficient to create an easement. It must therefore follow that, since it is considered an interest in land, a contract to convey or grant an easement in order to be enforceable must be evidenced by a writing. A parol contract to convey an interest in land is not in any sense an illegal contract, but the statute simply provides that, when such a contract is sought to be enforced, oral evidence shall not be received, but it shall be proven by a writing executed according to the provisions of the statute. While the answer is inartificially drawn, and contains much matter that could profitably have been omitted, we think it sufficiently alleges fraud in the inception of the note and mortgage mentioned in the complaint. The defendant is not seeking to enforce a parol contract to convey the logging roads, nor to recover damages for the violation of any such contract. The damages claimed are based upon the fraudulent representations and deceit of plaintiff, in representing, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding defendant, that, if he would purchase the land plaintiff was endeavoring to sell him, he would receive a right to use the road over Ronell's land in marketing his logs; that, by means of such representations, defendant was induced to purchase the land at a much higher figure than he otherwise would have done. The land was chiefly valuable for timber, but it could only be taken to market by crossing Ronell's land, and therefore these logging roads became a material factor to be considered by defendant in making such purchase. This the plaintiff knew, and, to induce him to make the purchase, made the false representations and promises upon which defendant relied, and, having done so, he cannot escape liability for his fraud by invoking the statute of frauds. It is not the kind or character of the property of which the representations are made which gives the purchaser a right of action against the vendor for practicing the fraud upon the vendee in effecting a sale. It is the fraud and deceit of the vendor, and not the subject-matter of his representations, which is the foundation of the action. The statute of frauds was enacted to prevent frauds, and it cannot be used as a cover for fraud.

If the sale of the land by plaintiff to defendant was induced by fraud and deceit, and the statute could be interposed to prevent its being established by parol, the effect of the statute would be to enable the plaintiff to carry into effect his fraud, instead of preventing him from so doing. The statute was never designed for such a purpose. It is said to be well settled that when a contract is consummated by which an injury is done, whatever fraudulent representations may have been employed by a party to the contract as a means of inducing it to be made, cannot be excluded by invoking the aid of the statute. Cook v. Churchman, (Ind.) 3 N. E. Rep. 759; Day v. Lown, 51 Iowa, 364, 1 N. W. Rep. 786. The gravamen of the charge in the answer is that defendant has been deceived by means of the fraud of plaintiff to his hurt. It is true, if plaintiff had only made a parol agreement to secure or convey these logging roads to defendant, and had refused to comply with it, however great the moral wrong may have been, the law could afford him no relief, because of the statute of frauds; but where, as in this case, the representations are made concerning some collateral matter not ordinarily to be included in the deed, but so materially connected with the subject-matter of the contract as to be one of the controlling influences operating to induce the vendee to make the contract, and without which he would not have made it, although such representations may be in reference to a matter within the statute of frauds, the vendor will be liable for damages to his vendee.

This brings us to the evidence. Plaintiff being the owner of a tract of land, and an interest in a logging outfit, desiring to sell the same to defendant, in company with him, went to examine the property. Defendant carefully examined the land, as well as the logging outfit, plaintiff showing him the boundary lines of the land. In making this examination, defendant noticed that in order to get supplies in for his logging camps, and haul his logs to market, if he made the purchase, it would be necessary to use the roads across Ronell's land, from the land of plaintiff to the John Day river, and he spoke to plaintiff about the matter, saying that, as he desired to use the land, if he bought it for logging purposes, he could not make the purchase until he found out about the crossing, and would have to go and see Ronell. The plaintiff said he need not pay any attention to the crossing, for he had sold the land to Ronell a few years before, and had reserved a right of way across it for all the timber that might come off of the land he was offering to sell, and that he (defendant) need not go to see Ronell, as it was all right, and, if there was any crossing to pay, he would pay it. The plaintiff knew that defendant was purchasing this land for the timber growing thereon, and that he intended immediately to commence logging, and that these logging roads or ways across Ronell's land were almost indispensably necessary to the use of the land for that purpose. There was no other practicable way by which the logs could be transported to market. Plaintiff did not own these logging roads, nor had he made any reservations in his deed to Ronell for the land sold him, and he well knew he had no right to make any statement or representations to defendant about the matter. There can be no other reasonable inference drawn from these representations by plaintiff, except an intent on his part to overreach the defendant, and induce him to make a contract he otherwise would not have made. Such must have been his intention when he persuaded the defendant not to go and see Ronell about the roads. He knew that if defendant should see Ronell, he would ascertain the true facts, and of course would not purchase his land at the price he was asking, and to prevent this inquiry the representations were made. The statement that he had reserved a right of way across this land when he sold to Ronell was in effect saying that he was the owner of it, and the representation that the matter was all right, when defendant hesitated to close the contract, was sufficient to induce him to believe that whatever conveyances were necessary would be secured or made by plaintiff. Defendant relied on plaintiff's representations, and did not go to see Ronell, but purchased the land and logging outfit, paying $1,000 in cash, and giving the note and mortgage in suit for the balance. After defendant had expended considerable money in cutting logs and getting them ready for market, he was notified by Ronell that he could not haul them across his land without paying for so doing, and was compelled to pay $200 for the right. These are briefly the facts in this case, as we gather them from a careful examination of the evidence. It is true plaintiff denies in his testimony that he made the representations as claimed by defendant, and, as we think, has been established by a preponderance of the evidence; but he does admit that he told defendant that he was to have the right of way to take his timber across Ronell's land, and that he sold to defendant with the same understanding. The circumstances surrounding the transaction, the object and purposes for which defendant was buying the land, are strongly corroborative of defendant's theory of this case; and this is also strengthened by the fact that when plaintiff was informed by defendant that Ronell would not allow him to cross his land, without paying for the right, and requested to make his representations good, he went to Ronell and endeavored to persuade him to allow the defendant to cross the land, and, when Ronell refused, said, if there was anything to pay for the right of crossing, he (plaintiff) would have it to pay. The fraud consists in the fact that plaintiff, to induce defendant to purchase his land, represented that he owned these logging roads, and that, if defendant would make the purchase, he should have the use of them in getting his timber to market, when he knew such representations were false, and made them, we think, evidently for the purpose of cheating defendant. If defendant had supposed he was not going to secure the right to use these logging roads in marketing the timber cut from this land, he would not have made the purchase; and this plaintiff evidently knew. He made the false representations and promises in order to consummate the sale, and defendant having relied upon them and acted to his injury, plaintiff should account to him for any damages he may have sustained. He received the benefit of his fraud in the enhanced price of the land, and it would be unjust to permit him to retain it, under the facts in this case. This being a suit to enforce the payment of the note and mortgage given for the balance due on the land, defendant may recoup the damages resulting to him from plaintiff's fraud. Whitney v. Allaire, 4 Denio, 554; Chandler v. Childs, 3 N. W. Rep. 297. The court below seems to have adopted, as the measure of damages, the sum which defendant was obliged to pay Ronell for the right to cross his land. There is no suggestion but what this payment was made in good faith, and is the reasonable value of such right. We think the rule adopted by the court below was as favorable to plaintiff as he could ask. Whitney v. Allaire, 1 N. Y. 305.

There is yet one question remaining. From the evidence it appears that four or five days before the deed from plaintiff to defendant was executed, the parties entered into a written contract for the sale and purchase of this land, in which no mention is made of the use of the roads across Ronell's land, and it is argued that reducing the agreement to writing precludes recurrence to all representations. It is true, as said by Sugden on Vendors, 129, reducing an agreement to writing is, in most cases, an argument against fraud; but it is only an argument, and very far from a conclusive one. That a written agreement can be relieved against on account of fraud is a doctrine too well settled to be now questioned. Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210. There is no attempt made here to vary the written agreement. The relief is sought upon the ground that, by the false representations of plaintiff, defendant was entrapped into making a contract he otherwise would not have made. This is not denying that the agreement or deed in the record was entered into, but insisting that defendant is entitled to recoup the damages resulting to him from the misrepresentations of plaintiff. Decree of court below affirmed.

BEEKMAN v. HAMLIN.

JUDGMENT—PRESUMPTION OF PAYMENT—PLEADING.

1. A judgment upon which no execution has been issued for 20 years, in the absence of explanatory facts or evidence, is presumed to be paid. The burden of proof is on the judgment creditor.

2. To avoid objection by demurrer, the plaintiff must allege in his complaint the facts and circumstances on which he relies to rebut such presumption.

Affirming 24 Pac. Rep. 195.

On motion for rehearing. See 24 Pac. Rep. 195.

LORD, J. A re-examination has satisfied us that the case was properly disposed of in the first instance. We are only led to express ourselves further in consequence of a misapprehension that it was intended in the opinion to limit the rebutting evidence to some positive act of unequivocal recognition on the part of the defendant within the period of 20 years. The rule of common law that, after 20 years, payment of a bond or judgment will be presumed in the absence of evidence explaining the delay, although there is no statutory bar, is founded on the "rational ground that a person naturally desires to possess and enjoy his own, and that an unexplained neglect to enforce an alleged right for a long period casts suspicion upon the existence of the right itself." Bean v. Tonnele, 94 N. Y. 386. The effect of the presumption of payment, arising from lapse of time, is to change the burden of proof from the debtor to the creditor. Within 20 years, the law presumes that the debt has remained unpaid, and the burden is on the debtor to prove payment, but after 20 years, "the creditor is bound to show by something more than his bond that the debt has not been paid; and this he may do, because the presumption raises only a prima facie case against him." Reed v. Reed, 46 Pa. St. 242. But the onus of proof upon the creditor is not to establish a new contract or promise, as when a debt is barred by the statute of limitations, but to show by competent evidence that the debt or judgment has not been paid. The distinction which the law raises between the presumption of payment after the lapse of 20 years, and the bar interposed by the statute of limitations, is in its nature essentially different. "The bar is removed," said STRONG, J., "by nothing less than a new promise to pay, or an acknowledgment consistent with such promise. The presumption is rebutted, or, to speak more accurately, does not arise, where there is affirmative proof, beyond that furnished by the specialty itself, that the debt has not been paid, or where there are circumstances that sufficiently account for the delay of the creditor. The statutory bar is not removed without a new promise, or its equivalent, because suit on the old contract is prohibited, and the debtor can only be liable therefor on the contract expressly made by the new promise, or implied from an acknowledgment of continued indebtedness, the old debt being the consideration for the new engagement." Reed v. Reed, supra; Bentley's Appeal, 99 Pa. St. 504. Prima facie the presumption annuls the judgment, but it can have no application, "if it can be made to appear that the plaintiff has used diligence to enforce the judgment, or that the defendant has paid interest or otherwise acknowledged the debt." Burt v. Casey, 10 Ga. 179. CLARK, J., said that the presumption may be rebutted by circumstances, by evidence tending to show non-payment of the debt, or sufficiently accounting for the delay of the creditor, or showing a continued course of legal proceedings conducted bona fide to compel payment. Van Loon v. Smith, 103 Pa. St. 242. And KENNEDY, J., said: "Being merely a presumption of the defendant's having made payment, it may be rebutted by proof of intervening circumstances, such as a demand of payment, payment of a part by the obligor, his admission that the debt is still due, or his inability to pay it within the twenty years." Tilghman v. Fisher, 9 Watts, 442. And, again, in Gregory v. Com., 121 Pa. St. 622, 15 Atl. Rep. 452, it is said: "It is not required that the same precision and particularity of proof shall, in all respects, be observed, as has been required to remove the bar of the statute of limitations, but, as the presumption of payment after twenty years is a strong one, the evidence to rebut it must be satisfactory and convincing; especially is this so when the suit is not brought until after the defendant's death." In Walker v. Robinson, 136 Mass. 282, the court say: "We are of the opinion that any legal evidence having a tendency to show that the judgment has been paid or satisfied is competent, and that, if the evidence furnished is such as to produce conviction that the judgment has not in fact been paid or satisfied, it is sufficient to rebut the presumption." Knapp v. Knapp, 134 Mass. 356; Brewer v. Thomey, 28 Me. 81; Denny v. Eddy, 22 Pick. 533. All the cases hold that the presumption is rebuttable, and that the plaintiff may do this by showing what diligence he has used to enforce his judgment, or admissions of the defendant, or other circumstances, such as insolvency, or that the debtor was beyond the sea, or other evidence which satisfactorily accounts for his delay. Or, as Mr. Greenleaf says: "But in all these cases the presumption of payment may be repelled by any evidence of the situation of the parties, or other circumstances tending to satisfy the jury that the debt is still due." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 39; Freem. Judgm. § 464; 2 Whart. Ev. § 1364; 13 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 673. But a presumption of payment from lapse of time may be raised by demurrer when shown by the facts stated in the complaint, as was done. Olden v. Hubbard, 34 N. J. Eq. 85. And, to repel such presumption, any existing circumstances which would have that effect should be alleged. In Solomon's Heirs v. Solomon's Adm'r, 81 Ala. 507, 1 South. Rep. 82, it was held that the presumption of payment, arising from the lapse of time, may be taken by demurrer, when shown by the facts stated, but that it is a matter of defense, and must be claimed, the court saying: "While the defense of staleness may be made by demurrer when the facts out of which it springs appear on the face of the bill. (Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 494, 503, 751,) still it is defensive, and must be claimed." Maury v. Mason, 8 Port. (Ala.) 211; Solomon v. Solomon, 83 Ala. 395, 3 South. Rep. 679. Taking the objection by demurrer is in analogy to the rule applied to the statute of limitations, as indicated in Olden v. Hubbard, supra; so that, to avoid the presumption and render the complaint invulnerable to a demurrer, the plaintiff is required to allege in his complaint the facts and circumstances on which he relies to rebut such presumption. We see no reason to change the original direction made in this case.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Dec. 19, 1890.)

SALE OF DECEDENT'S LAND—SETTING ASIDE—PARTIES.

Where land belonging to the estate of a decedent has been sold under an order of court, persons who are willing and desire to make an advance bid on such land have no such interest in the estate as will entitle them to have the sale set aside on the ground of fraud.

Appeal from superior court, Skagit county; J. R. WINN, Judge.

This suit was brought by the widow and heirs of Jesse B. Ball, joined by John F. Terry and J. B. Alexander, to set aside a sale of the decedent's land as having been fraudulently procured and confirmed. Thereafter the widow procured the suit to be dismissed as to herself and the heirs, whose guardian she was, and Terry and Alexander filed an amended complaint, alleging that they were willing to pay an advance of 10 per cent. on the price for which the land was sold, and that the defendants, the administrators of Ball and the probate judge, had conspired to defraud the infant heirs of said Ball, and they prayed that the sale be set aside, and that they be given an opportunity to bid on the land. The court sustained a demurrer to their complaint, and they appeal.

Sinclair, Waugh & Payne and Strudwick, Peters & Collins, for appellants. Ronald & Piles, for appellees.

DUNBAR, J. It appears from the complaint in this case that the plaintiffs were not parties interested in the estate. No one else has a right to object to a confirmation of sale. This being true, the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly sustained. Other questions were raised in the case, but, as the judgment of this court sustaining the demurrer on this point disposes of the case, it is not necessary to enter into their discussion. The judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

(No. 13,612.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1891.)

DEDICATION—EVIDENCE—EXCHANGE OF LANDS.

1. Land within the limits of the pueblo of Los Angeles, was granted by the ayuntamiento to a private person, who was put in possession by the alcalde. Before the grant, the land was vacant, and was used by adjoining lot-owners in passing to and fro, and sometimes for public celebrations and amusements. Held, that this was not sufficient evidence of a dedication to the public to overcome the presumption that the authorities acted within their powers, and conveyed a good title by the grant.

2. That a subsequent owner petitioned the city council for an "exchange or indemnification for certain lands belonging to her, and now occupied by the public," (being the lot in question,) and that the council passed a resolution directing a concession of other land to be made to her, in pursuance of which a deed was drawn up and signed by the mayor, is not sufficient evidence that the exchange was actually consummated, when there was no proof that the deed was delivered, and it appeared that the city subsequently granted the lot to another.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

Readon & Daly and C. McFarland, for appellant. Chapman & Hendrick and Johnston & Borden, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action by the plaintiff, Latham, against the defendants the city of Los Angeles and one L. M. Bigelow, to quiet title to certain tracts of land in the city of Los Angeles, but by stipulation between the plaintiff and the said city, filed in the court below, the only portion of the property described in the complaint, now in litigation, is the lot known as the "Engine-House Lot." There was also a stipulation entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant Bigelow by which it was agreed, in addition to other matters, that the plaintiff and said Bigelow were "equally interested and held in equal and undivided parts the lot known as the 'Engine-House Lot.'" The judgment of the court below was to the effect that the plaintiff and said defendant Bigelow are the owners, in equal shares, of said engine-house lot, and that the city of Los Angeles has no right in or title to the same. The defendant city moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the judgment and the order denying its motion for a new trial, appeals. The appeal is from the whole judgment, and the defendant Bigelow has not been served with notice of appeal. The findings support the judgment. The plaintiff derails title through a grant, or order, made by the ayuntamiento of the pueblo of Los Angeles to one Leandry, and the possession given him by the alcalde, in pursuance of such order.

That the pueblo had authority to make the grant of the land in question to said Leandry, if it was a house lot, is not questioned; but it is claimed—as we understand the contention of appellant—that the grant is void for uncertainty, and for the further reason that prior to the alleged grant, which was in 1836, the land in question had become a public plaza or street, and for that reason could not be granted for private purposes. We think, however, that the petition and the orders made by the authorities of the pueblo thereon, and the report of the alcalde describing the land, of which he had given Leandry possession by order of the ayuntamiento, when read together, as they must be, are sufficiently definite, and that the calls therein embrace the land in controversy was shown upon the trial by uncontradicted extrinsic evidence. Nor is the evidence sufficient to show that at the date of this grant the lot in controversy was a public plaza, and therefore beyond the authority of the pueblo to grant. It does appear that it was vacant, and that it was used by owners of adjacent lots in going to and from such lots, but it is not shown that such lots were granted, with reference to this lot, as a plaza, or that it ever had been in any manner set apart or recognized by the authorities as a plaza. It is also shown that upon certain days the public would use it as a place for celebrating, and for other public amusements. But all of this only shows that, being vacant and unoccupied, it was used as any other vacant land might have been, and it is not sufficient to overthrow the presumption that the authorities of the pueblo of Los Angeles acted within the limits of official authority in making to Leandry the grant or concession in question. That such presumption attaches to the grant we are considering is the effect of the decisions of this court in Cohas v. Raisin, 3 Cal. 453; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220.

We cannot say that the evidence in this case is such that the trial court must necessarily have found that since said grant Leandry, or any of those who have succeeded to his title, dedicated the lot in question to the public as a plaza, and such being the state of the proof we do not feel authorized to set aside its finding upon this point. When it is sought to show that an owner has, without a conveyance, divested himself of title to land in favor of the public, by way of gift or abandonment, the proof ought to be such as to clearly show that such was the owner's intent. In Grube v. Nichols, 36 Ill. 92, it is said: "The intention to dedicate is a vital controlling element in such a grant. A dedication is not an act of omission to assert a right, but it is the affirmative act of the mind of the donor. It arises upon the action and not upon the passive condition of the mind of the owner. The mere non-assertion of a right does not establish a dedication, unless the circumstances establish the purpose or intention to donate the use to the public." There is no evidence in the record of any express declaration or admission by Leandry, or any successor in interest, showing that such dedication was made.

The petition of Mrs. O'Campo praying for "an exchange or indemnification for certain lands belonging to her and now occupied by the public, being the lot at the entrance of Negro alley, into the public square," supposing it to refer to the land in controversy, is not an admission that the same had been dedicated to the public. It is rather an assertion of her right to it, and willingness to either accept pay for it or an exchange of other lands; and the action of the city council directing a concession to be made to her of other land, in accordance with her petition, is not consistent with the claim now made that the lot in controversy was then the property of the city. It would appear from the evidence that in accordance with this resolution of the city council, a deed was drawn up and signed by the mayor, conveying to Mrs. O'Campo a certain lot in the city of Los Angeles. But whether this was actually delivered to her does not so clearly appear. It was, however, delivered to one Olvera, supposed by the mayor to be her agent. But the deed itself was not produced, nor any witness who had ever seen it in the possession of Mrs. O'Campo, and it was admitted that subsequent thereto the city had conveyed the same lot to another. We cannot say from this evidence that the exchange contemplated by the petition of Mrs. O'Campo and the city council was ever consummated. And in this connection it may be added that the testimony shows that the first public act by which the city attempted to assert dominion over the lot in controversy was by building the engine-house, which was in 1884. The conclusion which we have thus reached upon the merits makes it unnecessary to determine whether the failure to make the defendant Bigelow a party to this appeal entitles the respondent to a judgment dismissing the appeal, and upon this point we express no opinion. Judgment and order affirmed.

INJUNCTION—PLEADING—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER.

1. The complaint alleged that defendant A. levied attachments on B.'s land; that B. was adjudged an insolvent, and A. proved her claims against him; that thereafter, by consent, the insolvency proceedings were dismissed, and B. executed to plaintiffs an assignment for the benefit of his creditors of all his property, including said land; that plaintiffs accepted the trust; that said levies were dissolved; that A. obtained judgments in said attachment suits, and executions were issued, and the sheriff had levied on the land, and, unless restrained by injunction, would sell it, and prevent plaintiffs executing their trust. Held, that the complaint was not demurrable as not stating a cause of action, as, even if the debtor had an attachable interest by reason of his right to any residue, the complaint alleged a threatened sale not of such interest, but of the land; and, under Civil Code Cal. § 3457, where an assignment for benefit of creditors is made, the creditors must avail themselves of the assets without preference, or not at all.

2. Ambiguity and uncertainty being made separate grounds of demurrer by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 430, subd. 7, a demurrer on the ground that the complaint is ambiguous "and" uncertain cannot be sustained, where the complaint is defective in only one of said respects.

3. Though the assignment to plaintiffs would be void if the affidavit required by Civil Code Cal. § 3462, was not attached to and filed with the inventory, and plaintiffs would be without legal capacity to sue, still the complaint is not demurrable by reason of its failure to allege such attachment and filing, as, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 483, the omission of the complaint to show plaintiffs' legal capacity to sue must be taken advantage of by answer.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

J. C. Campbell, for appellants. Carter & Smith, for respondents.

GIBSON, C. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a final judgment entered against them upon defendants' demurrer to their complaint, praying that defendants be enjoined from selling the realty in controversy under certain writs of execution. It appears by the complaint that Ella Averill, on the 6th day of October, 1885, commenced two separate actions, in the superior court of San Joaquin county, against M. E. Bryant to recover of him the amounts due upon two promissory notes, and, on the same day, caused a writ of attachment to issue in each action, and be levied upon certain real estate then belonging to Bryant; that thereafter, on the 31st day of the same month, Bryant was by and in the same court adjudged an insolvent debtor, against whom the said creditor Averill, on the 27th day of the same month, proved her several claims, including the two promissory notes above mentioned; that on or about the 30th day of January, 1886, by the consent of defendant Averill, as such creditor, and all the other creditors, the insolvency proceedings were by an order of the court duly dismissed; that, on the 16th day of February, 1886, Bryant, being still insolvent, at the request of defendant Averill and his other creditors, executed and delivered to plaintiffs a deed of assignment of all his property not exempt from execution, for the benefit of his creditors, pursuant to division 4, pt. 2, tit. 3, of the Civil Code, which deed embraced the real estate levied upon by the writs of attachment above mentioned; that the plaintiffs, as such assignees, accepted the trust, and in due time qualified, as required by law, and entered upon, and still continue in, the discharge of the duties of the said trust; that the said deed and a proper inventory were duly filed for record; that defendant Averill assented to the execution and delivery of the deed of assignment to the plaintiffs, and also to the acceptance by plaintiffs of the trust thus created; that, since the said trust was created, the plaintiffs have been the owners, and in the possession of the real estate in controversy, in trust for the benefit of all of the creditors of Bryant, including the defendant Averill; that, prior to the execution of said deed, the levies under the writs of attachment above mentioned were dissolved; that on the 21st day of September, 1887, in the superior court aforesaid, the defendant Averill obtained a judgment in her favor in each of the suits upon the promissory notes, and caused a writ of execution, regular in form, to issue in each case, and to be placed in the hands of her co-defendant Cunningham, as sheriff of San Joaquin county, for service; that the said sheriff has, by virtue of said writs of execution, levied upon and threatens to, and, unless restrained by injunction, will, sell the real estate in question, and thereby cast a cloud upon the plaintiffs' title thereto, which will prevent them from executing their trust expeditiously, and with advantage to the creditors of Bryant; that the said execution levies were made for the express purpose of hindering the plaintiffs from executing their trust. The grounds of the demurrer are—First, insufficiency of the facts stated to constitute a cause of action; second, ambiguity and uncertainty of the facts in certain specified particulars; third, incapacity of the plaintiffs to sue, because it does not appear that the inventory was verified, as required by section 3462 of the Civil Code.

1. In support of the first ground of demurrer, the respondents contend that the assignor still retains an equitable interest in the land in controversy, which was included in the deed of assignment, and that it is subject to sale upon execution. But this argument does not apply to the facts. The allegation is, that the defendant Cunningham, as sheriff, has levied upon and threatens to sell, not only the assignor's equitable interest in the residuum of the property assigned, but the whole of the property itself, thereby including the assignees' legal title thereto, as well as the equitable interest of the assignor in the residuum, if there should be any. The deed of assignment is controlled by the provisions of the Civil Code relative to trusts. Civil Code, § 3449. Those provisions, so far as applicable here, are as follows: "Sec. 863. Except as hereinafter otherwise provided, every express trust in real property, valid as such in its creation, vests the whole estate in the trustees, subject only to the execution of the trust. The beneficiaries take no estate or interest in the property, but may enforce the performance of the trust. Sec. 864. Notwithstanding anything contained in the last section, the author of a trust may, in its creation, prescribe to whom the real property to which the trust relates shall belong, in the event of the failure or termination of the trust, and may transfer or devise such property, subject to the execution of the trust." The trust created by the deed of assignment here relates to real property, and was expressly created for the benefit of the creditors of the assignor. There was no reservation in it of any estate or interest to the assignor, except that authorized by section 864, supra, wherein the assignor provides that the residuum left after his creditors are satisfied shall be returned to him, his executors, administrators, or assigns. No other estate or interest could be reserved in a trust of this character. Subdivision 4, § 3457, of the Civil Code. The effect of the deed, then, was to divest the assignor of his entire interest and estate in the property assigned, subject to the right to a reconveyance of any residue remaining undisposed of after the creditors are satisfied, or payment of the overplus of the proceeds of the sales of the property. This is in accordance with the weight of authority in other jurisdictions, as shown in Burrill on Assignments, (5th Ed.) § 298. Under our law as declared in the Civil Code, an insolvent may, in good faith, make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, with or without the consent of the latter, and, when such an assignment is made, the creditors must either avail themselves of the assets without preference, (section 3457,) or not at all. The object of the law is to enable a debtor, through his assignee, to dispose of his property for the benefit of his creditors. This object would be defeated, if one of the creditors could ignore the assignment, and sell the property to satisfy his particular claim. Such a sale would, if it could be made, deprive the assignees of the property, or, if it would not, still the sale would cloud the title of the assignees, because, in any action they might have to prosecute for the removal of the cloud so cast, the evidence of the pur-chaser's title would show that such latter title was derived from the assignor, to overcome which, the assignees would have to prove that the judgments were obtained in actions commenced before the deed of assignment was made upon debts covered and provided for by the deed of assignment. Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127; Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 165; Roth v. Insley, (Cal.) 24 Pac. Rep. 838. Such a cloud, it is evident, would prevent them from disposing of the property to the advantage of the creditors in the performance of their trust. The respondents further contend that the threatened sales, if made, would not cast a cloud upon the assignees' title to the property, inasmuch as the judgments, upon which the executions were issued, were obtained subsequent to the assignment, and therefore all that could pass under the sales would be the equitable interest of the assignor in the residuum of the property assigned. But the facts here show that the actions, in which she obtained her several judgments, were begun upon subsisting credits before the assignment was made, and that, as such a creditor, she assented to the assignment. Therefore she is one of the creditors for whose benefit the assignment was made, and as such must take her proportionate share with the other creditors. Besides, as already shown, the execution levies were not restricted to the equitable interest of the assignor in the residuum, but were made upon the whole property. It is further claimed by the respondents that as the complaint shows that defendant Averill acquired a lien by attachment in each of the actions in which she obtained her judgments, above mentioned, before the assignment was made, and as it does not appear that those attachments were dissolved, the liens so acquired became merged in the judgments, and, in consequence, she is entitled to sell the realty in question to satisfy such judgments. But it is distinctly alleged that those attachments were dissolved, but the date is not stated. If, however, the absence of the date renders it insufficient, it appears from the allegations respecting the insolvency proceedings which preceded the assignment, and which are pleaded as matters of inducement, that the attachments were levied within one month prior to Bryant's filing his petition in insolvency. Since this is so, the attachments became dissolved by operation of law, (insolvent act of 1890, § 17,) and that which is implied by law need not be pleaded, (Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 209, 22 Pac. Rep. 1137.)

2. The second ground of demurrer is in the conjunctive; that is, that the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain. These are made separate grounds of demurrer by subdivision 7 of section 430 of the Code of Civil Procedure. And, in the case of Kraner v. Halsey, supra, it was held that, where such separate grounds of demurrer are conjoined, the complaint must be defective on each, or the demurrer must be overruled. There the complaint was held to be neither ambiguous nor unintelligible, but uncertain in several particulars, and the demurrer upon the ground of ambiguity, unintelligibility, and uncertainty, not sustainable. In this case, we do not think the complaint is ambiguous. There is but one respect in which it may be said to be so, and that is wherein it is stated that the defendant Averill, as a creditor, proved her claim in the insolvency proceedings several days before Bryant was adjudged an insolvent. But, as those proceedings were dismissed, this allegation is immaterial. The complaint is uncertain with regard to dates, as in Kraner v. Halsey, as well as in several other respects, but, as it is not both ambiguous and uncertain, it comes within the rule of that case.

3. As to the capacity of the plaintiffs to maintain this action as assignees, it is urged that, as it does not appear from the complaint, that the affidavit required by section 3462 of the Civil Code was attached to and filed with the inventory, the assignment in consequence was void, and the plaintiffs are therefore without legal capacity to sue. In the case of District No. 110 v. Feck, 60 Cal. 405, this court said: "The defendants demurred to the complaint. The first ground of demurrer is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The objections specified are, in substance, that it does not appear from the complaint that the plaintiff was ever duly created a swamp and overflowed land district. That objection, however, if well taken, would go to the legal capacity of the plaintiff to sue, and not to the sufficiency of the facts stated to constitute a cause of action. Bank v. Donnell, 40 N. Y. 410. A demurrer on the ground that plaintiff has not the legal capacity to sue would be bad, because it does not appear upon the face of the complaint that the plaintiff has not. It is not a good ground of demurrer that it does not appear in the complaint that the plaintiff has the legal capacity to sue. That omission can only be taken advantage of by answer. Code Civil Proc. § 433; Bank v. Donnell, supra." See, also, Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. Rep. 195. In the present case it appears by sufficient allegations, the defect not having been specially pointed out under the first ground of demurrer, that Bryant made a valid assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and that the plaintiffs, as assignees thereunder, accepted the trust, and duly qualified as such assignees. It therefore appears affirmatively that the plaintiffs have the legal capacity to sue. And if it be a fact that the affidavit, which seems to be essential to the validity of the assignment, (Civil Code, §§ 3461-3463, 3465; Beardsley v. Frame, (Cal.) 24 Pac. Rep. 721,) was omitted, then, under the rule applied in District No. 110 v. Feck, supra, such omission must be set up in the answer, because it does not affirmatively appear upon the face of the complaint that such affidavit was omitted. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, and grant defendants leave to answer within the usual time.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C. C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, and grant defendants leave to answer within the usual time.

INSANE PERSONS—COMMITMENT TO ASYLUM—APPEAL—REHEARING.

1. Pol. Code Cal. § 2217, provides that, where it appears to a judge that a person against whom complaint has been made is insane, he must order his confinement in the insane asylum. Code Civil Proc. § 1784, provides that if, on petition of a friend, it shall appear that a person is mentally incompetent to manage his property, the court shall appoint a guardian of his person and estate, and section 1766 provides that, on restoration of his mental capacity, it shall be so adjudged by the court, and the guardianship shall cease. Pol. Code, § 2197, provides that insane persons received in the asylum must, upon recovery, be discharged therefrom. By Act Cal. March 9, 1885, (Pol. Code, p. 350), the resident physician must discharge persons who have been improperly committed. Held, that the discharge of an inmate of an insane asylum, over whom no guardian had been appointed, restored him to legal capacity to sue without any further adjudication of his restoration to sanity.

2. The order of commitment of a person to an insane asylum is not conclusive that such person was insane at the time of the commitment.

ON REHEARING.

A rehearing will not be granted in order to consider points not made in the argument upon which the case was originally submitted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

J. M. Damron and Chapman Bros., for appellant. Wells, Guthrie & Lee and Gottschalk & Luckel, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. The purpose of this action is to recover from the defendants damages for a malicious prosecution of the plaintiff as an insane person, and causing him to be unlawfully arrested and committed to the insane asylum at Stockton. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the court. The plaintiff declined to amend his complaint, and final judgment was thereupon rendered against him, dismissing his complaint, and for costs, from which he appeals on the judgment roll. The grounds of demurrer are that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and "that it appears upon the face of the complaint that the plaintiff has not the legal capacity to sue herein." The substance of those parts of the complaint relevant to these grounds of demurrer is as follows: That on January 28, 1889, the defendants willfully, maliciously, unlawfully, and without probable cause, "caused and procured the plaintiff to be arrested and committed to the state insane asylum at Stockton, state of California, on the charge of insanity; that under and by virtue of said commitment plaintiff was unlawfully and against his will detained and imprisoned in said state insane asylum at Stockton, on said charge of insanity, for and during the period from said 28th day of January, 1889, up to and including the 20th day of February, 1889, whereupon said plaintiff was then and there given leave of absence, and afterwards, to-wit, April 13, 1889, was discharged; that plaintiff was not on said 28th of January, 1889, or ever at any other time, before or since said day, dangerously insane, or insane at all, nor was he at any of said times so far disordered in his mind as to injure health, person, or property, all of which was known by said defendants before and at the time of said arrest and commitment."

The learned counsel for respondents contend that the demurrer was properly sustained, on the ground that the plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue, for the reasons: (1) That it appears on the face of the complaint that the plaintiff had been adjudged to be insane on January 28, 1889, by the judge of a court of record, pursuant to section 2217 of the Political Code, relating to commitments to the state insane asylums; and (2) that such adjudication is conclusive upon the plaintiff not only that he was insane at the time he was so adjudged, but that he continued to be insane at the time this action was commenced, unless before that time he had been found to be of sound mind, and capable of taking care of himself and property, as authorized by section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is true that where guardians have been appointed for persons who, by reason of their insanity, imbecility, or habitual drunkenness, are mentally incompetent to manage their property, under statutes in other states similar to article 2, tit. 11, pt. 3, of our Code of Civil Procedure, (sections 1763-1766,) it has been held that an adjudication of such incompetency is conclusive against all persons dealing with the ward until he is restored to capacity to manage his own affairs, by an order of court similar to that authorized by section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The cases of Wadsworth v. Sharpsteen, 8 N. Y. 388, and Imhoff v. Witmer's Adm'r, 31 Pa. St. 243, are fair samples of the strongest cases to this effect. In the latter case the court said: "The object of the statute was protection and guardianship over persons and estates of parties wanting capacity to take proper care of either, and to preserve the property of such from being squandered or improvidently used to their own injury and that of their families, if they have any. It is not necessary to adduce reasons to prove the self-evident proposition that, to admit the capacity of control to exist in the lunatic or habitual drunkard over his estate, after inquisition settling his condition in this respect, or submit it to be controverted by evidence of lucid intervals or sobriety at the moment of contracting, would leave the estates of these unfortunate classes about as much exposed as before proceedings had in regard to them. The inquisition and decree, standing of record, was intended for notice to all the world of the incapacity of the particular party to contract. It is the judgment of the law to this effect, and, as a consequence, his acts in regard to his property are absolutely void while the condition exists." In the case cited from 8 N. Y. the court said: "The right of the committee to the custody and control of the property is not superseded during the drunkard's sober intervals, and therefore, during such intervals, the drunkard has no more authority to deal with, or dispose of, the property, than while he is in a state of intoxication. If it were otherwise, the proceedings would furnish a very ineffectual security against waste and improvidence. Every transaction would be open to litigation upon the question whether it took place while the drunkard was in a state of sobriety or intoxication, and the committee could not execute his trust with safety to himself, or benefit to the drunkard or his family." These quotations are made merely to show that the reasons assigned in those cases for holding an adjudication of incompetency conclusive until set aside cannot be applied to the order of a judge in this state committing a person to the state insane asylum, under the provisions of the Political Code, although they may be applicable to adjudications of our courts in proceedings had under section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But, whether the reasons assigned in those cases are to be considered sufficient for holding an adjudication of incompetency, under section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure, conclusive against the person adjudged incompetent until set aside, as therein provided, need not be decided in this case, since it seems clear that the proceeding against insane and other mentally incompetent persons, authorized by the Code of Civil Procedure, is entirely distinct from the proceedings authorized by the Political Code for the commitment of insane persons to the state insane asylum. The provision in section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizing the court to restore the person adjudged insane or incompetent to capacity is only applicable to persons adjudged insane or incompetent, and for whom guardians have been appointed under section 1764 of the same Code. The application of it to persons committed to the asylums would be utterly inconsistent with the government of those institutions according to the requirements and regulations of the Political Code. After a person has been committed to either of the insane asylums on a charge of insanity, and received into the asylum, no court in this state is authorized to discharge him therefrom, or to restore him to the capacity of a sane person, under any circumstances, except upon writ of habeas corpus. The power to discharge him otherwise than upon habeas corpus is vested exclusively in the officers of the asylum. Section 2197 of the Political Code provides: "Insane persons received in the asylums must, upon recovery, be discharged therefrom." This implies the power to determine whether or not the patient has recovered. By an act of March 9, 1885, the resident physician is authorized, and it is made his duty, to discharge persons who have been improperly committed, (Deer. Pol. Code, p. 350.) By another act of March 9, 1885, (Deer. Pol. Code, p. 342.) it is provided that the kindred or friends of an inmate of the asylum may apply to the judge who committed him for an order to be directed to the trustees of the asylum for his removal to their custody, and, upon their proving that they are capable and suited to take care of him, and to give protection against his insane acts, the judge may issue the order. But the act further provides that "the trustees shall reject all other orders or applications for the release or removal of any insane person, except the order of a court or judge on proceedings in habeas corpus." See, also, a like provision in section 19 of "An act to provide for the future management of the Napa State Asylum," approved March 6, 1876, (St. 1875-76, p. 133.) It would seem, therefore, not only that the power to discharge an inmate of the asylum is vested solely in the officers of the asylum, but that such power is to be exercised upon one of two grounds only: (1) That the insane inmate has recovered; and (2) that he had been improperly committed. I think the effect of a discharge on either ground, if no guardian had been appointed under the act of March 9, 1885, (Deer. Pol. Code, p. 342,) would be to restore the person discharged to legal capacity to sue. A discharge on the first ground is an adjudication, by competent authority, that the person had recovered from insanity; and a discharge on the second ground, by like authority, overrules or nullifies the order of commitment, and leaves the person committed in the same status, as to capacity to sue, that he was in before he was committed. Civil Code, § 40. Besides, I think the order of commitment is not conclusive evidence against the plaintiff in this action of his insanity at any time, or of probable cause for the prosecution of which he complains; for, if it is so, it is difficult to conceive how he is to prove a cause of action which depends upon the truth of his averments that he was not insane to the degree required by section 2217 of the Political Code, or at all, at the time the order was made, and that the prosecution was without probable cause. If he is estopped, by the order of commitment, from proving these averments, it would seem to follow that no action for a malicious prosecution on a charge of insanity, resulting in an order of commitment, can be maintained; yet the authorities sanction such actions. Cooley, Torts, § 176 et seq. That the order of commitment would not thus estop or conclude the plaintiff in a proceeding by writ of habeas corpus is obvious, and we have seen that it is not final, or conclusive as to the resident physician of the asylum, whose duty it is to disregard it, if, in his opinion, it was not properly made. Indeed, the final determination, as to whether the person committed is insane or not, is to be made and announced by the resident physician of the asylum. The proceeding before the judge is only preliminary, and is analogous to the preliminary examination of a criminal charge by a magistrate. As the only ground of demurrer argued here is that the plaintiff has not the legal capacity to sue, and no particular in which the complaint fails to state a cause of action has been suggested by counsel, or discovered, I think the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: BELCHER, C.C., and HAYNE, C.

ON REHEARING.

(Jan. 17, 1891.)

PER CURIAM. In submitting this case for decision, respondents argued but a single point raised by their demurrer to the appellant's complaint. We considered that objection, and decided it correctly. In their petition for a rehearing, other objections to the complaint are called to our attention; but we have decided—and with manifest propriety—that we will not grant a rehearing in order to consider points not made in the argument upon which the case was originally submitted. A respondent whose demurrer has been sustained by the superior court ought to fairly present in this court every objection upon which he relies. We cannot be expected to scrutinize the record for the purpose of discovering points which counsel have not taken the trouble to specify. Rehearing denied.

BALL v. KEHL. (No. 13,808.)

INJUNCTION—DIVERSION OF WATER—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY.

Plaintiff alleged that by adverse user he had acquired the right to the water in defendant's mill-race for irrigation and domestic purposes, when the mill was not running; that defendant had deprived him of the use of the water at such times, and threatened to continue the deprivation; and he prayed that defendant be restrained therefrom. The court found that on a certain day defendant did so deprive plaintiff of the use of the water. Held sufficient to sustain an injunction, in the absence of any finding as to how long such deprivation lasted, or as to whether defendant threatened to continue it.

Curtis & Otis and Henry M. Willis, for appellant. H. C. Rolfe, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The complaint alleges, in substance, that the defendant had, by means of a canal, appropriated the waters of a certain creek for the purpose of operating a mill owned by him, and that, subject to the use and right to use said water by the defendant, the plaintiff has for 12 years last past appropriated and used adversely to defendant for irrigation, agricultural, and domestic purposes the water so flowing in said canal, whenever the said mill was not being run; that upon August 10, 1888, while the said mill was not running, the defendant, without right, deprived plaintiff of the use of said water, and has ever since continued to deprive plaintiff of its use; and that "defendant threatens so to deprive plaintiff of the use of any of said water at all times, even when said mill is not being run or operated, nor said water needed for running or operating the same." The answer of the defendant contained a denial of these allegations. The court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and enjoining the defendant from depriving plaintiff of the use or flow of the water of said canal, except at such times as said water may be needed and actually used for running and operating said mill. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The findings do not support the judgment. The court finds that the defendant did, on the 10th of August, 1888, and while he was not using the water for the operation of his mill, deprive the plaintiff of the use of said water by closing a certain waste-gate, but there is an entire omission to find how long such deprivation continued, or whether defendant ever threatened or threatens to continue so to deprive plaintiff of the use of said water at times when said mill is not being run, or the water is needed for running the same. The allegation that defendant's act was continuing, and that he threatened to continue to deprive plaintiff of all use of the water in controversy, was a material one. Without it, the complaint would not state facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the injunction asked for and obtained, and the failure of the court to find upon this issue tendered by the complaint is necessarily fatal to the judgment. This conclusion is sustained by the case of Coker v. Simpson, 7 Cal. 340, in which it was said: "The complaint seems insufficient to sustain that part of the judgment granting the injunction. It is simply alleged, in substance, that defendant, between certain specified dates, diverted the waters of the stream, to the plaintiff's damage, in a sum stated. There is no allegation that the injury was continuing, or threatened to be continued, or likely to be continued. The circumstances stated are sufficient for a recovery of damages, but no equitable facts are alleged to sustain the injunction. The writ of injunction, though remedial, must be based upon equitable circumstances. From all that appears in the complaint, the injury was only temporary, and not likely to continue." And so in this case it may be said, from all that appears in the findings of the court, plaintiff's injury was only temporary and past, and not likely to continue at any time in the future. See, also, Water Co. v. Chapman, 8 Cal. 392. This view renders it unnecessary to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court, as the reversal of the judgment compels a reversal of the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Judgment and order reversed.

PETTINGER v. FAST. (No. 13,735.)

VENDOR, AND VENDEE—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff sold his farm to defendant for $4,000, and one-half of the excess above that sum for which the farm might be sold within two years. In an action for the balance of purchase money the complaint alleged that defendant had sold the farm for $8,000, and the court so found. The evidence showed that he sold the farm for $6,000, reserving the timber thereon. Held, that this would not support the finding, though it was shown that the timber reserved was worth $2,000.

DE HAVEN, J. Action to recover the sum of $1,950, alleged to be due plaintiff for the balance of the purchase price of land conveyed by plaintiff to defendant. The court below gave plaintiff judgment for that sum, and also denied defendant's motion for a new trial, and the defendant appeals from such judgment and order. The facts as found show that on November 17, 1886, plaintiff executed to appellant a deed of his farm, the appellant agreeing, in writing, to pay therefor the sum of $4,000, and to give one-half of all in excess of that sum which "the farm can be sold for within two years," such additional sum "to be also a part of the purchase price, when so sold for a larger sum." It is also found that on September 1, 1887, "appellant entered into an agreement in writing with one Ed. Culbert, whereby he sold to said Culbert the said parcels of land for the sum of $8,000."

The principal question to be determined on this appeal is whether the finding of the court in relation to the sale of the land is justified by the evidence. It was shown upon the trial that on September 1, 1887, the appellant and one Culbert entered into an agreement in writing by which the appellant "promises and agrees to sell and convey unto the party of the second part, [Culbert,] and to make and execute and deliver to him a deed" of the land purchased by appellant from the plaintiff in this action, the said Culbert "to have and to hold all and singular said premises, together with all the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, * * * except that portion of the timber thereon hereinafter mentioned and reserved unto the party of the first part." The agreement further recited that the appellant was to have all the timber on said land, "except that on the southern line of the mesa, adjoining the Rincon rancho, and on the east end of said mesa." It is clear that under appellant's agreement with respondent, an actual sale of the farm within the time limited was not indispensably necessary in order to establish as a fact the price for which it could have been sold, and thus fix the liability of appellant thereunder. The appellant would not have been at liberty to reject any bona fide offer of purchase for a sum exceeding $5,000 without the consent of the respondent. But the complaint alleges an actual sale to Culbert for the sum of $8,000, and the court so finds, and it is therefore necessary to consider whether such fact was established upon the trial. The appellant insists that there was no sale to Culbert at all, but only an agreement to sell; but we are of opinion that such contention cannot be sustained. In the case of Eaton v. Richerl, 83 Cal. 185, 23 Pac. Rep. 286, the plaintiff therein was to wait for any balance that might be due him until certain mining property was sold and an executory contract for the sale of the mine was made, and the court held that the plaintiff could recover, saying: "The word 'sold' does not necessarily, and in all connections, mean that a conveyance must be made, or that the title must pass." The fact that no money was received by appellant on the contract is immaterial. The transaction was none the less a sale, and by it the equitable title of the property sold passed to Culbert. But in one respect the evidence does not sustain the finding of the court as to this sale. The written agreement of sale contained a reservation of standing timber, and, we think, notwithstanding some confusion in the evidence, that the real transaction between appellant and Culbert was a sale of the farm for the sum of $6,000, the appellant reserving the growing timber thereon as specified in the contract of sale. The fact that this timber may have been estimated by both appellant and Culbert as of the value of $2,000, or that appellant's price for the land with timber standing was $8,000, and with a reservation of such timber $6,000, cannot change the terms of the actual sale, as made to appear by the written contract of sale. By that contract, as we have said, the farm was sold for the sum of $6,000, the appellant reserving as an interest therein the standing timber referred to, and proof of such a contract is at variance with the contract alleged in the complaint and found by the court, and the finding that the farm was sold for the sum of $8,000 is not sustained by the evidence. Undoubtedly the respondent's right to recover on his contract is not limited to the sum agreed to be paid by Culbert, but if he seeks to recover more it must be upon a complaint which shows the facts as they really exist. It is clear that upon the execution of the contract of sale appellant disabled himself from thereafter accepting any bona fide offer for the farm, and the respondent became entitled to recover, not only upon the basis of the price agreed to be paid by Culbert, but in addition thereto one-half of the market value of the standing timber reserved, or, at his option, one-half of the net sum for which such timber may have been sold by appellant. Judgment and order reversed.

McFADDEN et ux. v. SANTA ANA, O. & T. ST. RY. CO. (No. 13,919.)

IMPUTED NEGLIGENCE—HUSBAND AND WIFE—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. By Civil Code Cal. §§ 162-164, 169, damages recovered for personal injuries to the wife are community property, and by section 172 the husband has the management and power of disposition of such property. Held, that the husband is a necessary party to an action for injuries to the wife, and his contributory negligence is imputable to her.

2. In an action for personal injuries, it is competent for defendant to ask plaintiff, on cross-examination, whether she called a doctor on the night of the accident; she having testified in her own behalf as to her injuries, and the pain she suffered.

3. In such action defendant should be allowed to ask plaintiff's physician, on cross-examination, what he considered the serious ailment at the time he was called to see her, and what treatment was advised.

2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKINLEY, Judge.

Victor Montgomery and O. Caswell, for appellant. Charles S. McKelvey, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for damages alleged to have been sustained by a personal injury to the wife alone, through the negligence of defendant. On May 26, 1888, the defendant was a corporation owning and operating a street railroad running east and west through the center of Fourth street, in the city of Santa Ana, in Los Angeles county. On that day it caused an excavation to be made in that street about 6 feet wide, 50 feet long, and 10 inches in depth, on the north side of the railway, parallel with it, and about 6 feet from it, for the purpose of constructing a switch or turn-out, to be connected with the main railway, and for the construction of which it had permission from the city authorities. It is alleged in the complaint that the excavation was dangerous to travelers on the street during the nighttime, unless properly guarded and lighted; and that it was the duty of the defendant to guard and light it, so as to warn travelers of the danger, etc., which the defendant neglected to do on the night of May 26, 1888. The complaint then proceeds as follows: "That on, to-wit, the 26th day of May, 1888, the plaintiffs herein were lawfully driving along the same, and they, the plaintiffs, had no warning of, or notice of, the existence of the aforesaid excavation and obstructions, and they, the plaintiffs, saw no lights or barriers about the said excavation and obstructions, and, without any fault of either of the plaintiffs, they, the plaintiffs, came in collision with the said obstructions, and were drawn over the same into the excavation aforesaid, whereby Flora McFadden sustained great injuries in her person, and internal injuries by which her womb was displaced, and by reason of said injuries to her person and said internal injuries, she was confined to her bed for many months, and endured great physical and mental suffering. Her health is injured and impaired thereby, and the plaintiffs are informed and believe that the injuries sustained by Flora McFadden, in her person and to her health, are permanent and for life, and that the same were caused by the gross negligence, default, and carelessness of the defendant herein, by reason of all which the plaintiffs are damaged in the sum of $12,000." The answer of the defendant denies the alleged injuries to the plaintiff Flora; denies the alleged negligence on its part; and alleges contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. The case was tried by a jury. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs for $1,000. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The principal question for decision arises upon instructions to the jury as to the effect of contributory negligence, if any there was, on the part of the husband alone. At the request of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury that if they found that the plaintiff Flora was injured by the negligence of the defendant, without any negligence on her part, and that the negligence of her husband, if any, only contributed to the injuries, the jury could not attribute the husband's negligence to her, and should assess such damages as will compensate her for injuries proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant. And again: "If you find from the evidence that the negligence of Robert McFadden, if any, only contributed to the injury complained of, if any was sustained, his negligence cannot be imputed to Flora McFadden, and must not be regarded as her negligence." Defendant's counsel excepted to these instructions, and requested the court to instruct the jury that contributory negligence of the husband, if any, was imputable to the wife, and, under the circumstances of this case, would prevent a recovery; which the court refused to give. I think the court erred in giving these instructions, and in refusing to instruct, substantially, as requested by the defendant's counsel. Peck v. Railroad Co., 50 Conn. 379; Carlisle v. Sheldon, 38 Vt. 440; Yahn v. Ottumwa, 60 Iowa, 429, 15 N. W. Rep. 257; Huntoon v. Trumbull, 2 McCrary, 314, 12 Fed. Rep. 844; Beach, Contrib. Neg. pp. 113, 114, 284.

The right to recover damages for a personal injury, as well as the money recovered as damages, is property, and may be regarded as a chose in action, (Railroad Co. v. Dunn, 52 Ill. 280; And. Law Dict.;) and, if this right to damages is acquired by the wife during marriage, it, like the damages when recovered in money, is, in this state, community property of the husband and wife, (Civil Code, §§ 162-164, 169,) of which the husband has the management, control, and absolute power of disposition other than testamentary, (Id. § 172.) Consequently the wife cannot sue alone for damages on account of an injury to her person, as she is permitted to do "when the action concerns her separate property." Code Civil Proc. § 370; Tell v. Gibson, 66 Cal. 247, 5 Pac. Rep. 223. In these respects our Codes differ from the laws of those states in which the cases cited by appellants were decided, wherein the right to recover for a personal injury to the wife, and the money recovered, are deemed her separate property. In the case of Flori v. City of St. Louis, 3 Mo. App. 231, the husband and wife sued for a personal injury to the wife alone, and the trial court instructed the jury, in effect, that if the husband was guilty of negligence, directly contributory to the injury, there could be no recovery in the action. Of this instruction the appellate court said: "We do not so understand the law. The contributory negligence of the plaintiff will bar a recovery where the plaintiff is the injured party, and the recovery is for his benefit. But here the husband is merely a formal party, the cause of action belonging to the wife. Under our law, (Acts 1875, p. 61.) 'any personal property, including rights in action, * * * which has grown out of any violation of the personal rights' of a feme covert, is her separate property, and under her sole control, and is not liable for the debts of her husband." In Platz v. Cohoes, 24 Hun, 101, the decision that the negligence of the husband could not be imputed to the wife, in a case like this, was put solely upon the grounds that the wife was a mere passenger in her husband's wagon, and that her husband had no joint interest with her, and was in no way identified with her. On appeal from this decision of the supreme court, the court of appeals held that the question, as to contributory negligence of the husband, did not arise, and declined to decide it. 89 N. Y. 219. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Dunn, 52 Ill. 280, it was held that the right of the wife to sue for an injury to her person was her separate property, under a statute of that state providing that all property shall be separate property of the wife "which any married woman, during coverture, acquires in good faith, from any person other than her husband, by descent, devise, or otherwise." In Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (4th Ed. § 67) it is said: "But in New York, Missouri, and other states where the change has been radical, and married women have a right to recover, in such cases, damages for their own separate use, it is held that the negligence of the husband, while in company with his wife, is not chargeable to her, unless she encouraged him in it, or otherwise concurs in it." No other authority is cited for this than the cases above considered.

2. The appellant's counsel complain that the scope of their cross-examination of plaintiffs' witnesses was too much restricted by the court. Of the numerous exceptions taken on this ground, I think the following should be sustained: First. After the plaintiff Flora had testified on behalf of plaintiffs as to the injury, and the pain suffered by her immediately thereafter, defendant's attorney, on cross-examination, asked the following questions: "Question. Well, you was conscious, wasn't you? Answer. I was conscious of a very severe pain. Q. Well, you went home that night, and didn't call a doctor? Mr. McKelvey. We object. I don't think it responsive to the direct examination." The court sustained this objection, and the defendant's counsel excepted. Second. Dr. Ball, as an expert, testified in chief, on the part of the plaintiffs, that he visited the plaintiff Flora, about two weeks after the injury, in consultation with Mrs. Dr. Howe, the attending physician, and further testified that he examined the patient as to her condition at that time, and as to the probable causes of her ailments. On cross-examination defendant's counsel asked the following questions: "Question. You had a consultation, then, did you? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. What was the determination by you and the attending physician, as to what was the serious thing to attend to? Mr. Brusseau. I object to the evidence, for the reason that the same is immaterial and incompetent." The court sustained this objection, and defendant's counsel excepted. Third. Counsel then asked Dr. Ball what was the treatment advised then, (at the consultation.) The objection to this question, on the grounds that it was immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant, was sustained by the court, and counsel excepted. That all these questions were in the proper line of cross-examination, and that each of them might have elicited testimony which would have been competent, relevant, and material, seems too plain for argument. One of the witnesses, being a party testifying on her own behalf, as to the pain she suffered,—a matter as to which it would have been difficult to contradict her,—and the other testifying as an expert medical witness, their cross-examination should have been allowed a liberal range touching all matters testified to in chief, or tending to test the temper, bias, motives, intelligence, accuracy, credibility, or means of knowledge of the witness. Whether or not these errors, in excluding proper cross-examination, may have been prejudicial to the defendant, need not be determined, since the judgment should be reversed on the ground of error in the instructions to the jury. Other points are made by counsel for appellant, but, in my opinion, the record shows no other errors than those above considered. I think that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

BRUMLEY et al. v. FLINT. (No. 13,665.)

APPEAL—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

1. Where a witness is asked what, in his estimation, was the damage done by cattle trespassing on pasture land, and the question is objected to on the ground that it is "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial as asking for a conclusion, * * * and as not the proper way to prove damages," the point that the witness had not been shown to possess the requisite knowledge to express an opinion cannot be raised for the first time on appeal. Distinguishing Reed v. Drais, 67 Cal. 491, 8 Pac. Rep. 20.

2. Where, in an action for damage done by trespassing cattle, the evidence as to the number of the cattle, and the amount of damage, is conflicting, it cannot be said that a judgment for $325 is excessive, though the cattle were on the land only at times during two months, and plaintiff paid only a $1,000 rent for the land for the whole year, and, after the trespass, subleased it for $1,500.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

W. H. Spencer, for appellant. W. B. Dillard, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In December, 1887, one Chester R. Brumley leased from the owner 16,320 acres of grazing land for the year 1888. Between January 1 and February 7, 1888, the defendant's cattle wrongfully entered upon a portion of this land, and ate up, trod down, and destroyed the grass and feed growing thereon. In May, 1888, the said Brumley died, and thereafter the plaintiffs were duly appointed and qualified as executors of his will. The plaintiffs, as such executors, brought this action to recover damages for the alleged trespasses of defendant's cattle in the sum of $1,000. The case was tried before the court, without a jury, and by the judgment the plaintiffs were awarded the sum of $325, and costs of suit. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. At the trial, C. J. Brumley was called as a witness for plaintiffs, and, after stating that he was the son of Chester R. Brumley, and one of the plaintiffs, proceeded to testify as follows: "I know the land described in the complaint, and have known it for the past fifteen years. It is grazing land. I know defendant's cattle. They are branded with a star. I saw defendant's cattle on the land described in the complaint many times during January and February, 1888,—eight, nine, eleven, or twelve hundred of them,—and they were trespassing on the land. There were many fresh rain-water pools on the land, and the cattle ranged there. The ground was wet during these months, there having been a heavy snow-storm and much rain, and the cattle injured and damaged the pasture greatly by treading it down and eating it. For the last five years I have been in the cattle business near this land." The witness was then asked by plaintiffs' counsel to state what amount of damage, in his estimation, was done by the cattle during the time they were trespassing upon the land. The defendant objected to the question, "upon the ground that the same was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, as asking for a conclusion which the court was to arrive at from the facts given in testimony; and further as not the proper way to prove damages." The court overruled the objection, and the defendant reserved an exception. The witness then answered: "The damage from eating up, treading down, and destroying the grass on the land by defendant's cattle during the time you mention would, in my estimation, amount to $700 or $800." It is now urged for appellant that the ruling above mentioned was erroneous, because the witness had not been "shown to possess the requisite knowledge of the value of the property claimed to have been injured by defendant's cattle," and, in support of this position, Reed v. Drals, 67 Cal. 491, 8 Pac. Rep. 20, is cited. It is not claimed that the answer to the question, if given by a competent witness, would have been incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial, and upon that question we are not called upon to express an opinion. It will be observed here that the objection was not that the witness was incompetent, for want of sufficient knowledge, to testify as to the damages, but only that it was not the proper way to prove damages. The general rule is that "a party objecting to the admission of evidence must specify the ground of his objection when the evidence is offered, and will be considered as having waived all objections not so specified." People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 338. It is true that a general objection is sufficient, if the evidence objected to is absolutely inadmissible for any purpose. Nightingale v. Scaunell, 18 Cal. 315. But otherwise, to entitle the objection to notice, "the party should have laid his finger on the point at the time." Martin v. Travers, 12 Cal. 243; Cochran v. O'Keefe, 34 Cal. 558. Conceding therefore, without deciding, that the witness was not shown to possess the requisite knowledge to enable him to testify as to the damages, still we do not think the point made can be considered here, for the reason that that objection to the question was not taken. In Reed v. Drals, supra, there is nothing in conflict with what has been said. In that case, as shown by the record, a witness was asked to give the value of certain land, and the testimony was objected to, and excluded by the court, "on the ground that the witness had not shown himself competent to testify on that point." In affirming the judgment, the court, among other things, said: "There is no doubt that a witness acquainted with the value of property may give an opinion as to such value, but he must first be shown to possess the requisite knowledge, and then, although such knowledge is not the result of any peculiar skill in a particular pursuit, or branch of business, or department of science, he may yet be heard. Where, however, the knowledge is wanting, the opinion should be rejected. We think, therefore, the court did not err in refusing to admit the testimony."

2. It is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision of the court that plaintiffs were damaged in the sum of $325 by reason of the trespass. But the evidence was conflicting as to the number of cattle that committed the trespasses, and as to the damage done by them. On the part of the plaintiffs, the evidence tended to show that they were entitled to a larger sum than was awarded to them. The fact that the deceased, Brumley, paid, as rent for all the leased premises, only $1,000, and, some time after the trespass, subleased them for $1,500, is not controlling. We cannot say, therefore, that the judgment should be reversed or modified, because the damages allowed were excessive. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: VANCE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PEOPLE ex rel. LAINE v. TYRRELL. (No. 14,076.)

APPOINTMENT TO OFFICE—VACANCY—HOLDING OVER.

1. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 879, providing that "every officer shall continue to discharge the duties of his office, although his term has expired, until his successor has qualified," an appointee by the governor during a recess of the legislature, to fill a vacancy in the state board of health, holds until the qualification of his successor, notwithstanding section 1000 provides that such appointee shall only hold office until the adjournment of the next session of the legislature.

2. Although the governor issues a commission to such appointee for the entire balance of the unexpired term, its legal effect is to fill the vacancy only until the adjournment of the next session of the legislature.

3. Where the legislature fails to appoint a successor to the appointee, the governor cannot then appoint another, as there is no vacancy.

4. Where such appointee has duly qualified under the commission issued by the governor, and at the next session of the legislature his appointment is confirmed for the unexpired term, but no other commission is issued, the appointee holds under his first commission, and is not required to qualify again.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Clinton L. White, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and A. L. Hart, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. On November 17, 1884, during a recess of the legislature, a vacancy existed in the membership of the state board of health, and on that day the appellant, Tyrrell, was appointed a member of said board, and in the commission issued to him by the governor it was recited that he was thereby appointed a member of the state board of health, vice F. W. Hatch, deceased, for the term expiring January 11, 1888. Appellant duly qualified as such officer November 19, 1884, and since that date has continued to discharge the duties of said office. Upon January 20, 1885, the legislature being in session, the governor transmitted to the senate a message informing that body of appellant's said appointment, on November 17, 1884, "for the term of four years, vice F. W. Hatch, deceased," and the senate was requested to consent thereto. The senate took action upon said message, and the question, "Will the senate advise and consent to the appointment of G. G. Tyrrell of Sacramento as a member of the state board of health for the term of four years, vice F. W. Hatch, deceased?" was decided in the affirmative. The governor did not thereafter issue to appellant any commission for said office, nor has he since such action of the senate taken any oath of office as a member of said board. On March 18, 1889, during a recess of the legislature, the governor appointed the relator, Laine, to the said office of member of the state board of health, and upon that day he duly qualified as such. The judgment of the court below was in favor of the relator, and ousting the appellant from said office. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant, Tyrrell, appeals.

We think the commission issued by the governor to appellant on November 17, 1884, must be held to have legal effect, simply as an appointment to fill the vacancy then existing, until the adjournment of the next session of the legislature, as the governor was not authorized to make an appointment for any longer time than during the recess of the legislature. Pol. Code, § 1000. Upon the issuance of this commission the appointment to fill such vacancy temporarily was complete, and needed no action of the senate to confirm it. People v. Cazneau, 20 Cal. 504. And we think that under this commission the appellant was vested with the right to hold said office until the appointment and qualification of a successor in the mode provided by law. Section 879 of the Political Code declares: "Every officer must continue to discharge the duties of his office, although his term has expired, until his successor has qualified;" and section 1000 of the Political Code does not create an exception to this rule, in the case of officers temporarily appointed by the governor. The language of that section, "but the person so appointed can only hold the office until the adjournment of the next session of the legislature," simply means, when construed with section 879, as it must be, that the term of such appointed officer shall expire upon the adjournment of the next session of the legislature, and his successor may take his place; but, if no successor has been appointed, then the very condition of affairs intended to be provided for by section 879 has arisen, and that section applies. It is the settled law of this state that the mere expiration of the term of the incumbent of an office does not create a vacancy therein such as the governor alone is authorized to fill by the appointment of a successor. People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614; People v. Bissell, 49 Cal. 407. It would follow from this that the appointment of the relator during a recess of the legislature was invalid, unless, under section 996 of the Political Code, a vacancy was created by the failure of the appellant to take and file his official oath after the confirmation of the senate. The obligation to take and file such oath did not arise unless the message of the governor announcing the appointment of appellant during the recess, and the action of the senate advising and consenting to the same, constituted an appointment of appellant as his own successor. But, even construing these acts of the governor and senate as a nomination and confirmation of appellant as his own successor, (and whether they can be so construed we do not determine,) such appointment was not completed, no commission having been subsequently issued to the appellant. In the matter of an executive appointment, with the consent of the senate, the issuance of a commission is not a mere ministerial act, but is a part of the act of appointment. It is this act which completes the appointment, as well as perpetuates the evidence of it. People v. Murray, 70 N. Y. 526. And this is also the doctrine of the case of Conger v. Gilmer, 32 Cal. 76. It follows that the court below erred in rendering judgment for the relator upon the findings. Judgment and order reversed.

APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

Where no undertaking on appeal is filed within five days after service of the notice of appeal, as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 940, there is no appeal before the court to be considered or dismissed. Following Bellegrade v. Bridge Co., 80 Cal. 61, 22 Pac. Rep. 57, and overruling Reay v. Butler, ante, 350.

In bank. On rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The motion to dismiss the appeal in this case upon the showing made at the time the motion was submitted should have been overruled on the authority of Bellegrade v. Bridge Co., 80 Cal. 61, 22 Pac. Rep. 57, and cases therein cited. Since then the record has been filed here, which, it is claimed, shows that the undertaking on appeal was filed in time. ##### CLAIMS AGAINST EXECUTORS—ALLOWANCE—SALE OF LAND.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1536, providing that, when a sale of property is necessary to pay the debts of a decedent, or the charges of the administration, the executor may sell real estate for that purpose upon the order of the court, and section 1545, providing that, if the executor neglect to apply for an order of sale, any person may make application, one whose claim against the executor for services to the estate has been allowed by the court may make application for the sale of land to pay it, and the court has jurisdiction to settle and allow such claim, without waiting for the executor to pay it, and charge it as an expense of the administration.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1637, providing that the settlement and allowance of an executor's account is conclusive as to all interested, except those under disability, an order settling an executor's account, and allowing a claim included therein of a third person for services rendered the estate, is conclusive on the devisees who do not appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Leovy & Humes and Conklin & Hughes, for appellants. Trippett & Neale and Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. On May 29, 1889, the executrix filed an account of her administration of the estate from January 29, 1887, to February 1, 1889, which set forth, among other items of the same nature, a claim of $1,240.57 against the executrix by Cave J. Coutts, for services, money paid out, etc., "the validity of which charges against said estate" she asked the court to determine on the settlement of the account. After due notice, a hearing was had, and the account was settled. With respect to the item referred to, the court found that it was a legal charge against the estate, and authorized the executrix to pay Coutts out of any moneys that might thereafter come into her hands as executrix. On March 5, 1890, Coutts filed a petition asking for an order requiring the executrix to sell so much of the real estate as should be necessary to pay his claim. An order to show cause was issued, and at the trial the petitioner introduced evidence tending to support every material allegation of his petition, but, on motion of the devisees, a nonsuit was granted, and the proceeding dismissed. From this order, petitioner has appealed. It is admitted that the court in its decree settling the account made the order referred to, and that the executrix has not paid, and has not funds in her hands sufficient to pay, petitioner the amount allowed, but it is claimed that the nonsuit and dismissal were proper because the order of the court allowing Coutts $1,240.57 is void; that his claim, if any he had, was against the executrix, and, until she pays it, and presents it in her account as an expense of administration, the court cannot act upon it; that the claim is barred by the statute of limitations, but, if the appellant has any remedy at all, it is by execution against the executrix, under section 1647, Code Civil Proc. We think that the petition states facts sufficient, and that upon the evidence offered by petitioner the motion for nonsuit should have been denied. Section 1536, Code Civil Proc., provides that, "when a sale of property of the estate is necessary to pay * * * the debts outstanding against the decedent, or the debts, expenses, or charges of administration, the executor may also sell any real as well as personal property of the estate for that purpose, upon the order of the court;" and section 1545 provides that, "If the executor or administrator neglect to apply for an order of sale when it is necessary, any person may make application therefor in the same manner as the executor or administrator, * * * and the decree of sale must fix the period of time within which the executor or administrator must make the sale." These provisions were intended to afford creditors of the executors, as well as creditors of the decedent, the means of securing payment of their claims against the estate, and necessarily contemplate expenses of administration, which the executor neglects or refuses to pay. There is nothing in the statutes which requires payment of claims against the executor for services rendered, or materials furnished, the estate during administration, before they can be allowed in the settlement of his account. It would be a misfortune if there were. Where the representative of the estate has a doubt as to the legality of the claim, or the amount that should be paid for services rendered, or materials furnished, in the course of administration, it is proper for his own protection, as well as for the protection of the heirs, that the court should determine, after notice to all persons interested, whether the estate is liable at all, and, if so, in what amount. Dwinelle v. Henriquez, 1 Cal. 392; Gurnee v. Maloney, 38 Cal. 88. The order settling the account was appealable, and the allowance of the claim is conclusive against every one interested, except those laboring under disability. Sections 1637, 1638, Code Civil Proc.; Deck's Estate, 6 Cal. 669; Stott's Estate, 52 Cal. 406. The order appealed from is reversed, and the proceeding is remanded for a new trial.

(No. 14,063.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—FORECLOSURE—FINDINGS.

1. In a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien for painting and graining a house under a contract with defendant, findings that plaintiff substantially performed the contract, and also that some small places were left unfinished which would cost about five dollars to finish properly, are not contradictory.

2. Such findings are sufficient to support a judgment for plaintiff for the contract price, less five dollars.

3. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1192, provides that the owner's interest in land shall be subject to mechanics' liens for the erection of a building thereon under contract with the lessee, where the owner knows of the erection of such building and fails to give notice that he will not be responsible for it. Held, that the owner's interest may be sold on foreclosure of such mechanic's lien where he knew of the erection of the building, and, after its completion, made a payment to plaintiff on account of his work.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge. Brown & Daggett, for appellants. Lamberson & Taylor, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien. The plaintiffs contracted with the defendant Stuffebeck, who was the lessee of certain lands owned by the defendants Bashore, to do the work of painting, varnishing and graining upon some buildings which Stufflebeem was constructing for himself upon said lands, upon the completion of which they were to receive $145. The main issue presented in the case was whether the plaintiffs had completed the work according to their contract. The court found that the plaintiffs had substantially complied with all the terms of said contract, and completed said work on or about the 10th day of April, 1890, but that some small places in the house were not properly grained and finished, and that the cost of properly finishing such places would be not more than five dollars; and thereupon gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount of the contract price, after deducting said sum of five dollars.

1. It is contended by the appellants that the findings are contradictory, and do not support the judgment. Neither of these propositions can be maintained. The finding that the plaintiffs substantially complied with all the terms of their contract, and completed the work, is entirely consistent with the finding that some places in the houses were not properly grained and finished; and the finding that the cost of properly finishing such places would not be more than five dollars supports, rather than contradicts, the finding of substantial performance. The performance of a contract need not in all cases be literal and exact, in order to entitle a party to compensation therefor. Especially is this the rule in contracts for labor by mechanics or artisans, where the quality of the work done, or the manner of its performance, is the sole matter in dispute, and is to be decided upon conflicting testimony. In contracts for the construction or repair of buildings, a substantial performance of his contract is sufficient to entitle the contractor to compensation for the work done by him under the contract. If there has been no willful departure from its provisions, and no omission of any of its essential parts, and the contractor has, in good faith, performed all of its substantive terms, he will not be held to have forfeited his right to a recovery by reason of trivial defects or imperfections in the work performed. If the omission or imperfection is so slight that it cannot be regarded as an integral or substantive part of the original contract, and the other party can be compensated therefor by a recoupment for damages, the contractor does not lose his right of action. Whart. Cont. § 607; Liggett v. Smith, 3 Watts, 331; Philip v. Gallant, 62 N. Y. 264; Hayward v. Leonard, 7 Pick 185; Sinclair v. Tallmudge, 35 Barb. 604. This rule is peculiarly applicable in a case where the other party has received the benefit of what has been done, and is enjoying the fruits of the work. Section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "any trivial imperfection in the said work * * * shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien." If the lien can be "filed" notwithstanding such imperfection, it must follow that the claimant can foreclose his lien, and that the "trivial imperfection in the work" is no defense to the action. Whether the contract has been substantially performed is a question of fact which must be determined by the trial court in each instance from the facts and circumstances in the case, and the finding of the trial court upon that point is as conclusive as is its finding of any other fact. The present case is before us upon the judgment roll alone. In the absence of the testimony upon this point, we are bound to assume that it was sufficient to support the finding that the plaintiffs substantially completed their contract, as also the finding that the defendants would be fully compensated for any imperfection in the work by deducting five dollars from the contract price. If they can be thus compensated in damages, full justice is done to all parties by deducting that amount from the contract price, and allowing the contractor to recover for the work that has been done by him.

2. Appellants urge that it was error to order a sale of the interest of the defendants Bashore in the lands described in the judgment, and cite section 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as declaring that only the interest of the person causing the building to be repaired is subject to the lien. But it is found by the court that the defendants Bashore knew, at the time, of the construction of the said buildings, and of all the terms and conditions of the contract between the defendant Stufflebeem and the plaintiffs at the time it was made; and also that, on the completion of the work, the defendant Rachel Bashore made a payment to the plaintiffs on account thereof. Section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that when, with such knowledge, the owner fails to give notice that he will not be responsible for the same, his interest in the land shall be subject to the lien. In Lumber Co. v. Newkirk, 80 Cal. 275, 22 Pac. Rep. 231, these sections were construed by this court on a similar state of facts, and it was held that the interest of the owner in the lands was subject to a lien for materials used in the construction of a building thereon, which was erected under a contract made by the owner of the leasehold estate. It was also held in that case that it was not necessary to aver that the owner of the realty did not give any notice that he would not be responsible for the construction of the building. The judgment of the court below must be affirmed, and that court is directed upon the filing therein of the remittitur to allow plaintiffs, as a part of their costs on this appeal, a reasonable fee for the services of their attorney in this court. ATTORNEYS—DISBARMENT—POWER OF SUPREME COURT—ACCUSATION OF LARCENY.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 287, providing that an attorney may be disbarred for the reason, among others, that he has been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude, the supreme court has no authority to proceed against a member of the bar upon a mere verified accusation of larceny, preferred by another attorney.

In bank. Application to disbar an attorney.

Crittenden Thornton, for petitioner. T. C. Coogan, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a proceeding against an attorney and counselor of this court, for the purpose of causing his name to be stricken from the roll. It is founded upon a verified accusation, of which the following is a copy: "Now comes Charles F. Hanlon, an attorney and counselor of this court, and brings this accusation against Charles L. Tilden, and for causes of accusation states 'that said Charles L. Tilden was at all the dates and times hereinafter mentioned, and now is, an attorney and counselor of this court; that heretofore, to-wit, the 5th day of December, 1890, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the said Charles L. Tilden did steal, take, and carry away from the office and possession of this accuser, and by force and arms, and without the consent of this accuser, a certain valuable paper and undertaking for the payment of money, that is to say, a certain undertaking of the firm of Tilden & Tilden, of which the said Charles L. Tilden is a member, for the payment unto said Charles F. Hanlon, as attorney for the plaintiffs in the action hereinafter mentioned, for the sum of $150 to be paid as penalty costs upon the consent of said Charles F. Hanlon, as attorney for plaintiffs, to a continuance of the argument of a certain demurrer in an action then pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, in which William H. Carpenter, Harry S. Carpenter, and Thomas Carpenter were plaintiffs, and O. M. Schaff, M. L. Wilbert, William S. Arnold, and M. M. Donovan were defendants; 'that said Charles L. Tilden did so with the felonious intent to steal, take, and carry away from the office and possession of said plaintiffs' attorney the said paper and undertaking. CHARLES F. HANLON.'" Upon the filing of this accusation, Mr. Tilden was cited to answer it, and in response to the citation he files an answer denying the truth of the charge, and at the same time objects to its legal sufficiency. His objection is well taken. The accusation is somewhat ambiguous, charging a larceny in terms, but describing the act in such manner as to leave it doubtful if anything more than a trespass is alleged. Assuming, however, that a larceny is charged, this court has no jurisdiction to try an accusation of that character, and it is not until after an attorney has been tried and convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude, and the record of his conviction produced here, that we are expressly empowered to remove or suspend him for that cause. Code Civil Proc. § 287. But it is contended that in such matters this court must necessarily have an authority more extensive than the mere letter of the statute, and to enforce this view the case is supposed of an attorney notoriously guilty of an infamous crime, but acquitted of the charge through some scandalous miscarriage of justice. It is sufficient on this point to say that no such case is before us, and that it will be time enough to decide it when it arises. Even conceding that in the case supposed it might be our duty to proceed against an attorney in spite of his acquittal, we are very certain that it is no part of our duty to anticipate the action of the proper trial court where the attorney has not even been accused. Mr. Tilden's demurrer is sustained, and the proceeding dismissed.

FIXTURES—VENDOR AND VENDEE—RIGHT TO REMOVE HOUSES.

1. Houses built on mud-sills resting upon the soil, which is not disturbed, are affixed to the land within the terms of Civil Code Cal. § 660, declaring that "a thing is deemed to be affixed to the land when it is * * * permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings."

2. Such houses built by a contractor for a vendee in possession, who has paid part of the price for the land, and who, being unable to pay for the houses, turns them over to the contractor, cannot be removed from the freehold by the latter. Distinguishing Hendy v. Dinkernoff, 57 Cal. 3.

3. A vendee who has not paid the entire purchase price cannot claim the right to remove houses built by him on the land on the principle that, since equity regards that as done which ought to be done, he should be deemed the trustee of the purchase money for the vendor, and the equitable owner of the land, with the right to deal with it as he pleases.

4. A vendee who, while in possession under an executory contract of purchase, has built houses on the land before paying the entire purchase price, may be enjoined by the vendor from removing them.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Waters & Gird, for appellant. Harris & Gregg, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. This was a suit for an injunction to restrain the defendants from removing six buildings from the plaintiff's land, and for damages for injuries sustained in that regard. The trial court gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals upon the findings. The findings show the following case: The plaintiff, who was the owner of two blocks of land in "Ontario Colony," and of half of the streets in front thereof, made a contract to sell the land to the defendant's assignor, who entered into possession, and paid the sum of $9,000 "on said contract." While in possession he caused the houses in question to be erected, but, being unable to pay the contractor, he made over the houses to him, and the latter sold them to the defendants, who proceeded to move them. It does not clearly appear whether the houses were erected upon the plaintiff's blocks of land, or upon the streets in front thereof. But the counsel have assumed (what in all probability was the fact) that the houses were upon the blocks mentioned; and, following the lead of counsel, we have so assumed for the purposes of this opinion. "Said houses were built on red-wood mud-sills of two-inch by six-inch timber; said mud-sills resting upon the soil. The soil was not disturbed in building or removing said houses. Nothing was ever said about the houses being built so they could be removed." It does not appear what was the price to be paid to the plaintiff for the land. The inference is that only a part of the price was paid. Assuming that such was the case, it does not appear whether the unpaid portion was due at the time of the removal of the houses, or at the commencement of the suit. The vendee is still in possession, and the contract "is subsisting, and not disaffirmed."

The first question to be considered is whether the houses were affixed to the land in such a manner as to become a part of the realty. The term "fixture" is used in different senses. Sometimes it is used in its general sense, of a thing which is affixed to land. Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 63, 64. Sometimes it is used to designate a thing which can be severed from land after having been affixed to it. In this sense it is a term "denoting the very reverse of the name." 1 Chit. Gen. Pr. p. 161. Less frequently it is used to designate a thing which cannot be removed after having been affixed to the land. Ewell, Fixt. p. 4, and note. But, whatever may be the true signification of the term, it is manifest that (with certain exceptions, such as heirlooms and the like) the thing must first be affixed to the land, in a legal sense, before any question as to its removal can arise. If not affixed to the land in any sense, its owner may move it about at pleasure. The rule of the common law was that a thing was not to be deemed affixed to land unless fastened to it in some manner. And in Pennybecker v. McDougal, 48 Cal. 160, it was held that a cabin set on wooden blocks not attached to the soil was personal property. But the value of the cabin was only $25, and it must have been more or less of a temporary structure. In New York and other states the common-law rule was relaxed so as to include things permanently resting upon the soil, though not fastened thereto. Thus, in Snedeker v. Warring, 12 N. Y. 175, it was held that a statue resting upon a pedestal in front of a building was a part of the realty; the court saying: "A thing may be as firmly affixed to the land by gravitation as by clamps or cement." And see Strickland v. Parker, 54 Me. 266; Cavis v. Beckford, 62 N. H. 229. And this principle is embodied in section 660 of the Civil Code, which provides that "a thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is * * * imbedded in it, as in the case of walls; or permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings." In this case the houses seem to have been of a permanent character, (they cost $4,100;) and we think that, under the Code, they must be considered as having been "affixed" to the land.

This being so, the question arises whether the successors in interest of the vendee had any right to sever the houses from the land. Upon this question many modern authorities lay great stress upon the intention with which the thing was affixed, (Vail v. Weaver, 132 Pa. St. 363, 19 Atl. Rep. 138; Walker v. Flouring-Mill Co., 70 Wis. 96, 35 N. W. Rep. 332; Schaper v. Bibb, 71 Md. 149, 17 Atl. Rep. 935; Docking v. Frazell, 38 Kan. 423, 17 Pac. Rep. 160;) while others say that the intention is of secondary importance, (Collamore v. Gillis, 149 Mass. 581, 22 N. E. Rep. 46.) But, whatever may be the controlling principle, the preponderance of authority is to the effect that a building of a permanent character, erected by a vendee in possession under an executory contract of purchase, is part of the realty, and cannot be removed by him or his successors in interest, in the absence of an agreement to that effect. In Ogden v. Stock, 34 Ill. 522, the action was replevin for a house which had been erected by the vendee in possession under a contract of purchase, who, after failing to perform his contract, sold the house to the defendant, who removed it. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff, saying that it could not be presumed that the vendee when he affixed the house to the soil, had any intention of removing it. In Hemmenway v. Cutler, 51 Me. 407, a question arose, upon a writ of entry, as to the effect of an omission, from a levy, of a barn erected by a vendee in possession under a bond for a deed. If the barn was real estate, the omission rendered the levy void; otherwise, it was valid. The court held that the levy was void, and APPLETON, C. J., delivering the opinion, said: "It is well settled that erections made by a mortgagor, or one occupying land under a bond for a deed, are to be regarded as real estate, and are not removable by the occupant as personal property." See, also, Kingsley v. McFarland, 82 Me. 231, 19 Atl. Rep. 442. In Westgate v. Wixon, 128 Mass. 304, the action was for damages for the removal of a barn erected on the plaintiff's land by one Abbott, who was in possession under a bond for a deed. He failed to perform the conditions of the bond, but remained in possession, and the barn was removed by the defendant under a writ issued in a suit by a creditor. It was held that the plaintiff should recover, and the court, per MORTON, J., said: "As a general rule, buildings are part of the realty, and belong to the owner of the land on which they stand. Even if built by a person who has no interest in the land, they become a part of realty, unless there is an agreement by the owner of the land, either express, or implied from the relations of the parties, that they shall remain personal property. * * * The barn in question was a substantial structure. It is clear from the facts agreed upon that Abbott built it, not for any temporary purpose, but for the permanent improvement of the land, which he expected to become his property according to the terms of the bond. When built, it became a part of the realty, and inured to the benefit of the plaintiff as additional security for the performance of the condition of the bond. Abbott had no right to remove it, and his creditors had no right to attach it as his personal property." The foregoing were cases at law. The same rule is applied in equity. In English v. Foote, 8 Smedes & M. 444, the suit was to foreclose a mechanic's lien for work upon a house erected by a vendee in possession under a contract of purchase which he failed to perform. It was held that, under the statute in force in that jurisdiction, the lien extended only to the interest of the person who caused the house to be erected, and that the vendee had no interest in the house after it was affixed to the land. The court, per CLAYTON, J., said: "As a general rule, whatever is annexed to the freehold becomes a part of it, and cannot be severed from it. There are many exceptions to the rule, but it applies with all its strictness between vendor and vendee." In McLaughlin v. Nash, 14 Allen, 136, the suit was for an accounting after dissolution of partnership. Before the formation of the partnership the plaintiff was in possession under a bond for a deed, and had affixed certain articles to a building which was upon the land. When the partnership was formed, the defendant purchased an interest in the articles mentioned. The plaintiff failed to perform the condition of the bond, and after the dissolution of the partnership the owner leased the premises to the defendant. It was held that such of the articles as had been permanently affixed to the building were part of the realty, and the court, per GRAY, J., said: "The plaintiff had not the same right to remove fixtures annexed by him to the land so occupied by him without paying rent to the owner, under a contract for its purchase, as an ordinary tenant would have against his landlord. * * * His rights in this respect were no greater than those of a vendor or mortgagor against his vendee or mortgagee." See, also, Allen v. Mitchell, 13 Tex. 373. The rule between vendor and vendee to which the court refers in the passage last quoted is that in relation to things affixed by the vendor before the contract of purchase, or before a conveyance, if there is no contract, in which case the construction leans in favor of the vendee. Fratt v. Whittier, 58 Cal. 126. The decisions above quoted are in relation to things affixed by the vendee after the contract of purchase.

It is to be observed that the case before us is to be distinguished from that of erections by a person in possession under a revocable license. The rule as to licenses was laid down in Little v. Willford, 31 Minn. 178, 17 N. W. Rep. 282. But the court was careful to say: "A distinction is to be noted between a license and a contract for the purchase of land under which buildings are erected. In the latter case the builder's rights are determined by the nature of his contract, and upon his default the fixtures go with the land." The same distinction is stated by Cooley, (Cooley, Torts, § 429;) and, as to the general rule, see 1 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.)

p. 7. In most of the cases above cited, the vendee, after making the erections, failed to perform his contract. But, so far as the question of fixtures is concerned, this circumstance is not material. If a building be once affixed to land so as to become a part of the realty, it does not change its character by subsequent non-action on the part of the person who affixed it. The case of Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 3, is not in conflict with the above decision. There the thing affixed to the realty did not belong to the person who affixed it. Such person, therefore, had no right, as against the owner of the thing, to make it a part of the realty; and the decision was that the owner of the realty stood in the shoes of the person who did the affixing, and had no greater rights than the latter had. It is true that in the case before us the houses were affixed to the land by a contractor; but he affixed them under a contract with the vendee, and for his benefit, and of course must be taken to have consented to the affixing, and to all its consequences. It results that the houses were part of the realty, and that the vendee had no greater right to them than to any other part of the property.

The defendants, however, advance two arguments, which apply not merely to the fixtures, but to the whole property. In the first place, they invoke the maxim that equity regards that as done which in good conscience ought to be done, and argue that after the contract the vendee was the trustee of the purchase money, and the owner in equity of the land, and could deal with it as he saw fit. As above stated, this argument has no reference to fixtures as distinguished from the land itself, but applies to the whole property. Nor does it depend upon whether the vendor has permitted the vendee to take possession before performance; for, under the rule relied upon, the vendee is as much the equitable owner where he has not taken possession as where he has. Nor does the argument depend upon whether the unpaid purchase money is due or not; for, by the terms of the rule, it applies as soon as the contract is made. If the argument is good at all, it requires that, as soon as a contract of purchase is made, the vendee should in every case be entitled to enter upon the enjoyment of the property, and be allowed to deal with it as he sees fit. But this is certainly not the law. The maxim referred to is not of universal application. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 64g. It was established by courts of equity to attain equitable ends, and it will not be applied to accomplish results which are inequitable; as, for example, to enable a vendee to waste or destroy the property before the performance of his contract. Before such performance, whatever interest he has is subject to be divested upon non-performance; for in case of non-performance the vendor is not compelled to foreclose a lien upon the property, but may rescind or retake possession. Hannan v. McNickle, 82 Cal. 136, 23 Pac. Rep. 271; Connolly v. Hingley, 82 Cal. 643, 23 Pac. Rep. 273; Hoffman v. Remnant, 72 Cal. 1, 12 Pac. Rep. 804; Troy v. Clarke, 30 Cal. 419.

The interest of the vendee must therefore be conditional. Non constat that he will be able to perform the condition when the time for the performance arrives; and a court of equity will not take his performance for granted to such an extent as to allow him to waste or destroy the property. Nor does it make any difference that the vendor has permitted him to take possession. Such permission does not carry with it a right to waste or destroy the property in the case of a vendee any more than it does in the case of a tenant. The question involved was decided in the case of Crockford v. Alexander, 15 Ves. 138, in which Lord ELDON enjoined a vendee in possession from cutting timber, although he admitted that the vendee was, in equity, the owner of the estate. The case would be different if the vendee had performed all the conditions of his contract. In such case he would be the absolute owner of the equitable estate, and the vendor would have merely the dry legal title, which he would be compelled to transfer when required, and which he would not in the meantime be allowed to use in opposition to the interests or wishes of the vendee. But this would not be by reason of any presumed or supposititious performance by the vendee, but because he had actually performed. As above stated, the record does not show clearly whether the vendee has paid all the purchase money or not; but the inference from what is stated, and from the argument of counsel, is that he has not. And, as the defense is based upon an equity in opposition to the legal title, it was incumbent upon the defendants to make the fact appear. Arguello v. Bours, 67 Cal. 450, 8 Pac. Rep. 49.

In the next place, it is contended that the position of a vendor after an executory contract of purchase is analogous to that of a mortgagee; and that the rule that a mortgagee cannot have an injunction against the removal of a portion of the mortgaged premises, without showing that his security would thereby be impaired, applies here. This is but a variation of the preceding point. It is, in substance, saying that the vendee will be allowed to waste and destroy the property unless it be shown that the vendor's lien will thereby be impaired; and it depends upon the proposition that the position of the vendor is like that of a mortgagee. There are some respects in which the analogy holds; more especially in the case of a common-law mortgage, where the mortgagee has the legal title. But the likeness is by no means perfect. The vendor has not a mere lien for the security of money, which he must foreclose upon non-performance by the vendee. As shown by the cases cited under the preceding head, he may, upon such non-performance, rescind the contract and retake possession. He has therefore, in addition to the legal title, a reversionary interest in the equitable estate, conditional upon non-performance by the vendee, which interest will be protected in equity. The vendee on his side has, before performance, only a conditional equitable interest for equitable purposes; and, as above stated, a court of equity will not take his performance for granted to such an extent as to enable him to grasp at once at the enjoyment of the property.

It results that the judgment is not sustained by the findings; but, in the somewhat uncertain condition of the record, we do not think that final judgment should be ordered for the plaintiff. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

JUSTICE v. OTT. (No. 13,926.)

GUARDIAN OF INCOMPETENT — ACTION ON WARD'S NOTE.

An action cannot be maintained against the guardian of an incompetent person upon a note made by the latter, when the latter is not joined or served with summons, and judgment entered by default will be set aside.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for appellant. W. T. Williams, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action upon a promissory note. A personal judgment for the amount due on the note was entered against the defendant, Ott, by default, and from that judgment he appeals. It is alleged in the complaint that Jesse Justice made and delivered to the plaintiff his promissory note for $1,000, dated November 18, 1879, and payable five years after date, with interest; that plaintiff is still the owner and holder of the note, and that no part of the principal or interest thereof has been paid; "that on the — day of May, 1888, by an order of the superior court duly made and entered, said defendant, George T. Ott, was appointed the guardian of the estate and person of said Jesse Justice, and that he is now such guardian; that on or about the 18th day of May, 1888, plaintiff demanded of said guardian the payment of said promissory note, and the interest thereon, but said guardian refused to pay said note or any part thereof;" wherefore the plaintiff prayed for judgment against the defendant, George T. Ott, as such guardian, for the principal and interest due on the note, amounting to $2,400. A summons was issued, addressed to "George T. Ott, guardian," etc., and he was thereby notified that, if he failed to appear and answer the complaint, the plaintiff would cause his default to be entered, and would take judgment against him for $2,400 and costs of suit. The summons was served on the defendant personally, by delivering to him a copy thereof and a copy of the complaint, but, so far as appears, no service was made on or notice given to Jesse Justice. The affidavit shows service on the defendant, and states the time, but not the place, of service. On the 23d day after the defendant was served, the clerk of the court, by direction of the plaintiff's attorney, entered his default, and on the next day entered against him a personal judgment for the amount prayed for in the complaint. It is very clear that this judgment cannot be sustained. The facts stated in the complaint do not show any personal obligation on the part of the defendant to pay the note. The obligation, if any, was on the maker, and the action should have been brought against him, though an incompetent, and not against his guardian. Brown v. Chase, 4 Mass. 436; Raymond v. Sawyer, 37 Me. 406; Robinson v. Hersey, 60 Me. 225; Coombs v. Janvier, 31 N. J. Law, 240; Van Horn v. Hann, 39 N. J. Law, 207; Steel v. Young, 4 Watts, 459; Fox v. Minor, 32 Cal. 118. If the action had been properly brought, the summons would have been served on both the incompetent and his guardian, (section 411, subd. 4, Code Civil Proc.,) and it would then have been the duty of the guardian to appear and defend the action, (Gronfier v. Puymiro, 19 Cal. 632;) and, if deemed expedient, the court might also have appointed a guardian ad litem to represent the incompetent, (section 372, Code Civil Proc.) Other grounds for reversal are argued by counsel, but they need not be considered. For the reasons above stated we advise that the judgment be reversed, and the action dismissed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY V. REICHERT.
(No. 13,756.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1890.)
COUNTY BOUNDARY LINES.

Act Cal. April 26, 1853, (St. 1853, p. 119,) organizing San Bernardino county, provided that said county should have for its southern boundary the northern boundary of San Diego county. The common boundary line of the two counties, as described in the acts organizing them, makes several express references to points on, and lines of, two ranchos, the N. and the V. At the time of the passage of said act, said ranchos were Mexican grants, and one H. had, under proper authority, made and put on record a survey thereof. In 1880 a patent issued for the V. rancho, and in 1882 one M. made a survey of the N. rancho, on which in 1884 a patent issued for the latter rancho. The H. survey was not finally approved, and was not the basis for either of the said patents. Held that, the surveyor general, in running the boundary line of said counties, properly adopted the H. survey, especially as parts of the description expressed in the act could not be applied to the M. survey, but did correspond with the H. survey.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKINLEY, Judge.

Harris & Gregg, Waters & Gird, and H. Connor, Dist. Atty., for appellant. J. L. Copeland and Brunson, Wilson & Lamme, for respondent.

McKINLEY, J. In July, 1887, the county of San Bernardino applied to the respondent, surveyor general of the state, to survey the boundary line between said county and the county of San Diego. While the respondent was proceeding to perform that duty the appellant filed a petition in the superior court alleging, in substance, that he was proceeding to survey and run said boundary in a certain manner that was wrong, and upon a false theory, and praying for a writ of mandate compelling him to run the line in a certain other manner, which is alleged to be the right manner. The court rendered judgment against the appellant, who appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The act organizing the county of San Bernardino was passed April 26, 1853. St. 1853, p. 119. By that act the northern boundary line of San Diego county, which had been previously organized, is made the southern boundary of San Bernardino county. The boundaries of the two counties were afterwards substantially incorporated in sections 3943 and 3944 of the Political Code. The common boundary line between the two counties, as described in the acts organizing them, makes several express references to points on, and lines of, two certain ranchos called "San Jacinto Nuevo" and "San Jacinto Viejo." At the time of the passage of said act of April 26, 1853, these ranchos were known as "Mexican grants;" and one Hancock, a deputy United States surveyor, under directions of the proper authorities, had made and placed on record a survey of said ranchos. Afterwards, in 1880, a United States patent issued for the Viejo rancho, and, in 1882, one Minto, a United States deputy-surveyor, made a survey of the Nuevo rancho, upon which, in 1884, a United States patent issued for said last-named rancho. The Hancock survey does not appear to have been finally approved, and was not adopted as the basis for either of said patents. Appellant contends that the respondent, in running the line between the two counties, should have followed the lines of the ranchos as afterwards established by the Minto survey and the United States patents; while respondent contends that it was the intention of the legislature to determine what the boundary line was at and immediately after the passage of the act of 1853 organizing the county, that he should carry out that intention, and that in doing so he may consider the Hancock survey as tending to show where the legislature at that time intended to fix the line. The court adopted the view of the respondent, and admitted in evidence the said Hancock survey; and we are not able to see that in so doing any error was committed. This proceeding does not involve any question of title to real property, or of the correct boundaries of land as between private claimants. In determining any such question with respect to said ranchos, of course, the lines of the patents would govern. But the legislature, when in 1853 it passed the said act organizing said county, had power to fix the boundary line wherever it pleased, and for that purpose to adopt any description deemed proper to express its intention. It was the duty —and it certainly may be presumed to have been the intention—of the legislature to adopt a line that could be then definitely fixed. It cannot be presumed that the intention was to describe a line that could not properly be ascertained until the lapse of some indefinite period, when the United States government, over which there was no control, should see fit, for other purposes, to issue patents for said ranchos, thus deliberately providing for the evils which must certainly come from an unknown and unknowable boundary between two municipal corporations. The Minto survey and the patents were not in existence until from 23 to 30 years after the passage of the act organizing the county. It furthermore appears that parts of the description of the line, as expressed in the act, cannot be applied to the Minto survey, while they do correspond with the Hancock survey. Our conclusion is that no error was committed by the court below. We do not, however, wish to be understood as deciding that the courts have jurisdiction to control the surveyor general in the matter here involved. Section 3972 of the Political Code provides that his action in such a case shall be "conclusive;" and in People v. Boggs, 56 Cal. 648, this court seems to have held that section not to be unconstitutional. But counsel for respondent do not make the point in their briefs or arguments, and we do not care to pass upon the question without fuller discussion. Judgment and order affirmed.

ABBOTT V. SEVENTY-SIX LAND & WATER CO. (No. 13,980.)

LEASE—OPTION TO BUY—RIGHT TO EXERCISE—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a tenant takes a lease with an option to extend it from year to year, and also to buy the land at the end of any year, at a price to be fixed by the lessor during the year, the fact that the clause containing the option to buy is by agreement omitted from a lease for the second year, but with a mutual understanding that the option is to continue, does not deprive the tenant of his right to exercise the option under the second lease.

2. Where the business relative to the lease and sale of the lands is left to the secretary of the corporation, the lessor, his statements to a lessee respecting the lease and the option to buy are admissible in an action by the lessee to compel a conveyance according to the terms of the option.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

The business of defendant corporation was the sale of its lands, with the water and water privileges from its canals, to such persons as it could induce to buy them, and also by farm leases or "cropping contracts," to get revenue from the lands while they remained unsold. The plan of defendant was to induce farmers to take the lands upon such leases or cropping contracts for one year, with the privilege of extending the same, from year to year, for a period of not to exceed two additional years; the tenant to have the option to buy the land leased by him, throughout the entire time while his lease existed, either by the original term of one year, or an extension of the term, at prices to be fixed by the corporation annually; the tenant, if he should elect to buy, to notify defendant before the 1st day of October of the year in which he made such election; and his purchase to be made as of the date October 1st of that year; the corporation to have the right to change and fix the price of the lands leased before October 1st of each year, which price so fixed was to remain the price of the lands for the following year, and, unless such change of price was made, that which had before been put on the land should remain until a change should be made, to take effect on the 1st day of October thereafter. Plaintiff elected to continue his lease and option to buy for the year to come from October 1, 1886, and gave defendant notice of his election. Defendant accepted the notice and demand for the extension. In the second lease the clause mentioning the option to buy was erased, for the reason that it required a good deal of clerical work to fill it out, but it was mutually understood that the option was also extended.

THORNTON, J. The option in plaintiff to buy the land under the lease or cropping contract entered into by the plaintiff and defendant, bearing date 7th day of December, 1885, continued for two years from the 1st day of October, 1886. It makes no difference that it was not inserted in the second lease. It was left out of the second lease by agreement, as something unnecessary. The defendant had a right to change the purchase price during the execution of the lease, provided it did so prior to the 1st of October of each year. It never did change this price. It therefore remained as in the first contract. The plaintiff exercised and gave notice of his intention to purchase, under the option clause above mentioned, on the 3d of September, 1887, and then offered to pay the installment of the purchase money then due, viz., one-fourth of it, and interest on the portion not then due, and offered to comply in all respects with his contract. The defendant refused to receive the money, and repudiated its contracts with the plaintiff. We think that the judgment is correct, and in accordance with the principles of law, and should be affirmed.

The statements of the secretary of the defendant corporation, made to plaintiff, were properly admitted. It is evident that the conduct of the whole business was left by the company to him; that he was fully authorized to act, and did act, for the company in its dealing with plaintiff, and others in the like situation, in regard to the business connected with the leasing and disposition of its lands. The determination of this action by the court below is in accordance with well-settled legal principles. The record shows no error. Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF SAN LUIS OBISPO V. PETTIT.
(No. 13,856.)

TAXATION—DOUBLE ASSESSMENT—LEVY.

1. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3649, providing that any property discovered by the assessor to have "escaped assessment" for the last preceding year, if such property is still owned or controlled by the same person who owned or controlled it the previous year, may be assessed at double its value, money deposited with a county treasurer by order of court in a pending case may be doubly assessed if it "escaped assessment" the year before.

2. Where an assessment is invalid the property has "escaped assessment" within the meaning of section 3649.

3. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3647, requiring money in litigation in possession of the county treasurer pending the suit to be assessed to him, an assessment of the money to the plaintiffs in the suit is invalid.

4. Under the municipal corporation act, § 871, (Laws Cal. 1883, p. 273,) providing that the city trustees shall provide by ordinance a system for the assessment, levy, and collection of city and town taxes, which shall conform as nearly as possible to the provisions of the state laws, "except as to the times for such assessment, levy, and collection," it is competent for the trustees to fix any time they may see fit for assessing, levying, and collecting the taxes; and the fact that the time fixed coincides with that fixed for the levy of state and county taxes does not affect the validity of the ordinance.

5. Under an ordinance passed in pursuance of the corporation act, providing for "assessing and collecting" city taxes in the manner prescribed by Pol. Code Cal. tit. 9, pt. 3, which contains provisions for levying taxes, authority is given to levy taxes.

6. The fact that one provision of the ordinance provides that delinquent taxes shall be collected by the collector by sale, while section 879 of the corporation act provides that they shall be collected by suit by the city attorney, does not invalidate the entire ordinance, but only the inconsistent provision.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; T. H. REARDON, Judge.

Graves, Turner & Graves, for appellant.
William Shipsey, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action to recover delinquent taxes. The property taxed was a sum of money deposited with the defendant in his official capacity under an order of the superior court in a pending case. During the fiscal year 1887-88 the defendant reported the deposit to the assessor, who, however, did not assess it to him, but (probably acting under a mistaken view of the law) assessed it to the plaintiffs in this suit. The tax was not paid. In the following year the property was assessed to the defendant; but, upon the theory that it had "escaped assessment" the preceding year, the amount of the assessment was doubled. The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. The points made relate to the validity of the assessment.

1. In doubling the assessment the assessor acted under a provision of the Political Code, which is as follows: "Sec. 3649. Any property discovered by the assessor to have escaped assessment for the last preceding year, if such property is in the ownership or under the control of the same person who owned or controlled it for such preceding year, may be assessed at double its value." The validity of this provision was affirmed in Biddle v. Oaks, 59 Cal. 95, in which case the court said that the legislature had power to impose a penalty for neglect to have an assessment made. In the case before us there was no such neglect, because the defendant reported the property to the assessor. But we do not understand the decision as confining the operation or validity of the provision to cases where there has been neglect on the part of the person to whom the assessment is made. The terms of the provision indicate no such limitation. The language is general, and applies to all cases where property has escaped assessment in the preceding year, whatever may have been the cause of such escape. Nor do we think that upon this construction the provision is invalid. Its evident purpose is to carry out the general intention pervading the revenue system, that all private property shall bear its share of the burden of taxation. This is certainly a legitimate purpose; and the means employed to carry it out are not, in our opinion, in violation of any constitutional provision. The section does not provide that the property shall not be assessed in proportion to its value. It provides, in effect, that in certain cases assessments for two different years may be made in one, and therefore goes in effect merely to the time at which an assessment may be made. We see no constitutional objection to this. It is true that in exceptional cases it might happen that the property would increase in value since the preceding assessment, and hence that merely doubling the assessment would not be an accurate way of arriving at the value for the preceding year; but in the great majority of cases doubling the assessment would be a fair enough way of arriving at a valuation for the preceding year. And if in exceptional cases the method would result in an overvaluation, and it be assumed (for the purposes of the opinion) that in such cases the overvaluation would render the assessment void, it would have to be shown that the case was of such exceptional character. In this case no such question can arise, because the property assessed was money, and for all practical purposes was of the same value from year to year. The provision, therefore, is valid, and covers the case before us.

It is to be observed that the condition of the double assessment is not that the property should have escaped taxation. It is not enough, therefore, to show that the tax was not paid. The property must have escaped "assessment." But, in our opinion, the word "assessment" in this connection means a "valid assessment." A thing which has the semblance of an assessment, but which is void and of no effect, is for all practical purposes no assessment, and furnishes no reason why a proper assessment should not be made. The question, therefore, must turn upon whether the assessment for the year 1887-88 was valid or invalid. In our opinion, it was invalid. The method of making an assessment in such a case as this is prescribed by the following provision of the Political Code: "Sec. 3647. Money and property in litigation in possession of a county treasurer, of a court, county clerk, or receiver, must be assessed to such treasurer, clerk, or receiver, and the taxes be paid thereon under the direction of the court." There was a plain violation of the provision of this section, and the well-established rule is that, if an assessment is not made as prescribed by the statute, it is void. Grotefend v. Ultz, 53 Cal. 666; Grimm v. O'Connell, 54 Cal. 522; Hearst v. Egglestone, 55 Cal. 367; Brady v. Dowden, 59 Cal. 51; Bosworth v. Webster, 64 Cal. 1; Daly v. Ah Goon, 64 Cal. 512, 2 Pac. Rep. 401; Klumpke v. Baker, 68 Cal. 559, 10 Pac. Rep. 197. It is true that the Code provides that "no mistake in the name of the owner or supposed owner of real property shall render the assessment thereof invalid," (Pol. Code, § 3628;) but, whatever may be the meaning of this provision, it does not apply to personal property, (Lake Co. v. Mining Co., 66 Cal. 17, 4 Pac. Rep. 876.) The assessment for 1887-88 was therefore invalid, and a reassessment in the following year was proper.

2. It is contended that there was no authority of law for making the levy. Section 871 of the municipal corporation act provides that the city trustees "shall have power, and it shall be their duty, to provide by ordinance a system for the assessment, levy, and collection of all city or town taxes, not inconsistent with the provisions of this chapter, which system shall conform, as nearly as the circumstances of the case may permit, to the provisions of the laws of this state in reference to the assessment, levy, and collection of state and county taxes, except as to the times for such assessment, levy, and collection." Laws 1883, p. 273. The ordinance passed in pursuance of the above provision contained, among other things, the following: "Sec. 3. The manner, form, and time of assessing and collecting city taxes shall be the same as is prescribed by the Political Code of the state of California for assessing and collecting state and county taxes; and all the provisions of title 9 of part 3 of said Political Code are hereby adopted, and are ordained to be, and are the law for assessing and collecting city taxes, as to manner, mode and time," etc. The objection consists of two branches, which we shall consider separately. (a) It is argued that the statute above quoted forbids the city from assessing, levying, and collecting its taxes at the same time as the state and county. But we do not so construe the provision. It simply leaves those matters to the discretion of the city trustees, who may fix any time they see fit. There is nothing to prevent them from selecting the time fixed for the other taxes. (b) It is said that the ordinance in question provides only for "assessing and collecting" the taxes, and not for levying them, as to which it is contended that no provision is made. But, in the first place, we think that the words "assessing and collecting" are used in the ordinance in a general sense, and include the operation called "levying the tax." The words are so used in the constitution. As is said in the clear and satisfactory argument of the counsel for the respondent: "The foundation of the city taxing power is in the constitution. Article 11, § 12, provides that the legislature * * * may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities power to assess and collect taxes. There is no authority to 'levy,' unless one of the words 'assess and collect' includes levy." In the second place, the ordinance does not confine itself to an adoption of the provisions of the Code by a general reference to them as those in relation to the assessment and collection of taxes. It goes on to designate specifically the provisions adopted by saying: "And all the provisions of title 9, part 3, of said Political Code are hereby adopted." The part of the Code so designated contains provisions for levying the tax, (sections 3713-3719;) and the ordinance makes provision for the difference in officers, etc.

3. It is contended that the provisions of the ordinance quoted conflict with section 879 of the municipal corporation act. The section referred to provides, in substance, that the delinquent taxes shall be collected by the city attorney by suit in the name of the city. (Laws 1883, p. 277.) while the portions of the Political Code adopted by the ordinance provide that such taxes shall be collected by the tax collector by sale of the property, (section 3765 et seq.) But if it be conceded that these portions of the ordinance are in conflict with the statute, (as to which see City of Placerville v. Wilcox, 35 Cal. 21,) it does not follow that the whole ordinance is void.

"Nothing is better settled than that, if the part of a law or ordinance which is invalid is distinctly separable from the remainder, the latter can stand and the former be rejected." Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 212, 24 Pac. Rep. 747. The provision for the collection of the delinquent taxes seems distinctly separable from the other parts of the ordinance, and may therefore be rejected. The proceedings in this case were in accordance with the statute, the suit having been brought under section 879, above referred to. In the view we have taken it is not necessary to consider the effect of the amended ordinance. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment and in the foregoing opinion. The money which was the subject of the double assessment for the year 1888-89 did not bear its share of taxation for the preceding year. If the owner had waived the invalidity of its assessment for the fiscal year 1887-88, and had paid upon such assessment the tax levied for that year, a different question would have been presented.

VENDOR AND VENDEE—CONTRACT—ACTION FOR PRICE—FINDINGS.

1. In an action on a contract to buy land, which is set out in the complaint, a finding by the court that plaintiff "entered into an agreement in writing with the defendant" * * * whereby plaintiff agreed to sell and defendant agreed to buy said land upon the terms and conditions set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2, "is a sufficient finding that defendant executed the contract, notwithstanding the exhibit is no part of the pleadings or record, as the finding is complete without the reference to the exhibit.

2. Plaintiff and defendant being the only parties to the contract, a finding of the amount "due the plaintiff upon said contract" is sufficient, without a finding that it is due from defendant.

3. Where defendant sets up as affirmative matter that his signature was obtained by fraud, and that another was the real purchaser, and was so regarded by plaintiff, findings that the signature was not obtained by fraud, and the plaintiff did not accept the contract with knowledge that another was the real purchaser, sufficiently cover the issues raised by the affirmative allegations.

4. Where a contract for the sale of land provides that time shall be of the essence, and that in case of the vendee's failure to comply with its terms he shall forfeit all rights, but does not provide that the vendor shall forfeit any right if the purchase money is not paid at the stipulated time, the vendor may enforce the contract and sue for the purchase money in case of the vendee's default. Following Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 Pac. Rep. 629.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Brunson, Wilson & Lamme, for appellant. Dunne & Hunter and Jay E. Hunter, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This action was commenced on the 19th day of April, 1889, to recover the sum of $1,000, with interest thereon, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff, under a contract for the sale of land. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 6th day of September, 1887, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement, a copy of which is set out in full, whereby the plaintiff, as party of the first part, agreed to sell and convey to the defendant, as party of the second part, and the latter to buy, a certain described parcel of land, for the sum of $2,200, to be paid as follows: $700 cash, the receipt of which was acknowledged; $500 on January 1, 1888; and the balance of $1,000 on May 1, 1888,—with interest at 8 per cent. It is further alleged that the first two payments were made, and that the sum of $1,000, with interest, "became due, according to the terms of said contract, on the 1st day of May, 1888, no part of which has been paid by defendant, although often requested so to do. That plaintiff has duly performed all of the conditions of said contract to be performed by him to this time, and has been constantly and now is ready and willing, and prior to the institution of this suit offered to execute and deliver to defendant a deed of said premises, together with a certificate of title, upon compliance by defendant with the terms of said contract as therein set forth, but defendant said he would not accept a deed, and refused to pay said money." The agreement set out contains this provision: "It is further agreed that time is of the essence of this contract, and, in the event of a failure to comply with the terms thereof by said party of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations, in law or equity, to convey said property, and said party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto, and to moneys theretofore paid under this contract; and all his interest in or to said moneys, or said property, shall thereupon immediately cease, as fully as if said moneys had never been paid, or this agreement entered into. And the said party of the first part, on receiving such payment, at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and deliver to the said party of the second part, or to his assigns, a good and sufficient deed, with certificate of title." The defendant, by his answer, denied that "plaintiff and defendant entered into the written agreement, a copy of which is set out in the complaint;" admitted that he signed it; and averred "that his signature thereto was obtained by false and fraudulent representations of the said plaintiff, made by and through his agents employed by him for the sale of said premises in said contract described." He then states that he was solicited by one C. J. Longstreet to purchase the property, and declined to do so; that Longstreet and D. G. White, his partner in the real-estate agency business, informed him that they had contracted to purchase the property in his (defendant's) name, and had paid, on account of the purchase price, a sum of money, which they claimed to have advanced for him; that he then and there refused to confirm the purchase or to take the property, whereupon they produced the written contract, a copy of which is set out in the complaint, and which had then been signed by the plaintiff, and insisted that he should execute it, and become the purchaser of the property, and that he positively refused to make the purchase or sign the contract; that upon such refusal they informed the agent of plaintiff for the sale of the property that defendant refused to sign the contract, and offered to return the same to the agent, and cancel it, and demanded a return of the money paid by them on account thereof, but the agent refused to receive or cancel the contract, or to repay the money; that thereupon it was agreed between them that White should become the purchaser, procure the signature of defendant to the contract, and take an assignment thereof, and pay the balance of the purchase price; that Longstreet and White informed defendant of this agreement, and requested him to attach his signature to an assignment indorsed on the contract to White, and that he at first refused, but finally did it upon their assurance that it was a mere matter of form, and that he would incur no liability thereunder; that subsequently upon like request and assurance he signed the contract; that the plaintiff thereafter received the contract, and the first and second payments therein provided for, with full knowledge and notice that White was the purchaser of the property, and the real party in interest, as the vendee thereof; and that the plaintiff did not at any time call upon defendant for any money or to comply with any of the terms of the contract until after White had made default in the last payment; and that defendant never did make any payment for or on account of the said purchase, or furnish any money therefor. The case was tried, and the findings of the court were as follows: First, That on the 6th day of September, 1887, the plaintiff, being the owner of the parcel of land described, "entered into an agreement in writing with the defendant, G. F. Mohn, Sr., whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to buy said land, upon the terms and conditions set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and the exhibit marked 'Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2;'" second, that Longstreet and White were not the agents of plaintiff, or employed by him for the sale of said premises; third, that the signature of the defendant to the said agreement of purchase and sale was not obtained by false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff, made by and through his agents; fourth, that plaintiff did not accept and receive the contract, or the first and second payments thereon, with the knowledge and notice that White was the purchaser of the property, or the real party in interest as the vendee thereof; fifth, that the plaintiff, prior to the institution of this suit, offered to execute and deliver to defendant a deed of the premises, together with a certificate of title, and demanded of him the balance due on the contract, but defendant declined to accept the deed and refused to pay the money; sixth, that there is now due the plaintiff upon said contract the sum of $1,167, principal and interest. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount found due, with costs, and the defendant appealed. It is contended for appellant that the findings were defective and insufficient in several particulars.

First it is claimed that there was no sufficient finding that defendant ever executed the contract set forth in the complaint, or as to what were the terms and conditions upon which the sale was made. This position is rested upon the last clause of the first finding, that the parties entered into an agreement to sell and buy the land upon the terms and conditions set forth in the complaint, and the exhibit marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2." It is said that this exhibit is not made a part of the pleadings, findings, or record, and is not referred to except in this manner. But the contract of sale was set out in hæc verba in the complaint. The defendant admitted that he signed that contract, and only alleged in substance that he did not execute it, in a legal sense, for the reason that his signature was obtained by fraud. There is no question, therefore, as to what were the terms and conditions of the contract which the defendant signed, and on which the plaintiff relied for a recovery. The only question then is, was the defendant bound by the contract, or not bound by it, because of the alleged frauds? The words "and the exhibit marked 'Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2,'" may be rejected as surplusage, as the finding is complete without them. It may be remarked in this connection, that the evidence is not brought up in the record, and we are not advised as to what was introduced, but, if need be, we might assume that plaintiff offered his contract, and it was received and marked as his "Exhibit No. 2."

It is next objected that the court found only the amount "due the plaintiff upon said contract," and not that the sum named was due from defendant. But as the plaintiff and defendant were the only parties who signed the contract, it must follow as a necessary inference, in view of the other findings, that if anything was due the plaintiff it was due from the defendant. We think, therefore, that this finding was sufficient.

It is further objected that the findings as to the affirmative matters set up in the answer were not sufficient. The substance of these matters is—First, that defendant's signature to the contract was obtained by fraud, consisting of false and fraudulent representations, etc.; second, that White was the purchaser and the real party in interest, and was so accepted and regarded by the plaintiff. It is true that findings should respond to and cover all of the material issues raised by the pleadings, but they should be statements only of the ultimate facts, and not of the probative facts. Mathews v. Kinsell, 41 Cal. 512. In this case, we think the findings did meet and negative all the ultimate facts affirmatively alleged in the answer, and that they should be held sufficient.

It is also contended that, under the rule that pleadings are to be construed most strongly against the pleader, the averment in the complaint that plaintiff, "prior to the institution of this suit, offered to execute and deliver to defendant a deed of said premises, together with a certificate of title, upon compliance," etc., must be construed as relating to a time immediately preceding the institution of the suit; that the offer of a deed and demand of payment were therefore not made until nearly 11 months after the money sued for became due and payable; and that plaintiff, by his neglect to tender the deed and demand payment when the money became due, had lost all right to sue for and recover the money under the express provisions of the contract. The provisions of the contract relied upon as effecting this result are those above quoted. It will be observed that it is also averred in the complaint "that plaintiff has duly performed all of the conditions of said contract to be performed by him to this time." This was a sufficient averment of the performance of conditions precedent, (section 457, Code Civil Proc.,) and it is not denied by the answer. This being so, how can it be said that plaintiff was in default and thereby lost his rights? But however this may be, it should be noticed that the substance of the provisions relied upon is that time is of the essence of the contract, and if defendant shall fail to comply with its terms, then the plaintiff shall be released from all obligations to convey the property, and defendant shall forfeit all right thereto, and to the moneys paid, and all his interest in or to the said moneys and property shall immediately cease, as fully as if the moneys had never been paid, or the agreement entered into. In this there is no provision that the plaintiff shall forfeit his rights if the money is not paid on time; and in Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 Pac. Rep. 629, where a similar contract was under review, it was held that the failure of the vendee to make the payments provided for did not make the contract void, so far as the vendor was concerned, but that he had the option to avoid or enforce the contract, and might, if he elected to do so, sue for and recover the balance of the purchase money. That case seems to be decisive of this, and, as the above are all the points made for a reversal, we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

EXAMINATION OF WITNESS—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE.

1. A party may interrogate his own witness by direct questions for the purpose of contradicting previous adverse testimony.

2. To invalidate a purchaser's title to property on the ground that the purchase was made in fraud of the rights of creditors, it is necessary to prove that the vendor made the conveyance with intent to hinder, cheat, or defraud his creditors, and also that the vendee was cognizant of such fraudulent intent in making the purchase.

3. These two matters may be proved conjointly or separately, by one witness or many, by direct or by circumstantial evidence. A wide range of evidence is allowable to show fraudulent intent, as well as notice thereof, in such transactions.

4. Parties committing such frauds usually seek to conceal the direct and positive evidences of their guilt; and hence resort must generally be had to circumstantial evidence. Circumstances, however slight, relating to the transaction, and tending to throw light upon its character, are competent evidence so far as the same are connected with the parties.

5. A party attempting to impeach the validity of a conveyance on the ground of fraud may give in evidence declarations of the vendor or vendee tending to reveal the character of the transaction, when such declarations are shown to have been made either in person or through the authorized intervention of a third party at or prior to the consummation of the sale.

6. A party, having introduced certain testimony tending to sustain his side of the issue, is precluded from denying the materiality of such testimony for the purpose of preventing its contradiction.

Error to superior court of Denver.

William E. Grimes, plaintiff below, brought suit against Zeph T. Hill, alleging that Hill had wrongfully taken and converted to his own use a large amount of personal property (merchandise) belonging to plaintiff. The defense relied on at the trial was to the effect that defendant, Hill, as United States marshal, seized the property in execution of a valid judgment in the United States court against one Brasher; and that whatever title Grimes had to the property was obtained by a fraudulent conveyance to him by Brasher, and so was void as against creditors whom the marshal represented. To sustain this defense, Frank Grimes was called, and testified, in substance, that the original plan was for him and his brother William to take the property as joint purchasers; that, just previous to the conveyance, Brasher had said to witness: "Joe Williams will call on you. He is coming around there to have a talk with you. * * * Brasher told me * * * that he wanted to have a third party speak to me, because I wouldn't have to swear to no lies on the witness stand." The witness then testified, circumstantially, to a conversation between himself and Williams, in which Williams represented that Brasher was in failing circumstances, and that his business would be closed up the next day; and proposed, in behalf of Brasher, a fictitious and fraudulent sale to the Grimes Bros., to enable Brasher to settle with his creditors, and then that Brasher should have his property and business back again. The witness further testified that, in pursuance of such proposition, he and his brother entered into negotiations with Brasher, but that at the last moment he (Frank) refused to have anything to do with the deal. The transfer, however, was immediately consummated with his brother William. In rebuttal of the testimony given by Frank Grimes, plaintiff called Joseph Williams, whose attention was directed to the time and place of the conversation between himself and Frank Grimes, and he was asked to give his statement of the conversation. Williams' testimony on that subject was quite brief, and of a very different character from that given by Frank Grimes. When it appeared that Williams could recollect nothing further, counsel for plaintiff proceeded to interrogate him by direct questions as to whether in that conversation he made certain of the damaging statements ascribed to him by the witness Grimes; but the court of its own motion refused to permit such questions to be asked, on the ground stated by the court, as follows: "Mr. Williams has testified to his version of the matter, and that ends it. You cannot ask Mr. Williams, 'Did not such a thing occur?' When you have asked him to state all that did occur, that is as far as you can go." Counsel for plaintiff then offered to prove by the witness Williams that "he did not tell to Frank Grimes that Brasher was in failing circumstances, or that Brasher's establishment would be closed the next day; that he (Williams) did not tell to said Grimes at the place named by said Grimes, or at any time or place, that, if he (Grimes) took or bought the retail business or stock of Brasher, when Brasher had fixed up he could give the stock back to Brasher, and Brasher would go on." This offer was objected to, and the objection was sustained. Plaintiff's counsel duly reserved exceptions to these several rulings of the court, and such rulings are assigned for error.

Joseph N. Baxter, for defendant in error.

ELLIOTT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The plaintiff acquired the property in controversy by a conveyance from one Brasher. Under the issues the burden of showing that the plaintiff's title was fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the vendor rested upon the defendant. To sustain this burden, Frank Grimes was called, and testified to certain statements made to him by one Joseph Williams, as the representative of the vendor, concerning the purposes of the proposed sale. In rebuttal, the plaintiff called said Williams, and by him, as a witness, offered to contradict the testimony of Frank Grimes in certain particulars; but the court refused to allow plaintiff's counsel to propound direct questions to the witness; and finally excluded the offered evidence altogether. The ground upon which the trial court excluded the evidence sought to be elicited from the witness Joseph Williams was clearly erroneous. The rule is well settled that under certain circumstances a party may interrogate his own witness by direct questions for the purpose of contradicting previous adverse testimony. A familiar example of the rule occurs where a witness has been charged by the testimony of another witness, already given at the trial, with having made certain statements in a former conversation between the two witnesses. In such case the latter witness, after giving his recollection of the conversation as fully as he can, may be asked the direct question whether in such conversation he made the statements, or any of them, imputed to him by the former witness, specifying in the question the substance of such statements. This rule of evidence, and the reasons upon which it is founded, have received thorough consideration by this court. See opinions in Gilpin v. Gilpin, 12 Colo. 510, 515, 21 Pac. Rep. 612, and the authorities there cited. An effort has been made in this court to sustain the rulings of the court below upon the ground that the testimony of Frank Grimes stating the conversation between himself and Joseph Williams was not competent evidence; that it was a conversation between parties not finally connected with the actual sale, and hence hearsay; and, further, that, such evidence having been received without objection, the court might in its discretion refuse to allow it to be contradicted. The latter view is not sustained by the record as a matter of fact. Plaintiff's counsel did object, and reserve an exception, to the ruling permitting Frank Grimes to state his conversation with Williams. The objection and exception, however, are not material. The language of the court permitting the testimony to be given, though somewhat suggestive, was not without foundation in the testimony already received. It was as follows: "Mr. Williams, it appears by the testimony, was made the agent of Mr. Brasher to make these declarations." It was certainly within the province of the jury, if they believed the witness Frank Grimes, to find that Brasher expected and had authorized Williams to say something to said witness which, if uttered by Brasher himself, would, in his opinion, militate against him in any controversy which might arise out of the contemplated transaction. The ruling of the court permitting Frank Grimes to state the conversation between himself and Williams was therefore correct, and the evidence thereby admitted was competent and relevant to the issue on trial.

To invalidate the plaintiff's title as a purchaser of the property in controversy, it was necessary to prove that Brasher made the conveyance with intent to hinder, cheat, or defraud his creditors, and also that plaintiff was cognizant of such fraudulent intent in making the purchase. It was competent to prove these two matters conjointly or separately, by one witness or many, by direct or by circumstantial evidence. A wide range of evidence is allowable to show fraudulent intent on the part of the vendor, as well as notice thereof to the vendee, in such transactions. Parties committing such frauds usually seek to conceal the direct and positive evidences of their guilt. Hence resort must generally be had to proof of circumstances somewhat remotely connected with the transaction. Circumstances, however slight, relating to the transaction, and tending to throw light upon its character, are competent evidence so far as the same are connected with the parties thereto, respectively. A party attempting to impeach the validity of a conveyance on the ground of fraud may give in evidence declarations of the vendor or vendee tending to reveal the character of the transaction, when such declarations are shown to have been made, either in person or through the authorized intervention of a third party, at or prior to the consummation of the sale. We need not, in this case, consider the question of subsequent declarations. Kerr, Fraud & M. p. 384; Bump, Fraud. Conv. pp. 560-564.

The evidence disclosed that the proposed purchasers were two brothers, Frank and William Grimes. According to the testimony of Frank Grimes, the vendor, Brasher, expressed a desire, shortly before the sale, that he (Frank) should talk with a third party, (Williams,) so as to avoid the effect of the personal declarations of the parties to the transaction as evidence in a court of justice. Williams talked with Frank Grimes, and proposed, in effect, according to Frank's testimony, that he and his brother William should take charge of the vendor's business and of the property in controversy temporarily under a simulated sale so as to enable the vendor to settle with his creditors. The testimony of Frank Grimes further shows that, immediately after this conversation with Williams, he and his brother William Grimes received from Brasher a substantial confirmation of William's authority. The negotiation proceeded accordingly. It was only at the last moment that Frank Grimes refused to become a party to the transaction, for the reason, among others, as he in effect testified he informed his brother at the time, that the proposed transaction was not politic, and might cause them to lose their business reputation and standing. The negotiation, however, was immediately consummated with William Grimes, plaintiff in this action. The defendant, having introduced the testimony concerning the conversation with Williams in support of his side of the issue, was not privileged to deny the materiality of such testimony for the purpose of preventing its contradiction. An offer to contradict in such a case is unlike an offer to introduce irrelevant matters by one party because other irrelevant or improper testimony has been received in behalf of the other party. Batdorff v. Bank, 61 Pa. St. 179; Mitchell v. Sellman, 5 Md. 376. But we need not rest our decision upon this ground; for, as we have seen, the testimony of Frank Grimes concerning the conversation with Williams was both relevant and material. It tended to show fraudulent intent on the part of the vendor in making the sale; and so it was competent evidence, even though the question of the vendee's alleged complicity in the fraud was left to be determined by other evidence. The weight of the evidence, however, was for the jury, as well as the credibility of the witness; and it was the absolute right of plaintiff to contradict his testimony, if it could be done, by competent evidence properly introduced in rebuttal. It was error, therefore, to exclude the offer of plaintiff to contradict any substantial part of Frank Grimes' testimony by the witness Joseph Williams.

We need not discuss the assignments of error relating to the charge of the court.

In the case of Sutton v. Dana, ante, 90, (recently decided by this court,) we had occasion to consider and express our views upon instructions to juries in cases of this kind, and we need not repeat them. The judgment of the superior court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CLELLAND et al. v. MCCUMBER.

RESIGNATION OF JUDGE—FAILURE TO PAY OVER MONEY—LIABILITY OF BOND.

1. When a county judge resigns his duty, without demand therefor, to turn over to his successor in office all moneys and effects which have come into his hands in the execution of the duties of his office, so far as the same have not been applied to legitimate purposes.

2. The failure of a county judge, upon resigning, to pay over money deposited in a condemnation proceeding, is a breach of his official bond; and thereupon a cause of action accrues to any one specially injured by such breach, as soon as legal damages result therefrom.

3. The petitioner in condemnation proceedings has an immediate and direct interest in the preliminary deposit at all times until the final adjudication, and until the same is applied to its ultimate purposes. The deposit is not payment, nor part payment, until it is actually so applied.

4. If by any means the deposit fails, petitioner becomes liable to replace the same or to lose possession of the premises. Hence, when a county judge resigns without paying over the deposit to his successor, an immediate legal injury results, and a cause of action thereupon accrues to petitioner upon the official bond of the defaulting officer.

Appeal from district court, Fremont county.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in an action upon the official bond of the county judge of Fremont county. The cause was submitted in the court below upon an agreed statement of facts, which may be summarized as follows: Copy of official bond of Robert A. Bain, as county judge, in sum of $5,000, and in form substantially as required by law, with James Clelland, J. L. Prentiss, S. W. Humphrey, and others as sureties. In October, 1880, the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Company commenced proceedings in the county court of Fremont county to condemn right of way for its road through the lands of Philip A. McCumber. By order of said court, the railway company deposited with Robert A. Bain, judge and acting clerk of said court, the sum of $225, the estimated compensation and damages for the right of way, and thereupon the railway company took possession of the land. In April, 1884, the condemnation proceeding was tried, and the sum of $1,940 was awarded and adjudged in favor of said McCumber. The railway company appealed the cause to the supreme court. In February, 1887, said appeal was dismissed, and thereupon the railway company duly assigned to said McCumber the deposit of $225. Shortly after the deposit was made, Judge Bain resigned his office, the resignation taking effect October 1, 1881; and Judge Waldo became his successor on the same day. Judge Bain did not pay over the deposit to his successor, nor has the same ever been paid to the railway company, or to said McCumber. On March 26, 1888, said McCumber, as assignee of the railway company, commenced this action upon the official bond of Judge Bain to recover damages on account of his failure to pay over said sum of $225. The appellants herein, being sureties upon his bond, were summoned as defendants. The finding and judgment were in favor of McCumber, appellee herein.

C. D. Bradley, for appellants. A. Macon, for appellee.

ELLIOTT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) On this appeal no objection is urged that the action was not brought in the name of the proper party. The assignments of error question only the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding and judgment under the issues; and the particular matter relied on is that the agreed statement of facts fully sustains the defense for the six-years statute of limitations, which was duly pleaded to the action. When Judge Bain resigned as county judge it was his duty, without demand therefor, to turn over to his successor in office all moneys and effects which had come into his hands in the execution of the duties of his office, so far as the same had not been applied to legitimate purposes. His failure to pay over the $225 deposited in the condemnation proceeding was therefore a breach of his official bond; and thereupon a cause of action accrued to any one specially injured by such breach, as soon as legal damages resulted therefrom. Gen. St. 1883, § 590; People v. Cramer, 15 Colo. —, ante, 302; San Francisco v. Heynemann, 71 Cal. 153, 11 Pac. Rep. 870; People v. Van Ness, 76 Cal. 121, 18 Pac. Rep. 139. The agreed statement of facts is silent as to whether or not McCumber, upon dismissal of the appeal by the supreme court, actually received the $1,940 awarded him; but, as he sues in this action as assignee of the railway company, and not in his own right, we must presume that his only cause of action is the legal injury resulting to the railway company in consequence of the failure of Judge Bain to pay over the deposit to his successor. The material question to be determined, then, is, when did such injury first result?

Without determining what interest, if any, the owner of the property sought to be taken or damaged has in the preliminary deposit before final judgment in condemnation proceedings, it seems clear that the petitioner making such deposit has an immediate and direct interest therein at all times until the final adjudication, and until the same is finally applied to its ultimate purposes. Such deposit is essential to petitioner's right of entry and possession. If by any means it is withdrawn before the final determination of the controversy, petitioner's right of possession is suspended. The preliminary deposit is not payment, nor part payment, until it is actually so applied. It is in the nature of a continuing tender, and must at all times be kept good by petitioner, though it lacks some of the incidents of tender, in that the owner is not bound to accept it or incur the risk of being mulcted in costs if it proves sufficient. In receiving the preliminary deposit, the court, or its proper officer, acts as the depository of the petitioner, who thereby, in pursuance of the statute, acquires the privilege of immediate entry and possession of the premises sought to be taken. The owner is an involuntary party to the proceeding. If by any means the deposit fails, petitioner's statutory privilege is at once imperiled, and the possession may be actually terminated unless the deposit be replaced. The deposit, therefore, must be considered as held by the public official at the risk of petitioner, until the same is actually applied to its ultimate purpose, or is otherwise legally disposed of. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 458 et seq.; Blackshire v. Railroad Co., 13 Kan. 514; White v. Railway Co., 64 Iowa, 281, 20 N. W. Rep. 436. From the foregoing it will be readily perceived that the failure of Judge Bain to pay over to his successor the deposit of $225 was not only a breach of his official bond, but such failure resulted in an immediate legal injury to the railway company. The company thereby became liable to replace the deposit or to lose possession of the premises. Hence a cause of action immediately accrued in favor of the company upon the judge's official bond, to recover the damages occasioned by the loss of the deposit. Such cause of action having accrued at the date of the breach of the bond, October 1, 1881, and this action not having been commenced until March, 1888, it was barred by the statute of limitations as against the railway company or any one suing in the right of such company. The judgment must accordingly be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the action.

FAIRBANKS et al. v. IRWIN.

CHALLENGE OF JURORS—TRIAL—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

1. That a person called as a juror is acquainted with the attorney of one of the parties to the suit, and had employed him at one time to do certain legal business, is not sufficient ground upon which to base a challenge for cause.

2. Where the only defense pleaded consists of affirmative averments of new matter, the burden of the issue rests upon the defendant, and he is entitled to open and close the evidence and argument at the trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, Lake county. This was an action brought by Horace Fairbanks and others, plaintiffs, as payees of certain promissory notes executed by the defendant, Irwin. The defendant pleaded specially and circumstantially to the effect that the notes were given for the price of a certain brick-making machine sold by plaintiffs to defendant, that the machine was warranted to do good work, that it did not do good work, and that the consideration of the notes had failed by reason of a breach of such warranty. The verdict and judgment were for defendant, and the plaintiffs bring this appeal.

W. J. Weeber, for appellants. N. Rollins, for appellee.

ELLIOTT, J. The first assignment of error relating to the demurrer to plaintiffs' replication was withdrawn upon the oral argument before this court. One C. A. Jones was called as a juror. Being examined upon his voir dire, it appeared that he was acquainted with defendant's attorney, whom he had employed at one time to do certain legal business. This was not sufficient ground upon which to base a challenge for cause, and the court did not err in overruling such challenge. Code, § 182. Failure of consideration of the notes sued on was the only defense pleaded in the action. The defense consisted of affirmative averments of new matter, and under it the burden of the issue rested upon the defendant. In such case it was not error to allow defendant to open and close with the evidence and argument at the trial. Code, § 187; Gen. St. 1883, § 110; Patterson v. Gile, 1 Colo. 200; Munro v. King, 3 Colo. 238. That Craycroft was the agent of plaintiffs sent to test the brick-machine sold to defendant with a guaranty was positively proved by a certain deposition read in evidence in behalf of plaintiffs at the trial; so the objection to the competency of certain testimony given by defendant to show such agency becomes immaterial.

The remaining assignments of error relate to the evidence and instructions. Upon examination, we are of opinion that they do not require special discussion in this opinion. The evidence appears to have been properly received and submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions. The verdict cannot properly be disturbed. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

BLYTHE et al. v. DENVER & R. G. RY. CO.

CARRIERS—NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE—ACT OF GOD—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action against a railroad company to recover the value of an express package, it appeared that the express-car, with three others, was blown from the track by a gale, into such a position that all the goods must have been thrown into one corner at the top; that the car was immediately set on fire by coals from the stove, and burned so rapidly that the messenger escaped with difficulty; and that the wind was so fierce as to make it almost impossible to stand or walk, and the air so full of dust that one could scarcely see. Held sufficient evidence to support a finding that the proximate cause was the "act of God," and not the failure of the company to remove the goods after the car was overturned.

2. Even if not technically correct, no prejudice could have resulted to plaintiff from a charge that, "where one is pursuing a lawful avocation, in a lawful manner, and something occurs which no human skill or precaution could foresee or prevent, and as a consequence the accident takes place, this is called 'inevitable accident' or the 'act of God.'"

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Arapahoe county.

Plaintiffs in error brought suit against the defendant as a common carrier for the loss of a package of merchandise consisting of gold and silver watches, watch-cases and movements, of the alleged value of $726.95, delivered to defendant at Alamosa by one J. B. Moomaw, to be carried as an express package, directed to and to be delivered to plaintiffs at Denver. The package was not valued, and was accepted and receipted for as an ordinary package at a nominal valuation of $50, upon which charges of 65 cents were paid in advance for its transportation. The defendant, after denying the material allegations of the complaint, admitted the receipt of the package, the payment of the money for its transportation, the execution and delivery of its receipt for the same, and specially alleged as defenses: First, that the car in which such package was being transported was blown from the track by a furious wind, and the car and contents destroyed by fire, and that the loss was by inevitable accident and "the act of God;" second, that the shipper fraudulently concealed the value of the package, and it was received as being only of the value of $50; that it was placed in the body of the car, where ordinary packages were usually carried; that defendant had a fire-proof safe in the car, and had the shipper given the true value, and paid transportation for such value, the goods would have been placed in the safe, and would not have been lost; that, by the terms of the receipt given, defendant was exempted from any liability exceeding $50. A replication was filed putting in issue the special matters pleaded in defense, and averring negligence in not securing the package in the safe, and in not making proper efforts to save the property at the time of the disaster. The case was tried to a jury, resulting in a verdict for the defendant, and judgment upon the verdict.

Walcott & Valle, for defendant in error.

REED, C., (after stating the facts as above.) It is conceded that the wrecking of a portion of the train, such portion consisting of one engine and four cars, one being the express-car in which the goods were being carried, was by "the act of God," and inevitable. It is also conceded in argument that having a coal fire burning in a stove, and a lighted lamp in the compartment, as testified to, was not negligence on the part of the carrier. Counsel for plaintiffs in error in reply say: "In the brief of defendant in error, counsel have assumed for us a claim which we have not made, and they then proceed to demolish such assumed claim. They assume for us that we claim there was negligence in carrying in the car a stove with fire in it. * * * There was negligence,—we may call it by that name,—but such negligence was in not making the requisite efforts to save the goods after the peril had been incurred. We make no claim that there was negligence in carrying a stove in the car." By these concessions, two important questions are eliminated, and the issues are narrowed, the only questions remaining being: First. Was "the act of God" the proximate and direct cause of the loss sustained, so as to exonerate the carrier from liability, or was it the remote cause, and the fire against which the carrier is supposed to be an insurer the proximate and direct cause?

Second. After the wrecking and overturning of the train by "the act of God," was the carrier guilty of negligence in failing to protect and secure the goods in the burning car?

Great ability and research have been expended in attempting to arrive at and determine upon some general definition of the terms "proximate" and "remote" causes and establish a rule and a line of demarkation between the two. Such efforts appear to have been but partially successful. Both have received various definitions, though differently worded, amounting to practically the same thing. But, in almost every instance where they have been attempted to be applied, their applicability seems to have been determined by the peculiar circumstances of the case under consideration. Webster defines "proximate cause," "that which immediately precedes and produces the effect, as distinguished from the remote, mediate, or predisposing cause." And, Dict. Law: "The nearest, the immediate, the direct cause; the efficient cause; the cause that sets another or other causes in operation, or dominant cause." But with these definitions in view, when two causes unite to produce the loss, the question still remains, which was the proximate cause? In Insurance Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 52, the late lamented Mr. Justice MILLER said: "We have had cited to us a general review of the doctrine of proximate and remote causes, as it has arisen and been decided in the courts in a great variety of cases. It would be an unprofitable labor to enter into an examination of these cases. If we could deduce from them the best possible expression of the rule, it would remain after all to decide each case largely upon the special facts belonging to it, and often upon the very nicest discriminations." In Howard Fire Ins. Co. v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co., 12 Wall. 199, in delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice STRONG said: "And certainly, that cause which set the other in motion, and gave to it its efficiency to do harm at the time of the disaster, must rank as predominant." In Railroad Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 475, it is said: "The inquiry must therefore always be whether there was any intermediate cause disconnected from the primary fault, and self-operating, which produced the injury." In Insurance Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 130, it is said: "The proximate cause is the efficient cause; the one that necessarily sets the other causes in operation. The causes that are merely incidental or instruments of a superior or controlling agency are not the proximate causes and the responsible ones, though they may be nearer in time to the result. It is only when the causes are independent of each other that the nearest is, of course, to be charged with the disaster."

Leaving out of consideration, as we must, by concession of counsel, all question of negligence in regard to the burning fire in the stove, a lighted kerosene lamp, and regarding each of them as securely protected against damage as prudence would require, and applying the rules above laid down, it becomes apparent that the overturning and wrecking of the car by the violence of the wind was the proximate, direct, and efficient cause of the loss, and the fire following, if not instantaneously, immediately after, without negligence or any wrongful act of the carrier intervening to produce it, must be regarded as resulting and incidental. It is ably contended in argument, and many supposed authorities in support of the position are cited, that the negligence of the carrier in failing to use proper exertion to save the contents of the car, after it was overturned, rendered the defendant liable for the loss. If, by proper diligence and attention the goods could have been rescued, a failure to secure them would have fixed the liability of the carrier. There can be no doubt of the correctness of this conclusion. The questions, what was the proximate cause of the loss, and of negligence, were questions of fact to be determined by the jury from the evidence, under proper instructions from the court. There was not much conflict of testimony. In Railroad Co. v. Kellogg, supra, it is said: "In the nature of things, there is in every transaction a succession of events, more or less dependent upon those preceding, and it is the province of the jury to look at this succession of events or facts, and ascertain whether they are naturally and probably connected with each other by a continuous sequence, or are dis severed by new and independent agencies; and this must be determined in view of the circumstances existing at the time." The jury found as a fact that the "act of God" was the proximate cause, and also found as a fact that there was no negligence. Viewed in the light of all the evidence, and of attendant circumstances, the finding of the jury was fully warranted. The force of the gale was such as to blow the cars from the track over the embankment. It was shown to be almost impossible for men to stand or walk, and they were compelled to prostrate themselves under the lee of the track or bank to escape its fury. The air was so full of dust and flying material that scarcely anything could be seen. The car contained inflammable material, and the fire succeeded the overturning almost instantaneously. The messenger escaped with great difficulty, and not without injury from the flames. The position of the car was such that all movable goods must have been hurled into the corner of the top of the car. From the force of the wind, and combustible material of the car, it is obvious that the destruction of the car and contents was inevitable in a very brief space of time, and that any attempt to rescue the goods would have been unavailing.

Considerable criticism is directed to the instructions of the court. Some of those criticised, and upon which errors are assigned, are in regard to negligence in the use of the stove and lamp. As counsel concedes in his final argument that there was no negligence in that respect, a review of them becomes unnecessary. Considerable attention is given to the eighth instruction, in which the learned judge charged: "Where one is pursuing a lawful avocation, in a lawful manner, and something occurs which no human skill or precaution could foresee or prevent, and as a consequence the accident takes place, this is called 'inevitable accident' or the 'act of God.' The objection is more technical than substantial. While it is, possibly, not technically correct, and while there is a legal distinction between "inevitable accident" and the "act of God," we can see nothing in it to the prejudice of the plaintiff, or that could have misled the jury. The immediate resulting cause producing the loss was the fire, which might properly be termed an "inevitable accident" growing out of the former disaster; while the direct cause of the agency that worked the destruction was the "act of God," putting the resulting agent at work. We think the charge, taken as a whole, was a fair and impartial statement of the law, and should be sustained. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

LAHAY V. CITY NAT. BANK OF DENVER.

DECEIT—IDENTIFICATION OF A PAYEE.

A bank which ignorantly pays money to the holder of an instrument upon the faith of a third person's statement that he knows the holder to be the payee, and is afterwards compelled to pay the amount to the true payee, may recover the sum from the third person in an action of deceit.

Appeal from superior court of Denver.

This cause of action arose in consequence of the payment of money to the wrong person upon the following written instrument: "First National Bank of Chicago. Chicago, 7, 3, 1885. City Nat'l Bank, Denver, Colo.: Your account has credit for six hundred dollars, deposited by J. Phillips, for use of John Phillips. Confirmation of above will be given in our advice of this date. $600. K. CHAPMAN, Teller." It is alleged in the complaint that this instrument came into the possession of one Paul D'Armenthal, who applied to appellee for the payment of the sum mentioned therein, representing that he was the payee, John Phillips, and indorsed thereon the name of said John Phillips, representing said indorsement to be his own name and signature. That both John Phillips and Paul D'Armenthal were then wholly unknown to appellee, and to its officers and employees, and the signature and handwriting of the said D'Armenthal was likewise unknown. That appellee refused to pay the amount called for by said certificate to the said D'Armenthal until he should be identified as and shown to be John Phillips. That appellant, in whom appellee reposed special trust and confidence, appeared at the banking-house of appellee in said city of Denver, and identified the said D'Armenthal as John Phillips; and appellant, well knowing the premises, and well knowing appellee's ignorance as aforesaid, and that appellee would not pay over to the said D'Armenthal the sum of money mentioned in said certificate, and for the purpose of enabling the said D'Armenthal to obtain from appellee the said sum of money, and to induce appellee to pay the same, thereupon falsely identified the said D'Armenthal as John Phillips, and then and there stated to appellee that he knew the said D'Armenthal to be John Phillips as of his own knowledge, when in truth and in fact said statement was false, and the said D'Armenthal was not John Phillips, and said appellant had no knowledge that said person was John Phillips; but appellee, being ignorant as aforesaid, and relying solely upon the identification and statement of said appellant, then and there paid over to said D'Armenthal the full sum of $600 called for by said certificate. That on the 10th day of August, 1885, the said John Phillips, the party for whom such certificate was in fact intended, and who was entitled to said money, instituted in the superior court of Denver his action against appellee to recover said sum of money in said certificate mentioned, and on said date appellee gave notice in writing to appellant of the pendency of said suit. That thereafter judgment in said suit was entered in favor of the plaintiff therein, and against appellee, for the sum of $620, and for costs, amounting to $16.35, which appellee paid and satisfied in full. And appellee further avers that it was compelled to have counsel and attorneys to defend said action, whose services were reasonably worth the sum of $75, and demands judgment against appellant for said sum and costs. The answer of the appellant is a specific denial of each allegation contained in the complaint. Upon these pleadings the cause was tried to the court without a jury; the trial resulting in findings and judgment against appellant for the sum of $764.30 and costs.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The allegations of the complaint are established by a large preponderance of the evidence introduced at the trial. In addition to this, we have the findings of the trial court in support thereof. The only question to be considered upon this appeal, therefore, is, are the facts as pleaded sufficient, under the law, to give appellee a right of recovery as against appellant? The action is founded upon the deceit practiced upon appellee by appellant, by means of which appellee was induced to pay the amount of the certificate to D'Armenthal, who had no claim to the money, instead of to John Phillips, who alone was entitled to receive the same. Counsel contended, however, that appellant is not liable on account of his false statement, because he is not shown to have had knowledge of its falsity at the time of making the same. The question thus presented was before the court, and carefully considered, in an early case. See

Sellar v. Clelland, 2 Colo. 532. It was then held that the intention of one party to deceive and defraud another was sufficiently made out by showing that a false affirmation had in fact been made by the party, concerning a matter about which he had no actual knowledge, under circumstances showing that the matter spoken about was better known to the party making the representations than to the other party. And to the general rule requiring a party relying upon false representations to show not only that they were false, but that the party making the same knew such to be the case, some exceptions were pointed out; as when one, as in this case, positively assures another that a certain statement is true, professing at the time to speak of his own knowledge, and about a matter not known to the party to whom the representations are made, he cannot be allowed to complain because another has placed too much reliance upon the truth of what he himself has stated. In the language of the learned judge writing the opinion in the case of Sellar v. Clelland, supra: "In such a case the proof would seem to be complete when it was shown that the defendants made the representations; that they were made to induce plaintiffs to enter into the contract; that, relying upon the same, they did enter into the contract; that the representations were false; that the plaintiffs sustained damage; and that such damage was occasioned by reason of the falsity of such representations."

The statute of frauds and perjuries cannot be invoked in this case to shield appellant. His liability does not grow out of any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another; nor is he sought to be held upon any agreement required to be in writing. Appellant is shown to have stated as of his own knowledge that Paul D'Armenthal was in fact John Phillipe, and that this representation was made for the express purpose of inducing appellee to pay over the money. It is also shown that the bank, relying upon such representation, did pay the money to D'Armenthal, supposing him to be the John Phillipe entitled to receive the same. The representations were in fact false, and damages were sustained thereby. Every element necessary to a recovery under the decision in Sellar v. Clelland was here made out. The correctness of the decision in that case is not questioned. It is well supported by authority, and must control here. The judgment will accordingly be affirmed.

HALL v. COWLES' ESTATE.

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—RIGHTS OF HEIRS.

1. A granddaughter who, in the right of her deceased mother, sets up a claim against an alleged trustee of personal property belonging to her grandfather's estate, cannot maintain the action when it appears that by reason of a will, whose terms are not shown, no interest in the estate came to her mother until the death of testator's wife. The fact that a will existed negatives any right to claim for the mother under the statute of distributions.

2. The daughter has no legal capacity to sue merely as a distributee of her mother's estate. The right of action is in the personal representative.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Custer county.

This proceeding was started in the county court of Custer county by the filing of a claim against the estate of William Cowles, of which the following is a copy: "The estate of William Cowles, deceased, to Helen S. Durand Hall, daughter of Henry S. and Caroline B. Durand, and granddaughter of Roswell Cowles, formerly of Meriden, Connecticut, now deceased, debtor. For my one-third portion of the trust funds belonging to my mother, the said Caroline B. Durand, now deceased, that the said William Cowles, as administrator of the estate of Roswell Cowles, deceased, the father of my said mother, received into his hands in the year 1863, and has never paid over or accounted for same, or any part thereof, or rendered any account thereof, to the court of probate in and for said town of Meriden, New Haven county, state of Connecticut, my said mother being heir at law of said Roswell Cowles, and entitled to one-fourth part of his said estate, which amounted to exceeding the sum of twelve thousand dollars, after all debts and expenses were paid; the portion belonging to my mother, Caroline B. Durand, being $3,000, of which I am entitled to one-third, or $1,000; with 24 years' interest, at 7 per cent., $1,670, total claim, $2,670. HELEN S. HALL." The claim was disallowed, and from this order an appeal was taken to the district court, where the case was tried, and judgment again given against the claimant. The evidence in support of the claimant's account was found principally in two depositions,—one of the father of the claimant, Helen S. Hall, and the other of Emily F. Bell. From the evidence it appears that Roswell Cowles, who formerly lived in Meriden, Conn., died in July, 1848, leaving an estate, and a will disposing of it, by which instrument James S. Brooks was appointed executor. The executor Brooks died in 1862, and Mrs. Cowles, the widow of Roswell, died in 1865. The proof as to the disposition of the estate stops with the showing of the existence of an estate, a will, and an executor. No evidence was offered as to the terms of the will, or the disposition of the property, other than general statements that the property was managed by the executor during his life-time. It was shown that Roswell Cowles died, leaving sundry children, and that Caroline B. Durand, the mother of Helen, the claimant, was one of these children. Whether, by the will which Roswell Cowles executed, the widow took the entire estate, or whether the children were the residuary legatees, and, if so, in what proportion they took, nowhere appears. The witnesses whose depositions were taken state that William Cowles "was the last trustee;" and he is characterized by general statement as the "trustee of the estate of Roswell Cowles, deceased." There is no evidence otherwise of his being a trustee responsible to the claimant, or to the heirs of the estate of Roswell Cowles. He is not shown to have been appointed by the order of any court, by any will, nor by any convention between him and any of the parties in interest. It appears from the testimony that Roswell left five children, one of whom was a daughter, Caroline B., who subsequently intermarried with Henry S. Durand, who testifies that Caroline died, leaving three children. The place of her residence at the date of her death is not shown, nor does it appear whether she died intestate, or left a will. In the course of the testimony, there were produced two notes, dated October 19, 1868, running to the order of Caroline, and signed by William Cowles. Some testimony was introduced which tended to show that these notes were given to represent Caroline's interest in the estate of her father, Roswell; that they were not executed in liquidation of the claim, but were held simply as evidence of the extent of her right. The evidence does not show the amount of Roswell's estate which came into William's hands, nor its value, except as it may be said to be presumptively established by the terms of the notes produced. Judgment was rendered in the district court affirming the order of the county court disallowing the claim, from which the claimant appeals.

BISSELL, C., (after stating the facts as above.) The validity of a claim against the estate of a decedent is not necessarily determined by its antiquity; but, when the ancestor permits a period exceeding thrice the statute of limitations to go by without attempt at legal enforcement, the heir should be held to strict proof of whatever may be necessary to take the case out of the operation of the statute, and of what may be essential to a recovery. According to the record, this claim, if it ever had an existence as against the estate of Roswell Cowles, became enforceable in February, 1865, upon the death of the widow. At that date the heirs at law of Roswell succeeded to the entire inheritance, if it were undisposed of by will. It is shown, however, by such proof as is deemed sufficient to establish the debt, that Roswell disposed of the estate by will, and that by reason of the provisions of that document the estate remained undistributed from 1848 to 1868, three years after the demise of the widow. While not accurately proven, it seems to be conceded that, and because of the will, Caroline B. Durand, the ancestor, succeeded to no right in the estate until after her mother's death. Such being the case, and it being conceded that there was a will disposing of Roswell Cowles' estate, it was important, and even absolutely indispensable, to show what that will was, in order to derive any claim by inheritance through the immediate heir, the mother of the present claimant. When the existence of a will disposing of the estate is once conceded, no heir can establish any rights by inheritance on simple proof of descent. Under such circumstances the statutes of descent and distribution do not become operative. It is thus evident that Caroline B. Durand might be the daughter of Roswell Cowles, and live and die without ever having acquired any right to share in his estate. No proof was offered on this subject, and the claimant, Helen S. Hall, failed to establish her distributive right to any share in Roswell Cowles' estate through the right of her mother. There was a like failure to establish the liability of William Cowles, or of his estate. He was an heir of Roswell, and the brother of Caroline B. According to the testimony, he came into possession of some money, and of some stocks of undetermined value. But there was a failure of proof as to two important questions: Was this property a part of Roswell Cowles' estate? and did he receive it as trustee, so as to come within any rule depriving him of the benefit of a plea of the statute of limitations? There is a strong presumption arising from the testimony that William, on the death of the original executor, Brooks, succeeded to the control of some part of his father's estate; but it lacks the certainty essential to the enforcement of so ancient a claim. It was indispensable to show with certainty that he got money which was a part of the estate, and to prove the amount of it. Neither was established by sufficient or satisfactory proof. The failure to establish the capacity in which William took what he may have gotten is equally apparent. Without deciding whether a trustee is forbidden to insist on the plea of the statute, it is enough in this case to hold that the claimant failed to prove that William Cowles occupied any such position. If he received any part of his father's estate, it is not shown where, how, or from whom he got it. It may have come into his hands by loan, or from third parties, to whom alone he would be answerable. The absence of evidence establishing the existence of the relation of trustee and cestui que trust would forbid the application of the rule contended for.

If the mother of Caroline B., living, had an enforceable claim against William or his estate, the right, or any portion of it, did not descend to the heir at law, Helen S. Hall. Upon the death of the mother, whatever of property right she may have had in it went to her legal representative, whoever that might be; and only in his right of representation could he sue for and collect it. It may be true, according to the evidence, that under the laws of Wisconsin the children inherit from the mother, to the exclusion of the husband and father. It did not appear either that the mother lived and died in Wisconsin, or that the general rule of law which vests the right to all personal property in the representative was varied by statute in that state. The inheritance could only be available through an appeal to the statutes of descent and distribution. The administrator or the executor could alone present or enforce this claim. The present proceeding is an attempt to collect an undistributed share of an undivided portion of an unsettled estate. No authority for such an unusual proceeding was cited or referred to. Unless compelled by well-recognized adjudications, no such rule will be followed or declared. These considerations must control the judgment in this case. The claimant is without the legal capacity essential to the maintenance of the action; and, whatever may have been the rights of Caroline B. Durand in her father's estate, they were not established with sufficient certainty to permit a recovery, even though it were conceded that the daughter had the right to prosecute the claim. The judgment should be affirmed.

RICHMOND and REED, CC., concurring.

IN RE SPEAKERSHIP OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Jan. 23, 1891.)
STATE LEGISLATURE—IMPEACHMENT OF SPEAKER—REMOVAL.

1. The speaker of the house of representatives is not a state officer, and is not liable to removal by impeachment.

2. The house of representatives has the power, by a vote of the majority of the whole number of members elected, to remove its speaker from office, and to elect another in his stead.

Section 3 of article 6 of the constitution of Colorado contains the following provision: "The supreme court shall give its opinion upon important questions, upon solemn occasions, when required by the governor, the senate, or the house of representatives; and all such opinions shall be published in connection with the reported decisions of said court." In pursuance of said provision, the following communication and interrogations were duly submitted to the court: "To the Honorable, the Supreme Court of the State of Colorado—Sirs: The eighth general assembly of the state of Colorado met at 12 o'clock noon on the first Wednesday, the 7th day, of January, 1891. The house of representatives on said day elected one of its members, Hon. James W. Hanna, a speaker, who was at once sworn in as such speaker, and continued thereafter to exercise the duties thereof, and was duly recognized by the members of the general assembly and by the executive of the state as such speaker, and he is now such speaker, unless deposed by the action of members of said house while in session, as hereinafter stated. On the 14th day of January, 1891, certain of the members of said house, constituting a majority thereof, while said house was in session as aforesaid, and said James W. Hanna was occupying the speaker's chair, and engaged in the discharge of his duties as such speaker, sought to depose said Hanna as speaker in manner following, to-wit: A motion was duly made by a member of said house, and duly seconded by a member thereof, that the office of speaker of said house be declared vacant, which motion said Hanna refused to entertain; whereupon a member of said house, not the speaker thereof, propounded said motion, and called upon the other members to vote thereon; and thereupon a majority of the whole number of members elected to said house announced themselves in favor of said motion, and the member so propounding said motion declared the same adopted, and the office of speaker vacant. Thereupon, and after the office had been declared vacant in manner aforesaid, said Hanna, upon a viva voce vote, declared the house adjourned, the majority claiming they had voted against said motion. Immediately thereafter a majority of said members, proceeding in manner as before, assumed to elect Hon. Jesse White, a member thereof, as speaker of said house, who thereupon took oath to perform the duties of speaker. Both said Hanna and said White now claim to be the speaker of said house, and are both assuming to discharge the duties thereof. As governor of this state I am and will be required by the constitution and laws of said state to communicate with the speaker of said house upon official and executive business; and I will be required to approve or disapprove acts passed by the said assembly which bear the signature and authentication of the speaker. I certify, therefore, that the questions submitted are important, and arise upon a solemn occasion, wherein I, as the executive of Colorado, require the opinion of the supreme court, in order to properly discharge my duties. I respectfully request, therefore, the opinion of the honorable supreme court, in answer to the following questions: First. Under the constitution and laws of this state, can a speaker of the house of representatives, duly elected, qualified, and acting as such, be removed from office in the manner aforesaid? Second. Who is now the speaker of said house? I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant, JOHN L. ROYCE, Governor."

Upon reception of said communication, it was ordered that an oral argument be heard before the court upon the following questions: "(1) Has the court any authority under the constitution and laws to pass upon the matters thus presented for its opinion? (2) What is the state of the law, parliamentary or otherwise, pertaining to the subjects covered by the executive inquiry?" It was further ordered that the attorney general, and other members of the bar interested in the subjects to be considered, be requested to participate, as amici curiæ, in said argument. Mr. Joseph H. Maupin, attorney general, appeared at the hearing, and introduced Mr. James B. Belford, Mr. Charles S. Thomas, Mr. Hugh Butler, Mr. Joel T. Valle, and Mr. Harvey Riddell, who addressed the court upon the questions presented.

ELLIOTT, J. The gravity of the subject presented for the consideration of the court by the communication and interrogatories submitted by his excellency, the governor, has caused us to depart from the general custom of returning categorical answers to such inquiries. Inasmuch as the subject incidentally involves nothing less than the legality of the organization of one branch of the general assembly, and as we have invited and heard able and exhaustive arguments in behalf of the respective claimants to the speakership, we feel that an opinion should be given setting forth the grounds upon which our conclusions are based.

It was urged in argument with great force that this court ought not to express any opinion upon the questions presented by the executive, for the reason that it would be an interference with matters pertaining exclusively to the legislative department of the government, and therefore in conflict with article 3 of the constitution, which divides the governmental powers of the state "into three distinct departments,—the legislative, executive, and judicial,"—and forbids those of one department from exercising "any power properly belonging to either of the others, except as in this constitution expressly directed or permitted." It was further urged that the court could not properly assume to give its opinion upon a question presented by the governor unless the court would have jurisdiction to determine and enforce its views in a direct proceeding involving such question; and it was strongly insisted that the court could not, in any direct proceeding, determine a controversy between contesting claimants for the office of speaker, though it was conceded that, indirectly or incidentally, the court might be required to pass upon such question. Prince v. Skillin, 71 Me. 361.

It must be admitted that the promulgation of a judicial opinion in response to an ex parte inquiry from the executive department of the government, concerning the affairs of the legislative department, is anomalous and peculiar, and, apparently at least, inconsistent with the prevalent American system of separating the governmental powers into distinct departments. But it must be borne in mind that the same instrument which divides the powers of the government into distinct departments has been so amended by the voice of the people as to require the supreme court to "give its opinion upon important questions, upon solemn occasions, when required by the governor, the senate, or the house of representatives." Article 6, § 3. We have heretofore endeavored to restrict somewhat the class of subjects upon which the opinion of this court might be required under such amendment. In re Irrigation, 9 Colo. 620, 21 Pac. Rep. 470; In re Senate Bill No. 65, 12 Colo. 466, 21 Pac. Rep. 478; In re Appropriations, 13 Colo. 316, 22 Pac. Rep. 464. Certainly, no constitutional question, or question publici juris, can be of more importance, nor can any occasion be more solemn, than that arising from the present contention respecting the organization of the house of representatives. The subject involves, not merely the constitutionality of a particular bill or enactment, but it may involve the validity of all further proceedings and enactments of the present general assembly. Therefore, while deploping the occasion which has led the executive to request our opinion in the present exigency, we do not feel at liberty to decline answering; we feel constrained by the imperative command of the constitution to give our opinion upon the subject thus pressed upon our consideration. We shall examine into and declare what we conceive to be the strict legal powers of the house of representatives relative to the matter referred to us, irrespective of the policy or expediency of exercising those powers.

From the foundation of representative government in this country, the general rule, as announced by standard American authors on parliamentary law, has been that the legislative body of a state, having the power to choose its own speaker from its own members, has also the inherent power to remove such officer at its will or pleasure, unless inhibited from so doing by some constitutional or other controlling provision of law. Such is the doctrine announced in the Manual of Parliamentary Practice prepared and published by President Jefferson during the early days of the republic, and republished by the authority of successive congresses of the United States since that period. It is unnecessary to speak of the pre-eminent merit of this work, or of the distinguished character and ability of its author. In Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, a comprehensive work of great merit, the distinguished author, at paragraph 299, says: "The presiding officer, being freely elected by the members, by reason of the confidence which they have in him, is removable by them, at their pleasure, in the same manner, whenever he becomes permanently unable, by reason of sickness or otherwise, to discharge the duties of his place, and does not resign his office; or whenever he has, in any manner, or for any cause, forfeited or lost the confidence upon the strength of which he was elected." In Hatsell's Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons, a very old and valuable treatise, (volume 2, p. 230,) it is said: "The speaker, though he ought upon all occasions to be treated with the greatest respect and attention by the individual members of the house, is in fact, as was said on the 9th of March, 1620, but a servant to the house, and not their master; and it is therefore his first duty to obey implicitly the orders of the house, without attending to any other commands." It is, however, contended on constitutional grounds that the house of representatives of this state does not have the power, by a vote or resolution of the house, to remove the speaker from office. It is clear that such power does exist according to common parliamentary law; and it is conceded that the constitution nowhere expressly forbids such removal; but it is claimed that, by virtue of certain constitutional provisions, the power of the house to thus remove the speaker from office is prohibited by implication. One ground upon which this claim is based is that the speaker is a state officer, and can be removed from office only by impeachment. Const. art. 13, § 2. It is claimed that the speaker is a state officer because he is charged with the duty of receiving, opening, and publishing the election returns for state officers in the presence of both houses of the general assembly. (Const. art. 4, § 3;) and that, in a certain contingency, the duties of governor may devolve upon him, (Id. § 15.)

These provisions, in our judgment, fall far short of establishing the proposition, that a member of the house of representatives, by virtue of his election to the office of speaker, becomes a state officer, or that he is thereby exempted from the power, discipline, and control of the house as a member and officer thereof. It is true, the speaker of the house may, in a certain contingency, be required to discharge certain duties in connection with the administration of the state government; but he must at all times, so long as he is the speaker, be a member of the house of representatives. The house has no authority to elect a person, not a member, to the speakership. A member, by virtue of his election as speaker, does not lose his character or status as a member. On the contrary, he must retain his status as a member in order to hold the office of speaker. His rights and privileges as a member are in no way impaired by his election to the speakership, nor are his emoluments increased thereby. His speakership is dependent upon his membership. Something has been claimed on account of the phraseology of section 10 of article 5 of the constitution, which provides: "The house of representatives shall elect one of its members as speaker. Each house shall choose its other officers." The use of the word "elect" in reference to the speaker, and the word "choose" in reference to the other officers, was, in our opinion, a mere matter of rhetoric. The national constitution (article 1, § 2) reads: "The house of representatives shall choose their speaker and other officers." But the words "its other officers," in the section of our state constitution above quoted, are quite significant; they show clearly that the speaker is classed as an officer of the house, rather than as a state officer.

There appears to be no substantial reason for concluding that the duty of receiving, opening, and publishing the election returns for officers of the executive department before both houses of the general assembly was devolved upon the speaker on the ground that he was a state officer; nor do we see how the devolving of such duty upon the speaker in any way tends to make him a state officer, any more than it makes state officers of all the members of the general assembly who are required to participate in the canvass of such returns. It seems far more probable that the lieutenant governor is exempted from such duty because he is a state officer. The duties of governor cannot be devolved upon the speaker of the house of representatives except in the contingency that the governor, the lieutenant governor, and the president of the senate are incapacitated from discharging the same. There is little force in the argument that the speaker becomes a state officer in advance of the happening of such remote contingency. Such contingency can scarcely occur when the general assembly is in session; for though the offices of governor and lieutenant governor may become vacant during a legislative session, nevertheless the senate is specially required to have a president pro tempore to preside over its deliberations, (Const. art. 5, § 10;) and the president of the senate precedes the speaker in the contingent gubernatorial succession, (Id. art. 4, §§ 14, 15.) No reason appears why any of the special duties devolved upon the speaker by the constitution may not as well be performed by any member holding the office of speaker at the time when the contingency occurs requiring their performance, as by the one chosen to such office at the beginning of the legislative session. Again, the speaker does not derive his office from the suffrages of the electors throughout the state; nor is he chosen for any specified term, as is the case with the officers of the executive department, with whom it is sought to classify him as a state officer. Indeed, the mode of electing the speaker is not in any manner provided for by the constitution. The provision is simply, "The house of representatives shall elect one of its members as speaker;" leaving the manner of his election and the tenure of his office to the will of the body from which he derives his office, according to common parliamentary law. To our minds it is clear that the speaker of the house of representatives, whose duties are mainly legislative, is not to be considered a state officer merely on the ground that in a remote contingency the duties of a state officer may be devolved upon him; nor is he so to be considered upon the ground that his office is designated by the constitution, for so is the office of senator and member of the house of representatives. It may be said that all legislative officers are constitutional officers; but that does not make them state officers and liable to impeachment. Article 13, § 2, of the constitution, declares that "the governor and other state and judicial officers, except county judges and justices of the peace, shall be liable to impeachment." The language of the constitution of the United States is, "the president and vice-president and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment." Article 2, § 4. Under this provision it was decided in the senate of the United States, in Blount's Case, nearly a hundred years ago, that senators are not civil officers, within the meaning of the constitution, and hence not subject to impeachment. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 471, note 1. In State v. Gilmore, 20 Kan. 551, Mr. Justice BREWER, delivering the opinion of the court, referred with approval to the decision in Blount's Case, and declined to say that a member of the house of representatives of Kansas was liable to impeachment even under a constitution which declares that "the governor and all other officers under the constitution shall be subject to impeachment." In that case, also, the court held that an action brought in the district court to remove a member of the house from office could not be maintained under a statute providing for the removal of "any state, district, city, county, or township officer for whose removal from office by impeachment there is no provision." The decision was placed, not upon the ground that the member was subject to removal by impeachment only, but upon the ground that the exclusive power of removal is vested in the house itself, under the constitutional provision that "each house shall be a judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Construing this provision, the learned judge said: "This is a grant of power, and constitutes each house the ultimate tribunal of the qualifications of its own members. The two houses, acting conjointly, do not decide. Each house acts for itself, and by itself; and from its decision there is no appeal, not even to the two houses. And this power is not exhausted when once it has been exercised, and a member admitted to his seat. It is a continuous power, and runs through the entire term. At any time, and at all times during the term of office, each house is empowered to pass upon the present qualifications of its own members."

The constitution of Colorado not only provides that "each house shall judge of the election and qualification of its members," (article 5, § 10;) but section 12 of the same article further provides: "Each house shall have power to determine the rules of its proceedings, and punish its members or other persons for contempt or disorderly behavior in its presence; to enforce obedience to its process; to protect its members against violence, or offers of bribes or private solicitation; and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a member, but not a second time for the same cause; and shall have all other powers necessary for the legislature of a free state." This grant of power is plenary, and, except as otherwise provided in the constitution itself, is exclusive, and, when exercised within legitimate limits, is conclusive upon every department of the government. The power is granted to the house, not to the officers of the house, and is to be exercised by a majority of the members. The exclusive nature of this power is in no way affected by the fact that the other departments of the government, the executive and judicial, are equally free and independent within their respective spheres of jurisdiction; nor by the further fact that the contingency may arise which will cast upon the executive or the judicial branch of the government the responsibility of determining which of two conflicting organizations of the legislative body is the legal one; for there can be but one such legitimate body. Prince v. Skillin, supra. See, also, Opinion of the Justices, 56 N. H. 570. In the case of Hiss v. Bartlett, 3 Gray, 468, decided in 1855, Chief Justice SHAW, delivering the opinion of the court, declared that the power was inherent in the house of representatives of Massachusetts to expel a member for misconduct, though there was no provision in the constitution relating to expulsion of members. The court based its decision upon the general principles of parliamentary law; that it is necessary that every legislative body shall have the power to protect itself against unworthy members, as well as upon a clause of the constitution providing that "the house of representatives shall be judge of the returns, elections, and qualifications of its own members." The following extract from the opinion illustrates the reasoning of the court: "The power of expulsion is a necessary and incidental power, to enable the house to perform its high functions, and is necessary to the safety of the state. It is a power of protection." Again, the same opinion declares that such power "must exist in every aggregate and deliberative body, in order to the exercise of its functions, and because without it such body would be powerless to accomplish the purposes of its constitution; and therefore any attempt to express or define it would impair, rather than strengthen, it." The Hiss-Bartlett decision is also authority for the doctrine that the court will not inquire into the motive or cause which influenced the action of the legislative body in such cases, and that the court will not in any way interfere with the procedure or mode of trial by which the legislature reaches its conclusions in expelling a member. The house must judge for itself in such matters, and its jurisdiction to so judge and decide is exclusive. As to those matters confided exclusively to each legislative branch of the government, if a wrong or unwise course be pursued, there is no appeal under our system of government except to the ballot box. Since the house of representatives is thus invested, for its own protection, with inherent power in the matter of disciplining its members, since it may deprive a member of his office as representative, an office to which he has been chosen by the electors of his district for a specified term, and thus deprive him of his emoluments, a fortiori may the house remove the speaker from an office given to him by the house itself, not for any definite term, and to which no emoluments are attached,—an office, too, as we have seen, which he is to hold, and the duties of which he is to exercise, at the will and pleasure of the house, according to immemorial usage. It is easy to conceive how the power to remove the speaker by the majority of the house may become necessary in order that legislation may be proceeded with in accordance with the will of such majority.

Another ground upon which it is contended that the speaker cannot be removed by vote or resolution of the house is that if the speaker be not such an officer as is liable to removal from office by impeachment, then he must be included among those officers mentioned in section 3 of article 13 of the constitution, which provides that "all officers not liable to impeachment shall be subject to removal for misconduct or malfeasance in office, in such manner as may be provided by law;" and it is contended that the words "may be provided by law" should be construed to mean statutory law only. If we adopt this construction, then the speaker, not being liable to impeachment, and no statute having been adopted providing for his removal, cannot be removed at all. It is obvious that the words "may be provided by law" must be held to include something more than statutory law, or else some limit must be placed upon the words "all other officers," as used in section 3; for, as we have seen, the house is authorized to choose its other officers as well as the speaker; and it certainly cannot be maintained that the subordinate officers of the house, having once been chosen, and not being liable to impeachment, cannot be removed, however unworthy or unfit they may be, simply because no statute has been provided for their removal. Again, clerks of the supreme and district courts are officers designated by the constitution; and it is provided that they shall be appointed by the judges of their respective courts, to hold their offices during the pleasure of such judges. Article 6, §§ 9, 19. They certainly are not state officers, and the manner of their removal is not provided by statutory law. Is there, then, no power to remove them? Unquestionably, the answer must be, that since they derive their offices by appointment from the judges to hold during the pleasure of the judges, they may be removed by the judges. The same principle is applicable to the speaker. He derives his office by election from the house to hold at the pleasure of the house; hence he may be removed by the house. The only difference is that the pleasure of the judges, the tenure by which the clerk holds, is expressed in the constitution; while the pleasure of the house, the tenure by which the speaker holds, exists and has existed from time immemorial as a part of our common parliamentary law, unrepealed and unaffected by the constitution or any statutory enactment. Considering the nature of the office of speaker, the manner of his election, and the plenary powers granted by the constitution to each house of the general assembly, there may be some doubt whether the framers of the constitution intended to provide for the removal of the speaker in any other manner than by common parliamentary law, subject to such rules as the house of representatives, as a co-ordinate branch of "the legislature of a free state," might see fit to adopt for the control of its own organization and proceedings. Section 3 of article 13 may have been intended to include only such officers—county, precinct, and the like—as are elected or appointed for a definite or specified term, and for whose removal some special provision was necessary, rather than to such officers as are chosen by the senate or house of representatives to hold at the will and pleasure of those bodies, and for their convenience in the discharge of their primary duties as legislative bodies. But conceding that the speaker is included in said section 3, nevertheless, the common parliamentary law as it existed in this country at the time of the adoption of our constitution provided that the speaker might be removed at the will and pleasure of the house; and such law, not having been repealed or superseded by any constitutional or statutory enactment, still exists as an adequate provision for the removal of the speaker in conformity to said section.

It is plausibly urged, against the power of the house to remove its speaker by vote or resolution, that, during the hundred years of representative government in this country under written constitutions, not a single instance has occurred where the speaker of the national house or the speaker of any state legislature has been removed. This may be true as a matter of fact, or it may be that such removals have been made, and that the lack of judicial precedent or of historical account regarding them is to be attributed to the fact that the authority to make them has never before been questioned; certainly, as a matter of law, during all this time, these legislative bodies have possessed the power thus to remove such officers, except in jurisdictions where the common parliamentary law may have been repealed or modified. No precedent to the contrary has been brought to our attention; but the law, as stated in plain, unequivocal language by Jefferson and Cushing, supra, seems to have been uniformly accepted as authoritative throughout the United States. If such power of removal has not been exercised, we must conclude that our various legislative assemblies have been singularly fortunate in choosing speakers faithful to voice the will and pleasure of those bodies, or that the members thereof have been remarkably patient and forbearing with the action of their speakers. It is quite probable that our good fortune has been due in some measure to both causes; and this is much to the credit of our people, for patience, forbearance, and fidelity by those in official station are essential to wise and efficient administration in republican government. Upon investigation and reflection, we are satisfied that, as a purely legal proposition, the house of representatives has the power, by the vote of "a majority of the whole number of members elected," to remove its speaker from office, and to elect another in his stead, in the manner stated in the executive communication submitted. Any other conclusion would, in our opinion, be antagonistic to the fundamental principle of representative government, that the majority of each legislative body has the power to control the action of such body within the limits of its jurisdiction, except as otherwise provided by positive law. If a clear majority of the whole house cannot thus change their presiding officer, then it is difficult to see how two-thirds, three-fourths, or even the whole number can take such action against the will of the speaker. We express no opinion as to the wisdom, expediency, or policy of the course pursued by the majority; they must assume and bear the responsibility for the exercise of their powers.

HAYT, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice ELLIOTT, except in so far as it maintains that the words "in such manner as provided by law," as used in connection with removals in section 3 of article 13 of the constitution, authorize a removal in any manner sanctioned by parliamentary law. If the speaker of the house is an "officer," within the meaning of this section, then something more than parliamentary precedent should, I think, be held necessary to authorize his removal. In my judgment, however, the speaker of the house of representatives of this state is not included in the word "officers," as used in that section, and hence the power of removal can in no way be affected thereby. As a general rule, where the term of office is not fixed, the power of removal accompanies the power of appointment as incidental thereto. The term of office of speaker with us is neither designated by the constitution nor fixed by any statute. He, therefore, holds only during the pleasure of the house that elected him; and the power of removal by that body, without restriction as to term or tenure, must, for this reason, be upheld.

COLORADO MANUF'G CO. V. McDONALD.

EXECUTION SALES—REDEMPTION.

1. Under Gen. St. Colo. 1883, § 1851, which provides that a defendant in an execution sale may redeem by the payment of the purchase money either to the purchaser, or to the officer making the sale, the payment of the money by defendant, with the purpose of redemption, to the sheriff who sold the land on execution, and its receipt by the latter without objection, nullifies and abrogates the sale, as between defendant and the purchaser, though the sheriff has not formally canceled the certificate of purchase, nor directed the execution of a certificate of redemption, as provided by section 1861, and though he has subsequently executed a deed of the land to the purchaser.

2. It is within the discretion of the trial court to order the sheriff who made the sale, and executed the deed to the purchaser, to be made a party to an action by the execution defendant against the purchaser for the cancellation of the deed; and, even if error, it would be no ground for reversing a correct decree canceling the deed.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Arapahoe county.

The case appears in the opinion.

F. A. Williams, for appellant. J. H. Croxton and J. P. Brockway, for appellee.

BISSELL, C. In April, 1887, Ronald P. McDonald filed his bill against the Colorado Manufacturing Company to set aside a deed made to the company by the sheriff of Arapahoe county. It appeared that in January, 1885, the company recovered a judgment in the county court of Arapahoe county for $77.86, and $25.45 costs. Subsequently an execution issued upon the judgment, the sheriff levied upon certain lands, and on April 11, 1885, the property levied on was sold to the plaintiff in execution. The property was bid in for the sum of $10, which was paid to the sheriff. In October following, McDonald, through his attorney, attempted to redeem from the sale, and paid the sheriff, within the six months limited by the statute, $111.25. There is some little controversy in regard to the reason for the payment of that particular sum of money. In computing the amount of money necessary both to redeem and to satisfy the entire judgment and costs, the deputy, in whose hands the writ was, and who had made the sale and issued the certificate of purchase, seems to have made an error in regard to the amount necessary to accomplish both purposes. This, however, is immaterial to the determination of the rights of the defendant in execution. He paid the sheriff largely more than the purchaser paid upon the sale, and about $100 more than would have been necessary for him to effect a redemption. That he intended to redeem, and paid the money for that purpose, with the full knowledge of the officer receiving it, who took it with like intent, and in execution of his statutory authority, as an officer, to permit redemption to be made through him, cannot be doubted. Under these circumstances there can be no question but that the legal result of a redemption from the sale was thereby, under our peculiar statute, fully accomplished. It is provided in the sections governing the right of redemption from execution sales that the defendant, within the time limited, may redeem upon payment of the sum paid upon the purchase, and that he may effectuate his redemption by giving the money either to the purchaser or his representatives, or to the officer who made the sale. Unless something further is required to be done than to turn over the amount paid, either to the purchaser or to the officer, the redemption is effected by the simple act of payment, when it is coupled with the expressed intention to exercise the right. That nothing further is required is very evident from even a cursory examination of the statute. It is distinctly enacted that upon the payment of such sum the certificate of sale shall be null and void. Gen. St. 1883, §§ 1851, 1861. While there is a section which contemplates the cancellation of the certificate of purchase, and directs the execution and record of a certificate of redemption, these subsequent statutory provisions were enacted apparently for the protection of the redemptioner, and to provide a way to furnish him with complete and satisfactory evidence of the release of his title from the burden and the cloud of the sale. The payment of the money to the proper person for the purpose of redemption, and with the intention to redeem, and its receipt without objection, serves to accomplish the full purpose of the statute, and to nullify and abrogate the sale. The rights of the redemptioner are unaffected by the failure to furnish him with proof of the act of redemption; and, though the certificate of purchase may remain as a cloud upon his title, his rights are fixed by the act which he has performed. There is no question arising in this case concerning the rights of third parties or innocent purchasers, and the above rules are absolutely true when it is sought to compel the purchaser at the sale to relinquish the apparent title which he holds by virtue of an uncanceled certificate of purchase. That the sheriff may have executed a deed attempting to assure the inchoate title obtained by the purchaser can make no difference. The redemption having been effected, the purchaser's rights were destroyed, and the sheriff could convey nothing by the instrument. The deed then remained a cloud upon the title of the complainant, which he was entitled to have removed upon proper bill filed for the purpose. The court did not err in decreeing its cancellation, and establishing the complainant's rights.

During the progress of the litigation it transpired that the sheriff who executed the deed had gone out of office, and, upon application, the court ordered him to be made a party, and by decree directed him to execute a certificate of redemption as of the date when the complainant was entitled to it by what he had done. This is urged as error, but it is entirely unavailable. That it was within the discretion of the court to direct him to be made a party to the proceedings there can be no question; but, had the court committed error in making the order which it did, the appellant could not be heard to complain, nor would the cause be reversed for any such reason. The only person who could complain in regard to the matter would be the sheriff himself, who was, by the court's order, brought into the litigation. So long as the decree itself is right upon the case as made, the presence of the sheriff as a party furnishes no ground on which the appellant can ask a reversal of the case. This disposes of all the errors upon which the appellant relies for a reversal. No error having been committed by the trial court, the judgment should be affirmed.

SERVICE OF PROCESS—PUBLICATION—AFFIDAVIT.

Service by publication on defendants in a mechanic's lien action, based on an affidavit by plaintiff, sworn to before his attorney, to the effect that defendants are non-residents, but not stating that a cause of action exists against them, or that they are necessary or proper parties to the action, as required by Code Civil Proc. Colo. c. 3, § 44, is insufficient to confer jurisdiction.

Commissioners' decision. Error to Bent county court.

Nicholas & Kriger and J. W. Horner, for plaintiffs in error. H. Chadeayne and McKinley & Morris, for defendant in error.

RICHMOND, J. On the 18th day of May, 1887, plaintiff below, and defendant in error herein, filed his complaint in the county court of Bent county to enforce a lien for material of the value of $240.56 furnished defendants in the construction of a certain building in the town of Carlton, Bent county. On the same day plaintiff filed the following affidavit, which, omitting the title, is in words and figures as follows: "John M. McMillen, being duly sworn, upon oath states that the defendants in the above cause reside out of the state of Colorado, and where plaintiff cannot find them to secure personal service on them in this case. He therefore asks that the court grant an order for the publication of the summons in this case according to sec. 44, chap. 3, of the Code of Colorado. [Signed] JOHN M. McMILLEN. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 17th day of May, A. D. 1886. H. CHADEAYNE, Notary Public." The above notary public was attorney for plaintiff in the cause. Upon this affidavit order of publication was entered, and proof of publication subsequently made. Thereafter, on the 13th day of July, 1887, default and final judgment was entered against the defendants for the sum of $218.83 with costs, and a lien decreed for this amount upon the building. On the 8th day of August, 1887, defendants, by their attorney, A. M. Nicholas, appeared generally, and filed a motion to vacate the judgment and for leave to answer. August 13, 1887, motion was overruled. To reverse this judgment this writ of error is prosecuted.

It has been repeatedly decided by this court that, when constructive service by publication is wholly relied upon to give jurisdiction over the person of a non-resident defendant, a compliance with the statute must affirmatively appear of record, even in courts of superior and general jurisdiction. The affidavit above recited does not state that a cause of action existed against defendant, or that he was a necessary or proper party to the action.<sup>1</sup> It was therefore radically defective and insufficient to warrant the court in entering the order of publication. The affidavit, having been made before the attorney of plaintiff, should not have been received by the court. O'Rear v. Lazarus, 8 Colo. 608, 9 Pac. Rep. 621; Calvert v. Calvert, 15 Colo. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 1043; Martin v. Skehan, 2 Colo. 614. It is needless to cite authorities in support of this position, or to extend the opinion in support of our conclusion. The court had no jurisdiction through the publication of a summons based upon the affidavit; the judgment should have been vacated, and defendants allowed to answer. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to vacate the judgment, and permit defendants to answer the complaint.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE CO. v. McCARTHY.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE—INTENTIONAL ACT OF ANOTHER.

A clause in an accident insurance policy exempting the company from liability for "intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person" precludes a recovery when the insured has been killed by the intentional act of another, and the company need not show that such injuries were inflicted at the instance of the insured.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from Lake county court.

RICHMOND, C. This is a suit upon what is commonly called an "accident policy of insurance." There was a judgment against the company for the sum of $1,016.67, besides costs. The case is here upon alleged errors of law committed by the court in sustaining a demurrer to defendant's answer. The policy sued upon by its terms insured the life of John F. McCarthy in the sum of $1,000, to be paid to his wife, Julia McCarthy, if surviving, within 90 days after sufficient proof that the insured, at any time within the continuing of the policy, shall have sustained bodily injuries, effected through external, violent, or accidental means, within the intent and meaning of the contract. The policy of insurance is set out in the complaint in hæc verba, and contains the following clause: "This insurance does not cover disappearances; nor injuries of which there is no visible mark upon the body; nor accident nor death or injury resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from any of the following causes, or while so engaged or affected: Suicide, sane or insane; intentional injuries, (inflicted by the insured or any other person;) intoxication or narcotics; dueling or fighting, war or riot." In addition to the usual allegations in actions upon such policies, the plaintiff sets out in the complaint that on the 3d day of November, A. D. 1886, and while said insurance policy was in full force, and while the said insured was in the peace of the state, he received a personal injury which caused his death within 90 days thereafter, and on the day aforesaid, and that said injury which caused his death was through external, violent, and accidental means, within the meaning of the said policy of insurance, and the conditions and agreements therein contained, to-wit, by being shot by a leaden bullet from a pistol loaded with powder and leaden bullets in the hands of one Daniel Monahan, and while the said insured, John F. McCarthy, was standing on the public highway, near the town limits of the said city of Leadville, in the county of Lake and state of Colorado. To the complaint the defendant answers, and denies that the death of the insured was occasioned by bodily injuries affected through external, violent, and accidental means, within the meaning of the contract of insurance; that death was caused by intentional injuries inflicted by Daniel Monahan while said Daniel Monahan and the said John F. McCarthy were engaged in a personal altercation. Much else is set up in the answer, but for the purposes of this opinion it is unnecessary for us to quote further. The main contention between the parties to this action is raised by the demurrer to the answer, to the effect that the answer does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. The contention of the appellant is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer; that the averment in the answer that the death of the insured was not accidental, but the result of an intentional injury inflicted by the said Daniel Monahan, was a good defense, and the company were not liable. The contention of the appellee is that the terms of the policy do not preclude a recovery; that the words "intentional injury inflicted by another person," mentioned in the policy, mean intentional injuries inflicted by the said insured, or injuries inflicted intentionally by another person through the procurement or consent of the insured. The exception in the insurance policy upon which appellants rely, heretofore recited, is as follows: "Intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person." If the fact be that this clause precludes a recovery when the injured individual has been killed or injured by the intentional act of another, or, in other words, if it precludes the idea that death or injury was the result of accident, then certainly the contention of appellant is correct, and plaintiff cannot recover. Happily we have very recent adjudications covering the construction of the identical clause here under consideration. In the case of Insurance Company v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1360, decided subsequent to the institution of this particular action, Mr. Justice HARLAN, in passing upon this question, said: "The policy expressly provides that no claim shall be made under it where the death of the insured was caused by intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person. If he was murdered, then his death was caused by intentional injuries inflicted by another person. Nevertheless, the instructions to the jury were so worded as to convey the idea that, if the insured was murdered, the plaintiff was entitled to recover; in other words, even if death was caused wholly by intentional injuries inflicted upon the insured by another person, the means used were 'accidental' as to him, and the company was liable. This was error. Upon the whole case, the court is of the opinion that, by the terms of the contract, the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, under the limitations we have stated, to show, from all the evidence, that the death of the insured was caused by external violence and accidental means; also that no valid claim can be made under the policy, if the insured, either intentionally or when insane, inflicted upon himself the injuries which caused his death, or if his death was caused by intentional injuries inflicted upon him by some other person." In the case of Hutchcraft's Ex'r v. Insurance Co., 87 Ky. 301,<sup>1</sup> the court, in construing a proviso like the one under consideration in the case before us, says: "The remaining clause stipulates for a further exemption of appellant's liability in the event that intentional injuries are inflicted upon the insured by himself or any other person. It is contended by appellant that the meaning of this clause is that, if the insured intentionally inflicted injuries upon himself, or if any other person intentionally inflicted injuries upon him with his consent or at his instance, then the appellee should not be liable. A moment's reflection will show that the clause will not admit of this construction. The clause, when placed in juxtaposition with its antecedent, reads as follows: 'No claim shall be made under this ticket when the death may have been caused by intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or by any other person.' This sentence, though awkwardly expressed, is complete, and fairly expresses the idea that, if the insured intentionally injures himself by the infliction of bodily wounds from which he dies, he thereby breaks the condition of the policy, or that if he is intentionally injured by any other person, by the infliction of bodily wounds from which he dies, the condition of the policy is thereby broken; therefore to add the words 'with his consent' or 'at his instance' would have the effect of torturing the meaning of the language used beyond its legitimate import."

We quote thus extensively from these opinions because they clearly and concisely state, perhaps in better language than we are capable of doing, the exact conclusion of our minds with reference to the clause in the policy mentioned in the complaint and answer. We cannot accept the conclusion reached by the court below, or that forced upon our attention by the appellee in the argument. It requires no extended reasoning to illustrate the purpose of the language of the policy referred to in the answer and relied upon as a defense. There is a vast difference between an intentional injury and an accidental injury. Against accidental and violent injuries the policy provided, but there it stopped, and the company limited its liability by distinctly specifying that, when injury or death resulted from intentional injuries inflicted by another, they were duly excepted from the operation of the policy. It is averred in the answer that the death of the insured resulted from the intentional act of the said Daniel Monahan. This we think was quite sufficient to maintain the contention of the defendant; that is, that the answer was a complete and absolute defense to the cause of action stated in the complaint. The demurrer to the answer should have been overruled. We are of the opinion that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—TITLE TO PERSONAL PROPERTY—POWER TO SELL.

1. At common law the legal title to all personal property of the deceased vested in the executor or administrator with absolute power to dispose of it, and, in the absence of fraud or collusion between him and the person to whom he transferred it, the creditors or next of kin could not follow it into the hands of the alienee.

2. The statute has curtailed the power of the executor or administrator to sell or dispose of the personal property of the decedent, and limited it to such as is visible and tangible, except by an order of the probate court, either at public or private sale, as may be provided therein. With this difference, the power of disposition of the executor or administrator remains as at common law, and the title of all choses in action is vested in him, with authority to collect and otherwise dispose of them.

3. By force of such power of disposition of choses in action, an executor or administrator may sell or dispose of them by indorsement to another, or to a distributee, without an order of the probate court, and such transfer passes the title, so as to enable the transferee or distributee to maintain an action on them; nor can the makers, in the absence of fraud, abate such action for a want of authority to make the transfer.

Appeal from circuit court, Benton county; R. S. BEAN, Judge.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants on a promissory note dated October 20, 1884, made by them, and payable to the order of Harrison Weider, 12 months after date, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. until paid. The complaint alleges the execution of the note, the death of Harrison Weider intestate, on the 5th day of September, 1885, the appointment of George W. Weider as administrator of the estate of Harrison Weider, and his qualifying as such administrator; that the plaintiff was the wife of Harrison Weider, and that the administrator duly assigned and transferred said promissory note to the plaintiff as a part of her distributive share of the estate, etc. The answer admits the execution of the note, but denies the assignment alleged and the plaintiff's ownership of said note, etc. On the trial, the defendants objected to all evidence which tended to show that said note was assigned and transferred to the plaintiff as her distributive share of said estate, by the administrator, which, on being overruled and exceptions taken, are now assigned as error. There was no evidence that an order of the probate court had ever been made directing such assignment and transfer, etc. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, from which the present appeal is brought.

J. R. Bryson and W. S. McFadden, for appellants. Seth R. Hammer and Bingham & D'Arcey, for appellee.

LORD, J., (after stating the facts as above.) There is but one question presented by this record, and that is, whether the administrator could make a transfer of the note to the plaintiff as a part of her distributive share of the estate, without an order from the probate court. The defendants admit the execution of the note, and they do not deny their liability to pay it, but they seek to abate the action upon the ground that the transfer did not pass the title to the plaintiff, or out of the estate of her deceased husband, and without an order for the transfer by the probate court, they would still be liable to that estate. At common law, the legal title to all personal property of the deceased vested in the executor or administrator with absolute power to dispose of it, and, unless there was fraud or collusion between him and the person to whom he transferred it, the creditors or next of kin could not follow it into the hands of the alienee. In Williams on Executors, it is said that "it is a general rule of law and equity that an executor or administrator has an absolute power of disposal over the whole personal effects of his testator or intestate, and that they cannot be followed by creditors. The principle is that the executor must sell in order to perform his duties in paying debts, etc., and no one would deal with an executor, if liable afterwards to be called to account." Page 932. But, under our statutes, the power is not conferred on the executor or administrator to sell or dispose of visible tangible personal property, except by an order of the probate court, either at public or private sale, as may be provided therein. Hill's Code, §§ 1141-1144. The reasons are many and manifest why the distinction should exist and be applied in the constructions of the statutes authorizing the sale of personal property of the estates of decedents. Choses in action are not properly the subject of sale, and their conversion into money is ordinarily by collection, and not by public auction, which is unusual. To put choses in action on the same footing as other personal property, and likewise require an order from the probate court to authorize their sale, might only result in exchanging one chose in action for another; for, while the statute does not assume, yet it fairly contemplates, that the interests of the estate may require that the order for the sale of personal property may be made on terms of credit, which might involve as to the sale of some of such personal property, if notes be included, the exchange merely of one note for another. But, with this difference, the power of the executor or administrator remains as at common law. The title of all choses in action is vested in him, and the authority to collect or otherwise dispose of them. This is the view taken under a statute of like import in Alabama. In Waring v. Lewis, 53 Ala. 630, the court say: "The statutes of this state have deprived an executor or administrator of the power to dispose of visible, tangible personal property, the subject of sale, otherwise than at sale under an order of the court of probate; and with one or two exceptions, the sale must be at public outcry. In other respects his title and power of disposition remains as at common law. He has the full title to the choses in action of the deceased, and is charged with the duty of collecting and reducing them to possession. He may transfer, release, compound, or discharge them as fully as if he was the absolute owner, subject only to his liability to answer to creditors and distributees for improvidence in the exercise of his power." That the executor's or administrator's power of disposition over the choses in action of the deceased remains unaffected by this legislation is likewise clearly stated in Rhame v. Lewis, 13 Rich. Eq. 298, in which the court say: "This legislation cannot however be understood as intended to apply to all the assets of an intestate. The terms used—'personal estate,' 'personal property'—are certainly large enough to embrace every class; but choses in action, at least such as are merely securities for money due, are not properly the subject of sale. Their conversion is ordinarily by collection, and such conversion by public auction is an unusual proceeding. Many of the reasons which may be supposed to have induced this legislative restraint upon the administrator's power of sale are wholly inapplicable to them, and the sales contemplated by the acts being, although not positively required, plainly assumed to be on credit, would result in a mere exchange of one chose in action for another. Yet, though the proper method of conversion in such case is by collection, circumstances may exist in which a more speedy conversion by exchange with a third person, for the money, or even by pledge for advances, may be important to the interests of the administration. The administrator's power of disposition over his intestate's choses in action remains unaffected by this legislation, and continues as his power over the assets generally before the acts have been described to have been. Any one may securely take them from him, either absolutely or conditionally, by any of the usual methods of legal or equitable transfer, for value, and in good faith."

These decisions show that it was not the intention of such legislation in requiring an order for the sale of personal property to include choses in action, or to deprive the executor or administrator of the power of disposition over them. This doctrine of the common law that the title to them is invested in him, and that he may sell or dispose of them by indorsement or otherwise, so as to carry the title, and that such purchasers or indorsees may maintain an action on them in their own name, whether an assignee is permitted to sue in his own name, is sustained by numerous adjudications. 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 298. So, too, he may transfer such notes to a distributee of the estate in payment of his share of the estate, and such transferee may thereupon maintain an action in his own name. In Clark v. Moses, 50 Ala. 327, the note came to the plaintiff by transfer from the executor, to whom it was paid by the payees, as so much of her distributive share of her husband's estate, and without any order of the probate court, and the court held that a promissory note may be transferred by an executor or administrator to a distributee in payment pro tanto of his distributive share, and that such transfer passes a title to the distributee, on which he may maintain an action against the maker, or successfully defend an action by an administrator de bonis non. In Hough v. Bailey, 32 Conn. 288, it was objected that the transfer was void, because the requirements of the statute in respect to distribution of the estate were not complied with, but the court held otherwise, saying that "the title to the note was vested in the administrator, and he had authority to collect or otherwise dispose of it. If he disposed of it improperly, it might render him liable on his bond, but would not affect the title of his bona fide assignee." So, too, the same principle was applied in Marshall Co. v. Hanna, 57 Iowa, 375, 10 N. W. Rep. 745, where the defendant questioned the plaintiff's right of action, and sought to abate it, although not denying his liability upon the notes, but the court held that the executor had a general power to dispose of them, and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that it must be presumed that this power was rightfully exercised, and said: "Even if the administrator transferred them improperly, still, if the plaintiff took them bona fide, it acquired a good title, and the executor is liable upon his bond. The defendant does not show that the plaintiff did not take the evidence of indebtedness bona fide; hence the action ought not to abate on account of the lack of authority of the executor to make the transfer." These authorities emphasize the general power with which an executor or administrator is invested in respect to choses in action, and his authority to sell or dispose of them by indorsement to another, or to a distributee, without an order of the probate court, and that such transfer is valid and passes the title, so as to enable the transferee or distributee to maintain an action thereon, and that the payers or makers of them, in the absence of fraud or collusion between the administrator and the person to whom he transferred them, cannot abate the action on the ground of a want of authority to make such transfer. "Such being the general powers of the executor or administrator, he may," said Dixon, C. J., "if he chooses, but at his own risk, make an advance to the heir, or distributee, before a decree for that purpose. His knowledge of the condition of the estate may frequently enable him to do so without any real danger to himself, but if such advances are not afterwards covered by a decree, he and his sureties are responsible. If, therefore, the transfer of the note and mortgage in this case was made to the plaintiff as an advance upon his distributive share as heir at law of the deceased, it does not, in the absence of any evidence of fraud, collusion, or deficiency of assets with which to meet the debts due from the estate, constitute any valid objection to a recovery." Within the principle of these adjudications, upon the facts disclosed by this record, the defendants have no standing ground upon which to avoid the payment of this note. There is no pretense of any fraud or collusion, or of any debts due from the estate, or of any bare possibility of a liability, or of objection to the recovery, except a lack of authority in the administrator to make the transfer without an order of the probate court. Nor is there anything in the case of Winkle v. Winkle, 8 Or. 195, inconsistent with this result, as that case involved tangible property and not choses in action. Nor may it be amiss to refer to another aspect of this case, which is entitled to some consideration. So far as this record shows, the plaintiff is the sole heir, but the argument conceded that the plaintiff and the administrator are the only heirs. Why, then, if between themselves they should agree to make this disposition of the note, is not such a distribution valid? More than five years have elapsed since the death of the original payee, and the only defense is one in abatement for lack of authority on the ground that no title passed by the transfer, and therefore there could be no right of recovery in the plaintiff, no matter if the estate was free from debt, and the transfer from fraud. The argument authorizes us to assume that there was no fraud or collusion, or deficiency of assets, and yet there could be no recovery. In such case, it is difficult to see what objection a creditor could make to the distribution. Such an arrangement when fairly made could not injure any one, and there would seem to be no reason that the settlement or distribution which the parties concerned have made should not be accepted by the court as satisfactory, so far as it goes, when the administrator afterwards is summoned to render his accounts. In any view, it seems to us there was no error, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

VENDOR AND VENDEE — TIME OF THE ESSENCE — PAYMENT AND TENDER OF DEED — RESCISSION — ESTOPPEL — TITLE TO PUBLIC LANDS — CONTEST.

1. Time is not of the essence of a contract for the sale of real estate, unless made so by the express agreement of the parties, or by the nature of the contract itself, or of the circumstances under which it was made. Courts of equity will ordinarily infer that interest on the deferred payments will be a sufficient compensation for the delay.

2. Although there is no stipulation in the contract that time shall be essential, nor anything in the nature or circumstances of the agreement to make it so, it can nevertheless be made so, by a performance, or tender of performance, by one party, and a demand of the other.

3. Where the payment of the purchase money and the making of the deed are to occur simultaneously, they are regarded as concurrent acts, which disable either party from putting an end to the contract without performance, or a valid offer to perform, on his part.

4. In a suit by a vendor for a rescission of a contract for the sale of real estate, on account of a failure to pay purchase money, the complaint must allege that he has tendered to the vendee a valid deed, conveying to him all the land according to the terms of the agreement, and demanded performance on the part of the vendee.

5. Mere failure to pay the purchase money according to terms of the contract will not entitle vendor to have contract rescinded.

6. Where the vendor is prevented from complying with his contract by the wrongful act of the vendee in obtaining an outstanding title to a portion of the land, so far as that portion of the land is concerned, in a suit by vendor to rescind, the vendee is estopped from claiming that no tender of deed has been made.

7. When the vendee has paid part of the purchase money, and given his notes for the balance, before the vendor can rescind a contract, he must return, or offer to return, money paid, with legal interest, less reasonable rental value of premises, if vendee has been in possession, and also all unpaid notes.

8. Where a controversy concerning the title to government land is still pending in, and undetermined by, the land department of the United States, the courts of this state will not interfere.

9. Where a vendee enters into possession of land under a contract of purchase, he will not be permitted to obtain an outstanding title, and assert it against his vendor, but such title will inure to the benefit of vendor.

Appeal from circuit court, Polk county; R. P. Boise, Judge.

This is a suit in equity to cancel a contract for the sale of land by plaintiff to defendant. For the purpose of this case it is sufficient to state that the complaint alleges that on the 13th day of February, 1880, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract for the sale of certain real estate therein described, and containing 360 acres. By the terms of said agreement, defendant was to pay the plaintiff the sum of $1,600 for said land, in accordance with the tenor of seven certain promissory notes of that date, therein set out, the last of which to become due and payable on the 13th of February, 1886. That in consideration of said notes, and the payment thereof by said defendant, according to their tenor, the plaintiff agreed to transfer to him, at the time of the last payment, all said lands in fee. That defendant entered into the possession of said lands, and has remained in possession ever since. That at the time of making the contract for the sale plaintiff only had a contract of purchase from the Oregon & California Railroad company for 160 acres of the land, which he agreed to convey to defendant, but defendant knew the condition of his title, and accepted the contract with the understanding that plaintiff might and would perfect his title so that, by the time the last payment became due, he might be in a condition to transfer the legal title thereof to the defendant, according to his agreement. That about March 1, 1883, it was ascertained that there was some question as to whether the 160-acre tract of land was lands of the United States, subject to homestead entry, or whether the same, in fact and law, is within the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Company. Upon such information coming to defendant, he thereupon filed an application in the proper land-office to enter the same as a homestead, at the same time assuring plaintiff that he made the application for the protection and benefit of plaintiff, and that he had expended for his use and benefit, in making such application, the sum of $13, which, at his request, plaintiff repaid to him. That afterwards, contriving to cheat, wrong, and defraud plaintiff, he claimed and asserted that said application was made for his own use and benefit. That he has since made final proof of his continued residence and occupation, and a certificate for a patent for said land has been issued to him by the local land-officers. That at the time of defendant's application to make proof of his residence and occupation, plaintiff appeared, and interposed his objections thereto, and set forth the facts and reasons therefor, but, notwithstanding the claim of plaintiff, the certificate for the patent to said lands was issued to defendant. That plaintiff thereupon duly appealed to the land department at Washington, D. C., which appeal is still pending and undetermined. That defendant is threatening to sell and dispose of said 160 acres to innocent purchasers, and will, unless enjoined, make such a disposition thereof as will tend to greatly hinder the plaintiff in maintaining his legal rights concerning the same against the claim of defendant and his intended grantees. That defendant has failed to comply with the terms of said agreement of purchase on his part, or make any of the payments therein provided for, except the sum of $340, paid soon after the execution of said contract. That on the 1st day of October, 1883, the said defendant abandoned and repudiated his said contract with the plaintiff, and refused to pay the purchase money of the said lands, or any part thereof, and has since failed and refused to pay the same, or any part thereof, and the same is now wholly due and unpaid; and the said defendant further, in consummation of his fraudulent intentions and designs, has forbidden and prevented the said plaintiff from perfecting the title to the said 160 acres of land; and, but for the said wrongful act of the said defendant, the plaintiff would have perfected the same, and complied with the terms of said contract, according to the terms thereof, as hereinbefore stated. The prayer for relief in the complaint is: (1) That defendant be enjoined from disposing of the 160 acres of land during the pendency of the appeal before the interior department. (2) For an accounting of the rents and profits of the lands during the time defendant has been in possession thereof, and, in the event the interior department should determine that said 160 acres of land belong to defendant, then a decree that defendant is the trustee of plaintiff. (3) For a cancellation of the contract under which defendant entered into possession of said lands. (4) For a decree that plaintiff is the owner of all the land described in the complaint, and that he be let into the possession thereof, and for such other and further relief as may be just. A general demurrer to the complaint, being interposed, was sustained, and the complaint dismissed, from which decree this appeal is taken.

W. H. Holmes, for appellant. A. M. Hurley, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The grounds upon which it is sought to cancel the contract in this case are (1) the failure of defendant to pay the purchase price at the time provided in the contract, and (2) the conduct of defendant in attempting to secure a title from the United States for the 160 acres of land in his own name and in fraud of the rights of plaintiff. The first ground proceeds upon the theory that time is of the essence of the contract, and that when defendant failed or neglected to make the payments as he agreed to do, plaintiff was entitled to rescind the contract. Time is of course an indispensable ingredient of every contract, but it is not ordinarily of the essence of a contract for the sale of real estate, unless made so by the express agreement of the parties, or by the nature of the contract itself, or of the circumstances under which it was made. When the vendor, by his contract to convey, has not affirmatively provided that time shall be of the essence of the contract, a court of equity will ordinarily infer that interest on the deferred payments would be a sufficient compensation for the delay. "Compensation" and not "forfeiture" is a favorite maxim with a court of equity. Knott v. Stephens, 5 Or. 235; Brook v. Hidy, 13 Ohio St. 306; King v. Ruckman, 20 N. J. Eq. 316. In this case the agreement does not provide that time shall be of the essence of the contract, nor is there anything in the nature of the contract itself, or the surrounding circumstances, from which the court can infer that it was so intended by the parties at the time the contract was made. Although there is no stipulation in the contract that time shall be essential, nor anything in the nature or circumstances of the agreement to make it so, it could nevertheless have been made so by a tender of performance on the part of plaintiff and demand of payments. Knott v. Stephens, supra; 2 Warv. Vend. 848. As a general rule, a party who asks for the rescission of a contract for the sale of real estate must be himself without fault, and when, as in this case, the payment of the purchase money and the making or tender of the deed are to occur simultaneously, they are regarded as mutual and concurrent acts, which disable either party from putting an end to the contract, without performance or a valid offer to perform on his part, and so far as the question of time is concerned, both parties, after the day provided for the consummation, may be considered equally in default, and neither can hold himself discharged from the obligation of complete performance, until he has tendered performance on his own side and demanded it on the other. Powell v. Railroad Co., 14 Or. 356, 12 Pac. Rep. 665; Knott v. Stephens, 5 Or. 235; Rummington v. Kelley, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 97.

When the vendor insists that the vendee is in default, to such an extent as to entitle him to have the contract rescinded, he must allege and prove that he has tendered to the vendee a deed conveying to him all the land according to the terms of the agreement, and demanded performance on the part of the vendee, and must have notified him that the contract would be rescinded unless purchase money was paid within a reasonable time. The mere failure to pay the purchase money according to the terms of the agreement will not be held a repudiation of the contract so as to authorize a suit by the vendor to have it rescinded. Gregg v. English, 38 Tex. 139; Johnson v. Jackson, 27 Miss. 498; 2 Warv. Vend. 849, 880.

Ordinarily, in a contract of this character, the vendee is entitled to a deed conveying to him the entire land according to agreement, as soon as the purchase money is paid, and he is under no obligation to pay the money except on receipt of the deed. The obligation of the defendant to pay the purchase money is dependent on the duty of the plaintiff to convey the land, so far as to disable him from putting an end to the contract, without performance or a valid offer to perform on his part. Walker v. Wilson, 30 Miss. 576. In this case plaintiff does not allege or claim that he ever offered to perform the contract on his part, and without such an allegation, this complaint fails to state a cause of suit against the defendant for a rescission of the contract, nor is he under such a complaint, entitled to a decree for specific performance. It was insisted on the argument that defendant had, by his conduct in relation to the 160 acres of supposed railroad land, rendered it impossible for plaintiff to obtain a title thereto, so that he could comply with his contract, and therefore was excused from tendering a deed to the land agreed to be conveyed, before bringing suit to rescind the contract. The complaint does perhaps show a sufficient excuse for not tendering a deed for the 160 acres. If plaintiff was prevented from complying with his contract by the wrongful acts of defendant, as far as this portion of the land is concerned, the defendant cannot be heard to say that no tender of deed in fee had been made, but there remains 200 acres to which plaintiff has a title, and he should have tendered a deed for that portion of the land he agreed to convey, and given defendant an opportunity to pay the purchase money, before attempting to rescind the contract. The defendant may have been perfectly willing to have accepted a deed in fee for the 200 acres, and a release as to the remaining 160 acres, and to have paid the purchase money he agreed to pay; at least, he should have been given an opportunity to do so, before bringing this suit. Plaintiff was bound to comply with the contract on his part by performing, or offering to perform, according to his engagements, except in so far as he was excused by reason of defendant's conduct or acts.

There is yet another reason why plaintiff cannot have this contract rescinded. It appears from the complaint that soon after making the contract defendant paid $340 of the purchase price. Before plaintiff can abandon the contract, and treat it at an end, he must refund or offer to refund the money paid in part performance of it, with legal accrued interest. It is a general rule that in order to disaffirm a contract and entitle a party to the right resulting therefrom, the rescinding party must put the other in statu quo. He must account to the other for any money paid in part performance of the contract. Knott v. Stephens, 5 Or. 235; Johnson v. Jackson, 27 Miss. 498; 2 Warv. Vend. 881; Thomas v. Beaton, 25 Tex. Supp. 318. Plaintiff does not offer to account for the money paid him by defendant in part performance of this contract, but seeks not only to rescind the contract and retain this money, but to charge defendant with the rents and profits of the land, during the time he has been in possession thereof, in addition. It would certainly be unjust to permit plaintiff, after having received a part of the purchase money, to put an end to the contract, upon the failure of defendant to pay the remainder, without offering to account to him for the money already paid. He who seeks the aid of a court of equity must himself do equity. If plaintiff had tendered a deed such as the contract required, he should, in addition, have returned the notes given by defendant, for the purchase money, and the amount paid him by defendant, with legal interest, or at least have offered to return them before he could be permitted to rescind. This seems to be the universal rule. The party against whom its rescission is sought must be placed in statu quo. Murphy v. Lockwood, 21 Ill. 611. In a case of this kind, where the vendee has been allowed to enter into possession of the land, and receive the rents and profits, the vendor would probably be entitled to have the reasonable value thereof deducted from any money paid on the contract by defendant, and would only be required to refund to defendant the balance, if any, remaining after deducting such rental value. What has already been said is sufficient to show that plaintiff does not allege facts sufficient to entitle him to maintain a suit to rescind the contract of sale to the defendant, but it is insisted that under the allegations of the complaint, the defendant should be enjoined from selling the 160 acres, for which he holds a certificate for a patent from the United States.

The controversy between plaintiff and defendant concerning the legal title to this land is still pending before the land department of the United States, and therefore this court cannot now undertake to inquire into the question as to who has the better right to this land under the provisions of the land laws of the government. The land department having acquired jurisdiction, it must first be allowed to proceed to final determination of the case. Moore v. Fields, 1 Or. 318. But defendant, having entered into the possession of this land under a contract of purchase, will not be permitted to obtain an outstanding title and assert it against the plaintiff. It was expressly understood at the time the contract for the sale of this land was made that the title was unsettled, and that plaintiff would take such steps as might be necessary, in order to perfect the same, so as to comply with his agreement with defendant. With this understanding, defendant was allowed to go into possession of the land, and having done so, neither equity nor good conscience will permit him, by taking advantage of such possession, to obtain the title from the general government in his own name for his own use and benefit. So that, if it should finally be determined by the land department that the land is not within the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Company, and a patent issued to defendant, the title will inure to the benefit of plaintiff, and the defendant would only be entitled to deduct from the purchase money the actual cost of obtaining such title from the government. It is an established rule of equity "that if a vendee buys up a better title than that of the vendor, and the vendor was guilty of no fraud, he can only be compelled to refund to the vendee the amount of money paid for the better title. Equity treats the purchaser as a trustee for his vendor, because he holds under him, and acts done to perfect the title of the former when in possession of the land inure to the benefit of him under whom the possession was obtained, and through whom a knowledge of a defect of title was obtained. The vendor and vendee stand in the relation of land lord and tenant. The vendee cannot disavow the vendor's title." Bush v. Marshall, 6 How. 284; Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet. 294.

At the time of the contract for the sale of this land by plaintiff to defendant, plaintiff was in the possession thereof under a contract of purchase from the Oregon & California Railroad Company, and acting in good faith, had made valuable and permanent improvements thereon to the amount and value as alleged in the complaint of the sum of $1,300. Relying on defendant's agreement to purchase the same, he surrendered the possession to him and now he, having so obtained the possession, seeks, contrary to good faith and fair dealing, to obtain the title in his own name, and thereby to overreach his vendor, who was using every endeavor to secure the title for the use and benefit of defendant in fulfillment of his own contract to convey. This a court of equity will not permit him to do, but whatever title he may obtain will inure to the benefit of plaintiff. But, while such is the law applicable to the facts of this case, plaintiff has failed to allege in his complaint, as we have already shown, sufficient to entitle him to a decree for a specific performance of his contract with defendant, or for a cancellation of the same, and, until he does so, the court is powerless to aid him. an the decree of the court below is affirmed.

DEVISE TO CHARITY—EXISTENCE OF BENEFICIARIES.

A testator devised certain real estate to trustees for the purpose of having erected on a designated portion thereof a Presbyterian Church, to be known as the "First Presbyterian Church of Upper Astoria," for the use of the society of said church, and of a parsonage for the use of the pastor in charge thereof; for the purpose of carrying out this trust, authorized and empowered the trustees to sell any and all of the land devised, except that portion on which the church and parsonage were to be built, and directed that the proceeds of such sale be applied in the erection and furnishing of said church and parsonage, and, after such church and parsonage should be erected and furnished, the trust to wholly cease and determine in trustees as to said church, parsonage, and furniture, as well as to any unsold property, or unexpended proceeds of sales, and to vest in, and be carried on by, the board of trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Upper Astoria, and their successors in office, in trust "for the purpose of advancing and propagating the Christian religion, through the agency of the Presbyterian Church." Held a charitable trust, valid against the testator's heirs, although there was no Presbyterian Church organization or society in Upper Astoria, at time of testator's death.

Appeal from circuit court, Clatsop county; FRANK J. TAYLOR, Judge.

This is a suit in equity to foreclose a mortgage of $4,000, executed by Truman P. Powers in his life-time, upon a tract of land containing 80 acres adjoining Upper Astoria, and six blocks in Upper Astoria. The complaint is in the usual form. The defendant Wadhams answers separately, alleging that he is the holder in trust of the legal title to a certain portion of the real estate described in the mortgage for the use and benefit of the First Presbyterian Church of Upper Astoria, in accordance with the last will and testament of said Powers, and asking that defendant Leinenweber's property be first sold. The defendant Mary H. Leinenweber also files an answer in which she denies the allegations of Wadhams' answer, and alleges that she is the sole heir and residuary legatee of Powers. Upon the issues thus made between defendants Wadhams and Leinenweber the cause was tried, which resulted in a decree in favor of defendant Leinenweber, from which decree Wadhams brings this appeal.

BEAN, J.. (after stating the facts as above.) On March 12, 1883, Truman P. Powers executed his last will and testament, which, among other devises and bequests, contained the following: "Sixth. I give, devise, and bequeath to Christian Leinenweber, of the town of Upper Astoria, Clatsop county, Oregon, and William Wadhams, of the city of Portland, Multnomah county, Oregon, and the survivor of them, unless the same shall be conveyed by me prior to my death, blocks Nos. 57, 49, 85, and 99, and lots Nos. 3 and 4 in block No 37, in the town of Upper Astoria, Clatsop county, Oregon, as laid out and recorded by John Adair, and 20 acres of land in a square tract out of the N. E. corner of the S. E. quarter of John Adair's donation land claim, in trust for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the First Presbyterian Church of the town of Upper Astoria, Clatsop county, Oregon, as laid out and recorded by John Adair, and which said lots, blocks, and tract of land are devised and bequeathed for the sole and express purpose of having erected and built on said lots 3 and 4 in said block 37, in said town of Upper Astoria, a Presbyterian Church, to be known and designated as the 'First Presbyterian Church of the Town of Upper Astoria,' for the use of the society of said First Presbyterian Church, and of a parsonage for the sole use and benefit of the pastor in charge of said First Presbyterian Church; and to the furnishingsaid church and parsonage with suitable, neat, and substantial furniture, and for the purpose of fulfilling and carrying out said trust, I hereby direct, authorize, and empower my said executors, Christian Leinenweber and William Wadhams, and the survivor of them, without any order of the probate court of Clatsop county, Oregon, to sell any and all said lots or tracts of land, except lots 3 and 4 in block 37, for such sums of money as shall to them seem just and right, and to give to the purchaser or purchasers of said lots or tracts of land, or any part or portion thereof, all necessary bonds, deeds, and conveyances therefor, and all sums of money, so realized by my executors, and the survivor of them, shall be loaned by them on good real-estate security until four years from the date of my decease, and at which said date said money shall be applied by my said executors to the erection of a Presbyterian Church, to be known and designated as the 'First Presbyterian Church of the Town of Upper Astoria,' for the use of the society of the said First Presbyterian Church, and of the parsonage, for the sole use of the pastor in charge of said First Presbyterian Church, to the furnishing said church and parsonage with suitable furniture; and, after the erecting and furnishing of said church and parsonage, said trust shall wholly cease and determine in my said executors, and the survivors of them, and said trust shall thereupon vest in, and be carried on by, the board of trustees of said First Presbyterian Church of the town of Upper Astoria, and by their successors in office; and if, after the said church and parsonage shall be erected and furnished, any money shall be left from the proceeds of the sale of tracts and lots of land, or of any portion thereof, or if any of said lots or tracts of land shall remain unsold, then, and in that event, said trust shall cease and determine as to said money and unsold property, as well as to said church and parsonage, and church and parsonage furniture, and to said lots 3 and 4 in said block 37, on which said church and parsonage shall be built, in my said executors, and the survivor of them, and shall vest and remain in, and be carried on by, the board of trustees of said First Presbyterian Church of Upper Astoria, Clatsop county, Oregon, and their successors in office, in trust to the said board of trustees, and their successors in office, for the purpose of advancing and propagating the Christian religion through the agency of the Presbyterian Church; and I desire and direct that my executor Christian Leinenweber should be elected and added to said board of trustees of said First Presbyterian Church of Upper Astoria for the term of his natural life, or during his pleasure, to enable him the better to assist in the carrying out of my wishes as set out in this bequest. This bequest is for the benefit of my grandchildren, to interest them in working for, and supporting and believing in, the church and gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost be glory and honor, dominion and power, world without end, amen; and to enable all in the vicinity of Upper Astoria to enjoy the privileges of that glorious gospel, which to hear aright is everlasting life. Seventh. All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, both real, personal, and mixed, of which I shall die seised and possessed after the payment of all my just debts and all the expenses of my last sickness and burial, I give, devise, and bequeath unto my adopted and beloved daughter Mary Leinenweber, in fee-simple to the said Mary Leinenweber."

At the time of Power's death in July, 1883, there was no First Presbyterian Church, or any Presbyterian Church organization, association, or society in Upper Astoria, nor has any such church been organized or established since his death. The contention of respondent is that the devise to Wadhams and Leinenweber was a private trust, and not a public charity, and, there being no certain specified beneficiaries in existence at the time of the testator's death, is void. The requisites of a valid private trust, and one for a charitable use, are materially different. In the former there must not only be a certain trustee who holds the legal title, but a certain specified cestui que trust, clearly identified, or made capable of identification, by the terms of the instrument creating the trust; while it is an essential feature of the latter that the beneficiaries are uncertain, a class of persons described in some general language, often fluctuating, changing in their individual members, and partaking of a quasi public character. Indeed, it is said a public charity begins where uncertainty in the recipient begins. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1018; 2 Perry, Trusts, § 687; Raley v. Umatilla Co., 15 Or. 172, 13 Pac. Rep. 890. When the object and purposes for which a trust is intended to be created is once determined to be charitable, very different rules from those that are applied in administering and establishing private trusts will be applied in order to give effect to the intention of the donor, and establish the charity. In a private trust, if the cestuis que trustent are so uncertain, or are so incapable of taking, that they cannot be identified, or cannot, by legal or equitable proceedings, claim the benefit conferred upon them, the gift will fail, and revert to the donor, or his heirs; but, if a gift is made for a public charitable purpose, it is immaterial that the cestuis que trustent are indefinite or uncertain, or that the trustee is uncertain or incapable of taking. Courts of equity look with favor upon all such trusts, and endeavor to carry them into effect, if it can be done consistently with the rules of law. With regard to the origin and extent of the equitable jurisdiction over charitable trusts in this country, there is the utmost conflict of judicial utterances in the earlier cases. The opinion seems formerly to have prevailed that the peculiar equitable jurisdiction over charities, except where a trust, valid by the ordinary rules of law and equity, was created, was derived solely from the statute of 43 Eliz. c. 4. It was so held by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Association v. Hart, 4 Wheat. 1; but, in the case of Vidal v. Girard, 2 How. 127, the court had occasion to re-examine the question, and, after an able and exhaustive argument by eminent counsel, in a learned opinion delivered by Justice STORY, practically overruled the case of Association v. Hart, and held that courts of equity have jurisdiction over charitable trusts as part of their ordinary jurisdiction over trusts, and independently of the statute of Elizabeth.

The doctrine of this case has generally been recognized as the law wherever the system of charitable trusts has been accepted at all. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1028, and note; 2 Perry, Trusts, 694; Howe v. Wilson, 91 Mo. 45, 3 S. W. Rep. 390. It may then be stated, as a proposition supported by the great weight of authority in this country, that courts of equity, in the various states, when they are not prohibited by statute, exercise an original inherent jurisdiction over charitable trusts, and apply to them the rules of equity, together with such other rules as may be applicable under the laws of the several states, and this they do by virtue of their inherent powers, without reference to whether the statute of Elizabeth has been adopted in their state. Many definitions, or attempted definitions of a "legal charity" are to be found in the books, only a few of which will be given here. Mr. Binney, in his great argument in the case of Vidal v. Girard, supra, defined a "pious" or "charitable" gift to be "whatever is given for the love of God, or for the love of your neighbor, in the catholic and universal sense, given from these motives and to these ends, free from the stain or taint of every consideration that is personal, private, or selfish. The love of God is the basis of all that is bestowed for His honor, the building of His church, the support of His ministers, the religious instructions of mankind. The love of his neighbor is the principle that prompts and consecrates all the rest." This definition was approved by the supreme court of Pennsylvania. Price v. Maxwell, 28 Pa. St. 35. In Ould v. Hospital, 95 U. S. 311, Mr. Justice SWAYNE said: "A charitable use, when neither law nor public policy forbids, may be applied to almost anything that tends to promote the well-doing or well-being of social man." A more concise and practical definition is probably: "A gift to a general public use, which extends to the rich as well as the poor." Coggeshall v. Pelton, 7 Johns. Ch. 294; Mitford v. Reynolds, 1 Phil. Ch. 191; Perin v. Carey, 24 How. 506. Mr. Justice GRAY, in the case of Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 556, has given a definition which seems to include all the facts and circumstances, and all varieties of charity, under the law, and leaves nothing to be added. In his words: "A 'charity,' in the legal sense, may be more fully defined as a gift to be applied consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of education or religion, or by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, or by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burden of government. It is immaterial whether the purpose is called 'charitable' in the gift itself, if it is so described as to show that it is charitable in its nature." Trusts for the support of public worship and religious instruction have always been held charitable. In Perry on Trusts, § 701, referring to the fact that the English statute (43 Eliz.) makes no reference to religious use, except the "repair of churches," it is said: "But in a Christian community, of whatever variety of faith or form of worship, there would be little need of a statute to declare gifts for religious uses to be charitable. Therefore, both before and since the statute, gifts for the advancement, spread, and teaching of Christianity, or for the convenience and support of worship, or of the ministry, have been held charitable." Mr. Pomeroy says: "The support and propagation of religion is clearly a 'charitable use.' This includes gifts for the erection, maintenance, and repair of church edifices, the maintenance of worship, the support of clergymen, the promotion and promulgation of religious doctrines and beliefs, in any manner, by the church or by associations, the aid of missionary, bible, and other religious societies, and all other objects and purposes which are really religious." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1021. Adopting the language of Lewis, C. J., in the case of Price v. Maxwell, supra: "A charitable use is not always a religious one, but we know of no religious use which could be regarded at all as free from superstition that is not included in the definition of a 'charitable use.'" Gifts for the erection of a house for public worship, or for the use of the ministry, constitute a public charity, when it appears to be some benefit to be conferred upon, or duty to be performed towards, either the public at large or some part thereof, or an indefinite class of persons. Potter v. Thornton, 7 R. I. 252; Johnson v. Mayne, 4 Iowa, 180; 2 Perry, Trusts, § 701; Beckwith v. Rector, 69 Ga. 564. Tested by all the definitions and descriptions of charities found in the text-books, and the illustrations furnished by the decided cases, it is clear that the devise to Wadhams and Leinenweber was for a public charity. Its object was the advancement of religion, through the erection of a house for the public worship of God, and supplying a dwelling-house for the minister thereof, or, as the donor himself states it, "for the purpose of advancing and propagating the Christian religion through the agency of the Presbyterian Church." It is "to be applied consistently with existing laws for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, by bringing their hearts and minds under the influence of religion," and therefore has all the requisites of a valid charitable trust.

Section 732, Perry, Trusts, cited by counsel for respondent, does not in any way conflict with this doctrine. In that section Mr. Perry is only discussing the remedy for an abuse of the trust or misemployment of the funds, and not of the validity of a trust for religious purposes, as will readily be seen by an examination of the entire section and authorities referred to by him. The donor in this case was a devout and active member of the Presbyterian Church, and had been since the early settlement of this coast. He for many years resided in Upper Astoria, and had possessed an intense desire for the establishment of a church of his chosen belief in that place. But during his life-time he was doomed to disappointment, but when he came to arrange for the final disposition of his property, after death, still cherishing that desire, and being anxious that those who should reside in his adopted town after him might enjoy the privileges and blessings of which he had been deprived, made this provision in his will. His intention is clear, and definitely expressed. The object to which he desired that particular portion of his property to be applied is clearly stated. It is the duty of a court of equity to carry out his intention, if it can be done consistently with existing laws. It is also claimed that the devise in this case is invalid because there was no cestui que trust in existence capable of taking at the time of the donor's death, nor is there now. In disposing of this question it is well to keep in view the fact that we have a living trustee, in whom the testator vested the property with specific direction as to its disposition. This is not a case where the bequest is for charity generally, or when there is no one in esse capable of taking at the time of the testator's death. In Perry, Trusts, § 719, it is said: "There is a wide distinction between a gift to charity and a gift to a trustee to be by him applied to charity. In the first case, the court has only to give the fund to charitable institutions, which is a mere ministerial or prerogative act; in the second case, the court has jurisdiction over the trustee, as it has over all trustees, to see that he does not commit a breach of his trust, or apply the funds in bad faith, or to purposes that are not charitable." A gift in trust for a public charity not in existence at the date of the gift, and the beginning of whose existence is uncertain, has repeatedly been held valid by the courts of this country. In Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327, a grant to John S. Horner, and his successors in trust, for the use and benefit of the Russell Institute of St. Louis, Mo., was held to be a charitable gift valid against the donor's heirs, although the institution was neither established nor incorporated in the life-time of the donor, or of Allen. In Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336, a bequest "to the first Christian church erected, or to be erected, in the village of Telfairville, in Burke county, or to such persons as may become trustees of the same," was held valid as a charitable bequest. In Seda v. Huble, 75 Iowa, 429, 39 N. W. Rep. 685, a devise was made to certain persons in trust for the benefit of the Catholic Church on the testator's farm, and directed that they and their successors should invest said money safely for the benefit of the church. It was held that the bequest was for a charitable use clearly defined, and that the title to the money vested in the trustees, and it was immaterial that the beneficiary church was not, and could not be, incorporated, and that the bequest was not invalid on the ground that there was no one to call the trustees to an account for the misuse of the funds. In Schmidt v. Hess, 60 Mo. 591, a grant of land to a church was held valid as a charity, and although the church was at the time of the grant unincorporated so that no grantee was then in esse capable of taking it, and although the language used indicating the intent may be obscure, yet equity will effectuate the trust. To the same effect see Ingalls v. Harbor, 3 Pet. 99; McDonogh v. Murdock, 15 How. 367; Ould v. Hospital, 95 U. S. 303; Miller v. Chittenden, 2 Iowa, 315, and 4 Iowa, 252; Attorney General v. Chester, 1 Brown's Ch. 389; 2 Perry, Trusts, §§ 730, 736; Vidal v. Girard, 2 How. 127; Johnson v. Mayne, 4 Iowa, 180; Cumming v. Trustees, 64 Ga. 105. No case was cited in the argument, and our research has failed to furnish one, where a court of equity has refused to effectuate a trust for public or charitable purposes, when the fund is given to a trustee competent to take, and when the charitable use is so far defined as to be capable of being specifically executed.

The property in this instance is given to a charitable use in every respect consistent with law and public policy. The object is specific and definite, and capable of being carried into effect according to the intention of the donor. The property is given to a trustee capable of taking the estate for the benefit of the beneficiaries named. The trust is so far expressed and defined that it can be enforced by virtue of the inherent powers of a court of equity. The beneficiaries are a well-ascertained society of individuals, whose rights, when organized and established, will ever remain a proper subject of easy and accurate judicial inquiry and determination. The devise is therefore not like an undefined gift to charity, where there is no trustee, nor any designated cestui que trust, which many of the courts in this country have refused to uphold. Nor is this a grant to a trustee for charity generally. The trust is fully expressed, and clearly defined. An active duty is imposed upon the trustees in respect to the management, disposition, and use of the property. They are given power to sell and dispose of the property, and invest the proceeds in a specific way. The bequest is accompanied with a designation of the purpose to which it is to be applied, which, as we have already seen, is a charitable object. The beneficiaries are an indefinite number of persons. In fact it presents all the requisites of a valid public charity. The gift was immediate and absolute, and it is clear the testator meant that no part of the property devised to Wadhams and Leinenweber should ever go to his heirs at law, or be applied to any object than that to which he has devoted it by the devise in question. It follows therefore that the decree of the court below must be reversed, and decree entered here foreclosing plaintiff's mortgage, and directing that the real estate described in the mortgage belonging to defendant Mary H. Leinenweber be first sold, and, if the proceeds arising from such sale be insufficient to satisfy the amount due them, and the costs of this suit, then the property devised to defendant Wadhams in trust be sold, or sufficient thereof, in order to satisfy said balance, and that appellant recover his costs in this court and the court below.

GUARDIAN'S SALE — COLLATERAL ATTACK — CURATIVE ACTS.

1. Where the question as to a guardian's sale of lands of his ward arises collaterally, and the pleadings do not attack the proceeding for want of jurisdiction, and where the record discloses jurisdiction, both of the parties and the subject-matter, the sale will be sustained.

2. Mere irregularities of proceedings, though of so grave a character as to render a judicial sale inoperative, may be deprived of their evil consequences by subsequent legislation.

Appeal from circuit court, Josephine county; L. R. WEBSTER, Judge.

C. A. Sehlbrede, for appellant. W. M. Colvig and P. P. Prim, for respondent.

LORD, J. This is an action in ejectment to recover the possession of certain real property particularly described herein, and situated in Josephine county of this state. The only question raised is as to the validity of the proceedings for the sale by the guardian of the interest of plaintiff in such land. It arose in the progress of the trial out of an objection to the report of the sale, confirmation, and deed of the guardian to the plaintiff's interest in such real property. The sale was made by the guardian in pursuance of an order regularly made of the county court of Lane county, but the place designated in the order for the sale was at the court-house door in Jackson county. The contention is that the sale was void for the reason that the land was situated in what was then Jackson county, and should have been sold there, instead of at the court-house door in Lane county. The Code provides: "In order to obtain a license for such sale the guardian shall present to the county court of the county in which he is appointed guardian a petition therefor, setting forth the condition of the estate of his ward and the facts and circumstances under which it is founded, tending to show the necessity or expediency of such sale, which shall be verified by the oath of the petitioner." Hill's Code, § 3118. The record discloses a compliance with all the requirements of the statute to procure the order, and it is admitted that the court ordering the sale had jurisdiction to make such order, but that it erred in specifying the place at which the property was sold, and thereby vitiated its proceedings. The statute does not designate the place at which the land is to be sold, but provides that such guardian, before fixing the time and place of the sale, shall, etc. Id. § 3123. By some it is thought that either county may be designated as may be deemed best under the circumstances. The claim for the plaintiff is that the sale by the guardian should have been in the county where the real property is situated, and that the sale was rendered void in not so making it. Assuming, without deciding, that the contention for the plaintiff is correct, the case presented is that of a court having jurisdiction in the premises exercising it erroneously. In such case, after jurisdiction has attached, no principle of law is better settled than that mere defects or irregularities which may have resulted from the exercise of jurisdiction cannot be taken advantage of in a collateral way, as is sought to be done in the present action. The defect was not of a jurisdictional character.

Upon the facts presented the court was authorized to make the order for the sale of the property. This is conceded, as well as the jurisdiction of the person; and the defect, if defect it be, crept in after jurisdiction was acquired. In a word, it is admitted that the record contains a recital of all the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction; and, within the principle laid down in Heatherly v. Hadley, 4 Or. 1, it is conclusive when attacked collaterally. In Walker v. Goldsmith, 14 Or. 126, 12 Pac. Rep. 537, it was said: "Where the question as to a guardian's sale of the lands of his ward arises collaterally, and the pleadings do not attack the proceedings for want of jurisdiction, and where the record discloses, on its face, jurisdiction, both of the parties and the subject-matter, the sale must be sustained." And in Wright v. Edwards, 10 Or. 307, it is said: "Where there is matter of substance upon which jurisdiction can hinge, mere errors or defects, although material in some respects, but which might have been avoided on appeal, cannot avail to condemn a judicial proceeding when by lapse of time an appeal is barred which has become the foundation of title to property." Morrill v. Morrill, (Or.) 25 Pac. Rep. 365. This of itself would be sufficient to defeat the contention for the plaintiff, but it is not all. To remedy defects or irregularities which may affect judicial sales, we have a curative act designed to meet such cases. Section 3 provides: "All sales * * * by guardians of their wards' real property in this state to purchasers for a valuable consideration, which has been paid by such purchasers to such guardians or their successors in good faith, and such sales shall not have been set aside by the county or probate court, but shall have been confirmed or acquiesced in by such county or probate court, shall be sufficient to sustain * * * a guardian's deed to such purchaser for such real property; and, in case such deed shall not have been given, shall entitle such purchaser to such deed, and such deed shall be sufficient to convey to such purchaser all title that such ward had in said real property; and all irregularities in obtaining the order of the court for such sale, and all irregularities in making or conducting the same by such * * * guardians, shall be disregarded." Sess. Laws 1889, p. 69, § 3. The case before us comes directly within the purview of this statute, which was intended to obviate or cure such defects or irregularities as is sought to be made available in this action. Where the defects are not jurisdictional in their character, it is held that they may be validated by a subsequent curative act of the legislature. Mr. Freeman says: "But mere irregularities or proceedings, though of so grave a character as to render a judicial sale inoperative, may be deprived of their evil consequences by subsequent legislation." Freem. Jud. Sales, § 57. So that, however we may regard this case, no error is discovered, and the judgment must be affirmed.

EXECUTION—MOTION TO QUASH—AMENDMENT.

1. Where an execution is radically defective in failing to follow the judgment, and a sale has been had of certain real property, from which is realized about two-fifths of what the same property brought a few months previously at another execution sale, in the same case, and the cause of the discrepancy in the amount realized does not appear, the court, in the exercise of a superintending power over its processes, will quash the writ.

2. The power to amend an execution is vested in the court, but its exercise must always be in furtherance of justice.

Appeal from circuit court, Douglas county; R. S. BEAN, Judge.

This is an appeal from an order confirming a sheriff's sale made upon a decree of foreclosure; also from an order allowing the execution upon which such sale was made to be amended. On the 2d day of July, 1888, a final decree of foreclosure was entered in this court in said cause, for the sum of $13,045, and interest, and $250 attorney's fees, and for costs and disbursements. The mandate was duly filed and entered in the court below on the 10th day of October, 1888. On the 15th day of October, 1888, an execution was issued to enforce said decree, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Douglas county for service, who advertised the lands described in said writ for sale on the 1st day of December, 1888. On said day, a part of said lands were sold to S. C. Flint and G. A. Taylor for $3,300, and the residue to W. S. Hamilton for $10,300, amounting, in the aggregate, to the sum of $13,600. After the entry of said decree, a payment was made thereon before said sale of $815.60. The aggregate amount of the costs and attorney's fees, at the time of the sale, was $643.07. It appears from the sheriff's return that there was from the proceeds of said sale in his hands the sum of $12,956.93, to apply on said decree, leaving a balance due thereon of $2,017.77. On the 6th day of May, 1889, the plaintiff moved to confirm said sales, which motion was on the next day duly allowed by the court, and said sales confirmed. One parcel of said land was sold to W. S. Hamilton, as appears from the sheriff's certificate of redemption, for the sum of $5,000. On the 31st day of August, 1889, the defendant R. Phipps duly redeemed the same by paying said sheriff the sum of $5,375. The land thus redeemed is described as the donation land claim of R. Phipps in townships 28 and 29 S., range 6 W.;—the donation land claim of Robert McKee in townships 28 and 29 S., range 6 W.; all of the donation land claim of Monroe C. McCloud that lies north and east of the South Umpqua river, in Douglas county, Or. On the 9th day of October, 1889, the clerk of the circuit court of Douglas county, Or., issued another execution on said decree, in which it was recited that S. C. Flint, at the regular October term, 1888, of the circuit court of Douglas county, Or., to-wit, Wednesday, October 10, 1888, recovered a judgment by foreclosure of a mortgage and against the above-named defendant R. Phipps and against the following described mortgaged premises, to-wit: The donation claim of M. C. McCloud, No. 41 in township 28 S., range 6 W., bounded and described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at a point 12 chains north and 9.25 chains east from the south-west corner of section 33; thence north 40 chains; thence east 40 chains; thence south 40 chains; thence north, 89 deg. 34 min. west, 39.56 chains, to the place of beginning. The donation land claim No. 42, of Robert Phipps, in township 28 S., range 6 W., and donation claim No. 37, of Robert Phipps, in township 29 S., range 6 W. The donation claim of Robert McKee, in townships 28 and 29 S., range 6 W., (notification No. 5,869.) And it is further recited that it has been decreed by the court that the mortgage of the plaintiff be foreclosed, and all rights of the defendants W. R. Willis, Carrie Willis, his wife, S. Hamilton, G. A. Taylor, and H. C. Slocum are decreed to be subsequent to the lien of the plaintiff, and they are thereby barred of all equity of redemption in said lands, except such rights of redemption as the laws of Oregon confer. The sheriff is then commanded to levy upon and sell the above-described premises, and apply the proceeds arising from such sale—First. To the costs and expenses of the proceedings in the supreme court of the state of Oregon, and in the court below. Second. To the payment of the decree of the plaintiff therein, to-wit: The unsatisfied balance thereof, $2,305.97, with interest thereon, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, from the 9th day of October, 1889. By the sheriff's return on this execution, it appears that he levied on the lands described in it on the 14th day of October, 1889, and, after duly advertising the same for the requisite time, they were sold to T. R. Sheridan on the 16th day of November, 1889, for the sum of $2,390. This satisfied said decree and costs, the sheriff recites, leaving $3.04 in his hands. On the 22d day of November, 1889, the defendants W. R. Willis and R. Phipps filed their objections to the confirmation of sale as follows: First. For that the said execution does not describe or follow the terms of any judgment or decree in the above-entitled court and cause. Second. It does not state the amount of any judgment or decree, or the amount actually due thereon. Third. For that the only decree entered in the above-entitled court and cause was a decree dated October 10, 1888, ordering the sale of the lands in this execution, together with a large body of other lands, and said decree and order were duly enforced by virtue of an execution issued on the 15th day of October, 1888, and sale of all of the premises in said decree described on the 1st day of December, 1888, and the proceeds of said sale paid to the plaintiff above named, as fully appear by the records of the court. Fourth. For that the sheriff's return shows a sale of all the right, title, and interest of the defendant R. Phipps, in and to the land described in the execution on the 23d day of September, 1886, when the only judgment or decree on the record of this court in this cause against the defendant R. Phipps was entered on the 10th day of October, 1888. Fifth. For that the sale was not authorized by the judgment, decree, or execution issued in said cause. Sixth. There is no judgment or decree in the records of this court that will authorize the issuance of the execution issued in this cause. Seventh. The only decree and order for sale, authorizing an execution against the real property described in this execution, had been fully executed and satisfied before the issue of this execution. Eighth. The execution in this case does not authorize the sale of any interest or title of the defendant R. Phipps, in and to the premises mentioned therein, prior to the 10th day of October, 1888. On the 2d day of December, 1889, the plaintiff filed a motion to amend the execution as well as the return. The defendants also filed a motion to quash the execution. The court sustained the plaintiff's motions, and allowed the execution to be amended, and then confirmed the sale, at the same time overruling the defendants' objections to such confirmation, as well as their motion to quash. From these rulings, this appeal is taken.

W. R. Willis, for appellants. J. C. Fullerton and Hamilton & Hamilton, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The first question presented by the record is the sufficiency of the execution, upon which the sale was made. It appears that there had been a previous sale of all the lands described in the decree, and that the tracts of land described in the writ had been redeemed by the judgment debtor; but the writ fails to follow the decree in every essential particular except the names of the parties. The power of amendment is conceded, and, in most cases, should be exercised to support a title acquired at such sale; but it is still a power which must be exercised cautiously, and in view of the facts of the particular case. A few months previously, this land sold for $5,000. At the sale in question, it only brought about $2,300. What caused this discrepancy does not appear. It cannot be claimed that so short a time had produced any effect upon the value of the property. Courts always exercise full control over their processes, so that suitors shall not be prejudiced, either by the form of the writ or the manner of its execution. McKee v. Logan, 82 Mo. 524. The defects in this writ may have been the reason why the property did not sell for as much as at the previous sale, and, if so, then the parties were injured to the amount of the difference between the present and former sale. Under this view of the subject, we think the better practice would have been for the court below to have quashed the writ on the defendants' motion, rather than to have amended it. This power of amendment is a very salutary one, but it ought always to be exercised in furtherance of justice. In this case, we have concluded to reverse the decree appealed from, and to quash the writ.

The other question presented is not fully presented by this record. It was said at the argument that the defendant Willis had purchased Phipp's interest in this land before the decree of foreclosure, and taken a deed therefor; but the fact does not appear in the record. If it did, what effect the fact would have upon the rights of these parties is not so manifest. Boyce v. Wight, 2 Abb. N. C. 167; Bowers v. Arnoux, 33 N. Y. Super. Ct. 530; Teabout v. Jaffray, 74 Iowa, 28, 36 N. W. Rep. 783; Hervey v. Krost, 116 Ind. 268, 19 N. E. Rep. 125; Clayton v. Ellis, 50 Iowa, 590. But, whatever the correct rule may be, we do not care to enter upon its consideration until all the facts are before us. Let the decree appealed from be reversed.

STATUTES—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

A new statute, revising the whole subject-matter of an old one, and evidently intended as a substitute for it, although there is no clause to that effect, will operate as a repeal of the old law.

Appeal from circuit court, Lake county. The respondent recovered a judgment in the circuit court for Lake county against appellant in an action at law, and filed a statement of his costs and disbursements, which included the clerk's and sheriff's fees, to which appellant filed objections. The county clerk found for respondent, from which an appeal was taken to the circuit court, and that court allowed respondent as disbursements paid W. T. Boyd, county clerk, $16.95, and an additional sum of 33% per cent. to-wit, $5.65, making a total of $22.60, and paid William Carl, sheriff, $6.50, and an additional 33% per cent. to-wit, $2.17, making a total of $8.67, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

C. A. Cogswell, for appellant. P. P. Prim and H. K. Hanna, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The only question presented by this appeal is whether the clerk and sheriff of Lake county are entitled to receive for their services 33% per cent. in addition to the fees provided in sections 3 and 4 of the act of the legislative assembly approved February 25, 1885. An intelligent understanding of this question requires a brief reference to the various acts of the legislature concerning the fees of these officers. In 1882 (Laws 1882, p. 45) an act was passed regulating the fees of clerks and sheriffs in the various counties of the state, which, for the purposes of this case, may be said to have divided the counties into three classes, and provided a schedule of fees for each class. Sections 2 and 3 of this act provide the fees for the clerks and sheriffs in the counties of the first class. Section 7 provides that clerks and sheriffs in certain counties, including Lake, shall receive for their services an additional compensation to that provided for those in the first class of 33% per cent.; while sections 8 and 9 provide a schedule of fees for the counties of the third class, which are the counties of Coos, Curry, Clatsop, Columbia, Josephine, and Tillamook, the fees for these counties being largely in excess of those provided for the other counties. In 1885 (Laws 1885, p. 63) an act was passed, approved February 23, 1885, amending section 7 of the act of 1882, by adding to the counties of the second class therein named the counties of Baker, Union, and Grant. At the same session of the legislature an act was passed, approved February 25, 1885, amending sections 7, 8, and 9 of the act of 1882, by omitting the counties of Lake and Klamath from section 7, and adding these counties to sections 8 and 9, thus transferring these counties from the second to the third class. It is contended by counsel for respondent that the attempt to amend section 7 of the act of 1882 by the act of February 25, 1885, is void, because this section had already been amended at the same session of the legislature, two days previously, and therefore the clerk and sheriff of Lake county are entitled to receive for their services the fees provided in sections 3 and 4 of the act of February 25, 1885, and an additional 33% per cent., on account of the provisions of the act of February 23, 1885. Conceding that the attempt to amend section 7 of the act of 1882 is void, as claimed by counsel, the conclusion as contended for does not follow. The only matter under consideration by the legislature at the time the act of February 25, 1885, was passed was the fees to be allowed the clerks and sheriffs of Lake and Klamath counties. This is apparent from the general scope of the act. The only modification it makes in the act of 1882 is in transferring these two counties from the second to the third class, thereby largely increasing the fees of clerks and sheriffs in these counties. It was evidently intended to revise the whole subject of the fees of these officers, and as a substitute for all previous legislation on that subject, by transferring Lake and Klamath counties from the second to the third class. Although the attempt to amend section 7 of the act of 1882 by omitting Lake and Klamath counties from the counties therein named may be void, the amendment of sections 8 and 9 by adding these counties is valid, and clearly expresses the legislative intent. A careful comparison of this act with the act of 1882 can leave no doubt that it was the intention of the legislature, by the latter statute, to revise the entire matter to which they both had reference, to make such changes in the fees of these officers as it thought best, and to substitute its will as expressed in sections 3 and 4 of the act of 1885 for the old law. The act of February 25, 1885, being intended to revise the subject of the fees of clerks and sheriffs of these counties, although it had no clause to that effect, operates as a repeal of all former acts in relation to the same subject-matter. Repeals by implication are not favored, but a new statute revising the whole subject-matter of an old one, and evidently intended as a substitute for it, will operate as a repeal of the old law, although there is no clause to that effect. This has repeatedly been held by this court, (Grant Co. v. Sels, 5 Or. 243; Hurst v. Hawn, Id. 275; Fleischner v. Chadwick, Id. 152,) and is generally recognized by the courts, (Rogers v. Watrous, 8 Tex. 62; Davless v. Fairborn, 3 How. 636; U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 88; Pierpont v. Crouch, 10 Cal. 315; Towle v. Marrett, 14 Amer. Dec. 206, and note.) In Grant Co. v. Sels, supra, the court held that an act of the legislature fixing the salary of the county judge of that county at $800 a year operated as a repeal of a former act fixing his salary at $1,200, although it contained no clause to that effect, and that the county could maintain an action to recover from the defendant money paid him under the former act. To the same effect is the case of Pierpont v. Crouch, 10 Cal. 315. So that, conceding that section 2 of the act of February 25, 1885, which attempts to amend section 7 of the act of 1882, is invalid and of no effect, (a question, however, we do not undertake to decide,) there still remains sufficient of the act of 1885 to clearly show the legislative intent. By the act of 1882 no schedule of fees was provided for the counties of Lake and Klamath, but the clerks and sheriffs of these counties were to receive the fees provided for counties of the first class, with 33% per cent. added, which still made their fees much less than prescribed for counties of the third class. By sections 3 and 4 of the act of February 25, 1885, these counties were transferred to the third class, and a schedule of fees prescribed, and it would certainly be doing violence to the clearly expressed legislative intent to so construe this act as to allow these officers the maximum fees provided for any of the counties of the state, and an additional compensation of 33% per cent. In the construction of a statute, the intention of the legislature is to be pursued, if possible. To ascertain this intention, resort may be had to the entire act, and, while section 2 of the act of February 25, 1885, may be invalid on account of some technical defect, we still have a right to examine it, in order to ascertain the purpose and intent of the legislature. It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and this cause remanded to the court below, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of respondent for $16.95 for clerk's fees, and $6.50 for sheriff's fees, and that appellant recover his costs and disbursements.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—TITLE OF LAWS—SINGLE SUBJECT.

Act Wash. March 28, 1890, (Laws 1889-90, p. 51,) entitled "An act allowing school-districts to borrow money and issue bonds for the building and furnishing of school-houses, to permit the funding of school-district bonds heretofore or hereafter to be issued, legalizing the same, and declaring an emergency," provides for extending the issuing of bonds, by school-districts containing 10,000 population, to 5 per cent. of their taxable property. Held, that the title embraced but one subject, and such provision was within the title, and was valid, though the remainder of the act might violate Const. Wash. art. 2, § 19, providing that an act shall contain but one subject, and that shall be clearly expressed in the title.

Appeal from district court, Spokane county.

W. C. Jones, for appellant. H. E. Houghton, for appellee.

SCOTT, J. Plaintiff brought this action to enjoin the defendants, who were directors of school-district 81, comprising the city of Spokane Falls, from negotiating certain school-district bonds amounting to $250,000, which had been authorized by a vote of the district. The amount exceeds 2% per cent. of the taxable property therein. The defendants demurred generally to the complaint. The court sustained the demurrer, and the plaintiff appealed to this court. The only question in the case is as to the validity of an act, approved March 28, 1890, purporting to amend section 1 of an act, approved March 19, 1890, relating to the issuance of such bonds, both of said acts having been passed by the last legislative assembly. See Sess. Laws 1889-90, pp. 45, 51. The act first approved limited the issuing of bonds, by school-districts containing a population of 10,000 or more, to an amount not exceeding 2% per cent. of the taxable property therein. The population of this district exceeds 10,000. The later act, if valid, extends the limit to 5 per cent. in all cases. It is urged by appellant that it is void in consequence of its containing more than one subject, and that the matters contained in the act are not sufficiently expressed in the title. See section 19, art. 2, of the state constitution. We are of the opinion that the later act is valid, at least in so far as it extends the limit to 5 per cent. of the taxable property regardless of population, and in incorporated cities making the last preceding assessment for city purposes the basis for determining the maximum amount. The title thereto embraces but one subject, and the act so far being clearly within the title, and relating to but one subject, it should be sustained in any event. See Cooley, Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) p. 178, par. 5. As to the validity of the remainder of the act, we are not called upon to decide here. It being admitted that the amount so voted for is within the 5 per cent. limit, the bonds were accordingly authorized. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Feb. 4, 1891.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CERTAINTY OF DESCRIPTION.

An option on "one-half interest of [the vendor] in horses and ranch" is capable of specific enforcement, as the ranch may be identified by extrinsic evidence.

C. O. Whittemore and S. P. Armstrong, for appellant. Miller & Maginnis, for respondents.

ZANE, C. J. The plaintiff instituted this action in the district court to enforce the specific performance of an alleged contract in the words and figures following: "Logan, Utah, Feb. 8th, 1890. Received of J. M. Easton the sum of $10.00, as an option on the one-half interest of Hyrum Thatcher, of Logan City, in horses and ranch, etc., for the space of sixty days; the sum agreed upon being two thousand dollars cash down, and a balance of fifteen hundred dollars in two years; in all, $3,500. In case of failure of J. M. Easton to finish contract, he to forfeit the option. HYRUM THATCHER. J. M. EASTON. [Seal.]" A more particular description of the property was given in the complaint, and due execution and delivery of the contract was also averred. It was also alleged that the defendant John E. Price, after such delivery and with a knowledge of it, purchased the same property of Thatcher, and that the plaintiff offered to perform the contract on his part, and demanded the execution thereof, and that Thatcher had refused to perform on his part. To the complaint the defendants interposed a demurrer on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which the court sustained. From this decision of the court the plaintiff has appealed to this court, and assigns the same as error. The only question argued by counsel, and submitted for our consideration and decision, is, was the contract void for uncertainty in the description of the land? That description is, "one-half interest of Hyrum Thatcher in horses and ranch." This is equivalent to saying, "a ranch in which Hyrum Thatcher owns a one-half interest." Extrinsic evidence to show that Hyrum Thatcher owned a one-half interest in a ranch would be competent. And it would also be competent for witnesses familiar with the ranch to describe it, giving its boundaries. By such evidence the contract could be applied to its subject-matter; and if the existence of such a ranch was to be so shown, in the absence of any proof of another ranch in which Hyrum Thatcher owned a one-half interest, the subject of the contract would be identified, and it would not be within the statute of frauds. It would also be competent to prove that Hyrum Thatcher owned a one-half interest in no other ranch. The above statement of the law is supported by the following authorities: Waring v. Ayres, 40 N. Y. 358; Devil. Deeds, § 113; Notes to Atwood v. Cobb, 26 Amer. Dec. 667; King v. Ruckman, 20 N. J. Eq. 359; Hurly v. Brown, 98 Mass. 545; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 286, 287; Atwood v. Cobb, 16 Pick. 227; Scanlan v. Geddes, 112 Mass. 15. We are of the opinion that the court below erred in sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint. That decision is reversed, and the case is remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer, and permit defendants to answer.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 20, 1891.)

APPEAL FROM DISCHARGE ON HABEAS CORPUS.

From an order of the district court discharging a person from arrest on habeas corpus no appeal lies under Organic Act Utah Territory, § 9, and 2 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, §§ 3635, 5134, providing that appeals shall lie from final judgments in an action or special proceeding, or in criminal actions, from questions of law alone.

Appeal from district court, first district; JAMES A. MINER, Judge.

A. R. Heywood, for appellant. Smith & Smith, for respondent.

ZANE, C. J. The plaintiff was arrested for a violation of an alleged ordinance of Ogden City prohibiting dentists from practicing their profession without a license from a board of examiners appointed by the city council; and the court below discharged him after a hearing upon a writ of habeas corpus. From the order of discharge the defendant has prosecuted an appeal to this court, and the plaintiff moves the court to dismiss for the reason that the right of appeal does not exist from such an order.

When an individual is unlawfully deprived of his liberty a writ of habeas corpus is his most simple and speedy remedy. Under the statutes of Utah the writ may issue upon application of the prisoner or other person on his behalf, or the judge or court may issue the writ on his or its own motion upon sufficient evidence; and upon the return of the writ the statute requires the court or judge to proceed in a summary manner to hear the testimony and arguments, and to dispose of the prisoner as the case may require. And in all cases where the imprisonment is for a criminal offense, and the commitment may have been informal or without due authority, or the process may have been executed by a person not duly authorized, the court is authorized to make a new commitment, or admit the party to bail, if the case be bailable. The duty of the judge or court upon such a hearing is similar to that of the magistrate upon a preliminary examination; and, though the prisoner may be discharged, he may be again arrested for the same offense upon a sufficient showing. While the decision of the judge or court may liberate the prisoner from arrest, it does not determine his innocence. He may be indicted, tried, and convicted without regard to the discharge upon the writ of habeas corpus. Upon such a hearing the guilt or innocence of the prisoner of the crime charged, or of the right to reimprison him in consequence of it, cannot be finally determined. The order of his discharge simply releases him from the particular restraint to which he is subjected. Such a decision cannot convict him or acquit him of the crime, or determine his imprisonment in consequence of it. It is not final. Section 9 of the Organic Act of Utah Territory, provides that "writs of error, bills of exceptions, and appeal shall be allowed in all cases from the final decision of said district courts to the supreme court under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." And section 3635, vol. 2, Comp. Laws Utah 1888, provides that "an appeal may be taken to the supreme court from the district court from all final judgments in an action or special proceeding," etc. And section 5134 of the same volume provides that "either party in a criminal action may appeal to the supreme court on questions of law alone." The order from which the defendant attempted to appeal was not a final judgment within either of the provisions above quoted; nor did the order of discharge upon the hearing upon the writ of habeas corpus involve a question of law only; nor do we think an appeal from such an order within any special provision of the statute. In some of the states the decision of the court upon such a hearing may be reviewed at the instance of the state when the prisoner is discharged, as well as at the instance of the prisoner when he is remanded. In others the appeal is allowed only at the instance of the prisoner when he is remanded, or when the writ is denied. The right of appeal does not exist in either case without statutory authority. To entangle the proceeding by writ of habeas corpus with an appeal would deprive it of its efficacy as a simple and speedy remedy for the wrongs for which it was designed. In many cases an appeal would be an idle process unless the prisoner could be held during its pendency; and, if so held, this beneficent and time-honored writ in all such cases would be thereby deprived of its efficacy as a means of swift relief from oppression by unlawful imprisonment. In the case of In re Clasby, 3 Utah, 183, 1 Pac. Rep. 852, the court held that neither the defendant named in the writ nor the people have the right to an appeal from an order discharging a person upon a hearing upon a writ of habeas corpus. To the same effect are People v. Schuster, 40 Cal. 627; Wyeth v. Richardson, 10 Gray, 240. We are of the opinion that an appeal does not lie to this court from an order of the district court discharging a person from arrest upon a writ of habeas corpus. The motion of the respondent to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction in this court to hear it is allowed. Appeal dismissed.

SPRECHT et al. v. PARSONS, United States Marshal.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—VALIDITY—POWER TO SELL ON CREDIT.

An assignment wherein the assignee accepts the trust, and agrees "to execute the same by disposing of the property, * * * and applying the proceeds to the payment of said debts," does not by implication authorize the assignee to sell on credit, which would invalidate it, under 2 Comp. Laws Utah, § 2838, providing that every assignment made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors shall be void.

ZANE, C. J. It appears from the record in this case that one Valentine H. Harding, on the 4th day of October, 1890, assigned to respondents the goods in question, to pay his debts, and that while they were in possession, as such assignees, the appellant, as United States marshal, levied an attachment on them. On the trial of the case in the court below, the defendant objected to the introduction of the assignment in evidence on the ground that it was void under the following provision of the statute of Utah: "Every conveyance or assignment, in writing or otherwise, of any estate or interest in lands or in goods, * * * made with the intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors or other persons of their lawful * * * debts or demands, shall be void." 2 Comp. Laws, § 2838. The court overruled the objection, and the defendant excepted. The court also charged the jury that the assignment was valid, to which appellant also excepted. The appellant relies on both exceptions, and assigns the ruling and charge of the court as error. He insists that the assignment conferred the power to sell the property assigned on credit, and that it is for that reason void. The language which it is contended confers such authority to sell on credit is as follows: "Out of the proceeds of the personal property * * * will pay," etc. "The said parties * * * accept this trust, and agree to execute the same by disposing of the property, * * * and applying the proceeds to the payment of said debts." The intention to authorize the assignees to sell on credit is not express. Is it implied? The term "proceeds" of a disposition of property can be construed to mean money or other property, and so the term "dispose," in the connection in which it is found, may mean a sale for cash or on time, or an exchange for other property. To construe the language used as meaning a sale for cash supports the instrument; but to interpret it as authorizing a sale upon time, or exchange of the goods for other property, renders the assignment void. But the first construction mentioned is equally, if not more, reasonable than either of the others. When an assignment may be given a reasonable construction by which it is valid, and another by which it is void, the rule is to adopt the one that supports it. In such case the court will assume that the assignor intended to make a valid instrument; that he did not intend to violate the law. In Nye v. Van Huse, 6 Mich. 346, the court said: "It is forthly objected that the assignment was void as allowing the assignees to sell upon credit. The assumption that they were allowed to sell upon credit is based upon the following language: 'And sell and dispose of the same either at public or private sale, as they in their good judgment may deem best, and upon such terms and conditions as they may deem most advisable, and for the best interest of the creditors, converting the same into money,' etc. If it be true that a grant of a power to sell upon credit would render the assignment void, (which is a question not before us,) yet we think a fair and reasonable interpretation of this language will not justify the construction that an illegal act was contemplated. This provision is usually found in the forms of assignments consulted by draughtsmen; and it is as reasonable to presume that the intent in following such form and in using the language was for a lawful as for an unlawful purpose." In the case of Benedict v. Huntington, 32 N. Y. 220, the court said: "And also that where an instrument does not, by an express provision, authorize an illegal act, the legal inference is that the assignor did not contemplate or intend to authorize one." The same principle is announced in Kellogg v. Slauson, 11 N. Y. 302; Wilson v. Robertson, 21 N. Y. 587; Burrill, Assignm. 345. The case of Beus v. Shaugnessy, 2 Utah, 492, we do not regard as entirely analogous to the one in hand. We have carefully examined other cases referred to by counsel, but do not deem it necessary to make special reference to them. We are of opinion that the assignment which we have considered is valid, and that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURTS.

1. 2 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 5380, providing that appeals from justices of the peace shall not be effectual unless appellant cause the papers to be filed in the district court within 30 days, and section 3027, giving courts of record power to make rules, and section 5459, authorizing the collection from appellant of a jury fee, in jury cases, before his papers are filed, apply to appeals from United States commissioners, and are valid, and within the legislative power of the territory.

2. Under 2 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 3027, authorizing courts of record to make rules not inconsistent with the laws, and not imposing "any tax or charge upon any legal proceeding," the court may by rule require the clerk's fees for filing and docketing the papers in a case appealed from a justice or commissioner to be paid before the case is entered, and, if not paid within 30 days, authorize the opposite party to pay them, docket the case, and have the appeal dismissed.

Following Salt Lake City v. Redwine, (Utah,) 23 Pac. Rep. 756.

Appeal from the district court of the third district of Utah territory, and from an order of said court dismissing an appeal from the United States commissioners' court, and from an order refusing to vacate such order of dismissal, and reinstate the appeal.

MINER, J. The record in this case shows that on March 17, 1890, a money judgment was obtained by the plaintiff and respondent against the defendant and appellant before United States Commissioner Norrell, at Salt Lake City, for $218.75, with costs, and that on the 19th day of March, 1890, an appeal was duly taken from such judgment by defendant to the third district court, and the court files and transcript of the commissioner lodged in the clerk's office of said district court with the clerk thereof, but were not filed by such clerk, but simply indorsed thereon the words, "Received March 19th, 1890," and put away in the pigeon-hole. That on the 21st day of April, 1890, on an ex parte application of plaintiffs, and without the knowledge of the defendant's attorney, an order was obtained in said court dismissing such appeal for the reason that the sum of eight dollars, clerk and jurors' fees, had not been paid to the clerk of said court within 30 days after the appeal papers therein had been lodged with the clerk thereof, as provided by the rules of said court. That on the 15th day of May, 1890, a motion of defendant and appellant, duly noticed, was heard in said court, based on affidavits of defendant and Theodore Burmester, presenting a state of facts tending to show mistake, inadvertence, or negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to pay the docket fee provided by the rules of the third district court, and asking to have the order of dismissal vacated, and the appeal reinstated, which motion was denied by the court, an appeal was taken to this court from each of said orders, and the errors assigned are: "(1) That the court erred in making the order dismissing the appeal, there being no statute authorizing such dismissal, and the organic act expressly gives the right of appeal and a trial de novo in the appellate court; (2) that the court erred in refusing to set aside the order of dismissal, and reinstate the case." The record in this case presents substantially the same questions as were presented to this court March 1, 1890, in the case of Salt Lake City v. Redwine, (Utah,) 23 Pac. Rep. 756, where the learned chief justice ably reviews the same questions presented here, and we see no reason for disturbing that decision. The reasoning in that case is applicable in this. The ground of the order dismissing the appeal in this case, and the refusal of the court to set aside such order of dismissal, and reinstate the case, were matters resting in the sound discretion of the trial court, and the record in the case presents no good reason for reviewing that discretion. The order and decision of the third district court are affirmed, with costs.

DUNSHEE v. GEOGHEGAN.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

In an action for breach of contract to convey land against a vendor, who neither had title at the time he made the contract nor acquired it afterwards, the vendee's damage is the difference between the contract price and the value of the property at the time the conveyance should have been made.

Appeal from district court, third district; C. S. ZANE, Chief Justice.

C. W. Morse and C. W. Boyd, for respondent.

MINER, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, Dunshee, against the appellant, Geoghegan, in the third district court, January 7, 1890, wherein the plaintiff claims that on October 28, 1889, he purchased from the defendant a certain lot of land in Salt Lake City, through defendant's agent, as a real estate dealer; and that a written agreement was entered into, which was duly signed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff, wherein defendant promised and agreed to sell and convey to the plaintiff the whole of said lot, for an agreed consideration of $3,600, $500 of which sum was then paid to the defendant by the plaintiff, and the balance of the purchase price was to be paid January 1, 1890, at which date a full conveyance of the property was agreed to be made by the defendant to the plaintiff; and that on January 1, 1890, the plaintiff tendered to defendant the balance due on said contract of purchase, and demanded a deed in accordance with the terms of the contract, which deed of conveyance was refused, and plaintiff claims damages in the sum of $5,000 in consequence thereof. Defendant admits the due execution of the contract to sell and convey the premises as stated, but denies that he was the owner of the said land at the time of the execution and delivery of the contract, except only an undivided one-third part thereof; that his power to convey the whole of the land was conditional upon the joining of his co-tenants in such deed, which he in good faith believed they would do, all of which facts plaintiff well knew when the contract was made. Defendant tendered judgment for $550 and costs before trial. The case was tried before the court, a jury being waived. On the trial it appeared that the land had appreciated in value, and was worth from $7,000 to $8,500 on January 1, 1890; that plaintiff had duly complied with the terms of his contract, tendering the balance of the money then due, with a deed for execution, etc., and placed himself in position to be entitled to a deed of the whole premises under the terms of the contract. It also appears that the defendant knew he only owned an undivided one-third interest in the land at the time he made the contract of sale, and had no right to bind his co-tenants to his contract, or sell their interest therein; that his co-tenants had refused to join in conveying the land; but it does not appear from the testimony that defendant made any effort to secure the title from them. Plaintiff had reason to know, from the abstract furnished by defendant's agent, that there was a defect in defendant's title before the breach, but relied upon the defendant to perfect it under his contracts and supposed he had full control of the property when he purchased. The contract makes no mention of any interest in the lot being owned by any one aside from the defendant. After plaintiff's tender, and the refusal of the defendant to convey the lot, plaintiff offered to accept a warranty deed from defendant of his one-third interest in the land, and clear up and purchase the title of the other joint owners. The defendant refused to execute any conveyance except a quitclaim deed of his one-third interest. The court below found the value of the property at the time of the conveyance should have been made to be $5,000, an appreciation after the contract of sale of $1,400, and gave plaintiff judgment for this sum and $500, advanced payment, and interest thereon, amounting in all to $1,950.50.

The only question presented by this appeal is the measure of damages to be allowed plaintiff upon the facts proven. It is a fact, from the proofs in the case, that the land had increased in value nearly 50 per cent. after the contract of sale, and before its maturity. A knowledge of these circumstances may have induced the defendant to use no diligence in procuring and perfecting the title, and in refusing to convey the same as he agreed to do. He knew at the time he entered into this contract, and received the $500, cash payment, that he did not own the property he was contracting to sell, and he knew at that time he could not convey the full title without first obtaining that of his co-tenants or inducing them to join in the conveyance. He allowed his agent, or the man making the sale for him, to represent that he controlled the title, thus inducing the buyer to invest his money upon the good faith of his contract, in expectation of receiving the benefits therefrom, and, at the same time, assuming the chance of being a loser by means of the purchase. Had the property depreciated in value defendant would have been entitled to his money on the contract, and had the plaintiff refused to pay as agreed, it is possible he might now be tendering a full conveyance, and demanding damages for the plaintiff's refusal to perform his contract. While there is a diversity of opinion upon this subject, yet the weight of authority supports the doctrine that when a vendor has title, and for any reason refuses to convey it as required by his contract, he should respond in damages in which he should make good to the plaintiff what he has lost by his bargain not being performed; but when a party contracts to sell real estate which he knows at the time he has not the power to sell and convey, and does not own, or if he sells what he owns, in whole or in part, and on account of a rise in value he fraudulently refuses to convey, then, in either case, he should be held to make good to the vendee the loss of his bargain, and it does not excuse the vendor that he may have acted in good faith, and believed when he entered into the contract that he should be able to procure a good title for his purchaser. This rule will give the vendee the difference between the contract price and the value at the time of the purchase, as profits or damages which are the result of the contract. Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat. 109; Mack v. Patchin, 42 N. Y. 175; Pumpelly v. Phelps, 40 N. Y. 59; Sweem v. Steele, 5 Iowa, 352; Allen v. Atkinson, 21 Mich. 351; Baldwin v. Munn, 2 Wend. 399; 2 Suth. Dam. 217; Tracy v. Gunn, 29 Kan. 508. Had this action been brought to recover on a breach of covenant of warranty of title, the claim of the defendant, as measure of damages, may have been sustained, provided the facts warrant it, as in that case the measure of damages might be the consideration paid, and interest. Staats v. Ten Eyck, 3 Caines, 115. There was some conflict of testimony in this case, but the trial court had the opportunity to see the witnesses on the stand, and hear their testimony, and observe their manner of testifying, and was better qualified to judge of the weight to be given the testimony than this court could by reading it. We are satisfied the conclusion reached by the trial court was correct. Judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

CARRIERS—SCALPERS' TICKETS—RIGHT TO COLLECT FARE.

1. Full fare may be collected of a passenger attempting to ride on a scalper's ticket conditioned to be void if presented by any other than the original holder, notwithstanding the passenger purchased it on the assurance of an unauthorized agent of the company that it would be honored.

2. The fact that the ticket was not signed by the original purchaser is of no moment, as by accepting it he was bound by its terms.

3. When the ticket was returned to the passenger, he is not damaged by the conductor's having taken it up.

BLACKBURN, J. Plaintiff purchased of a ticket broker in Salt Lake City, in May, 1889, two tickets to San Diego, Cal., for himself and wife, over the defendant company's road. They rode on them to Promontory, and the conductor refused to honor the tickets, and took them up, and required the plaintiff to pay full fare for himself and wife to their destination, or be put off the train. The plaintiff paid the fare, and this suit is brought to recover damages for this breach of duty as claimed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff recovered judgment below, and the defendant appeals, asserting that it was the duty of the conductor to refuse to honor the tickets and take them up, and compel the plaintiff to pay full fare or leave the train. The tickets were contract tickets, and among others contained this condition: "(3) If not so used, if more than one date is canceled, or if presented by any other person than the original holder, this ticket is void, and the conductor will take up and collect full fare." This class of tickets are usually signed by the purchasers, but these were not. These tickets were sold at Blue Rapids, Kan., by an agent of the Union Pacific Company, and used to Salt Lake City, and there sold to the ticket broker. Before purchasing the tickets the plaintiff went to the ticket office of the Union Pacific Company at Salt Lake City with the ticket broker, and had the following conversation and the following transaction: Saw Mr. Ingalls, who was an employe of the said company, and told him the plaintiff wished to purchase those two tickets. He looked at the tickets, and saw where they were sold and said: "All right. You can sell them, and we will guaranty you will get through all right. We will limit these tickets, and have Mr. Drummond sign them, and will give a letter to Mr. Drummond to the conductors on the Central Pacific Railroad, authorizing them to honor these tickets." Mr. Ingalls gave the letter, and Mr. Drummond signed the tickets and bought them. The letter was signed by Parker per Ingalls, and Parker swears positively he had no authority to sell tickets over the road of defendant company. The letter spoken of was not introduced in evidence, and we cannot tell its contents.

The question is, was it the duty of the defendant to honor these tickets although presented by persons other than the original purchasers? They were through tickets, and were sold for a less price than the local fare; and the purchasers agreed not to sell them, and the tickets stated on their face that they were non-transferable. The purchaser, when he bought these tickets, knew that he had no right to ride part way upon them, and sell them for the rest of the way; and the plaintiff knew, by the terms of the tickets, he had no right to buy them; but, anxious to ride to his destination for less than the regular fare, he considered the matter, and bought on the opinion of a man wholly unauthorized to bind the defendant company. And his suspicions should have been aroused by the conduct of the pretended agent, because, if the tickets were entitled to be honored on their merits, a letter to the conductor was unnecessary, and, if not, the officious letter of the pretended agent would be unavailing, and this ought to have suggested to him that the tickets would be dishonored unless by the influence of this letter the conductors would be induced to neglect their duty. This class of contract tickets is valid, and common carriers are authorized to enforce them. Post v. Railroad Co., 14 Neb. 110, 15 N. W. Rep. 225; Elmore v. Sands, 54 N. Y. 512; Railway Co. v. Chipman, 146 Mass. 107, 14 N. E. Rep. 940; Hill v. Railway Co., 144 Mass. 284, 10 N. E. Rep. 836; Cody v. Railway Co., 4 Sawy. 114.

But it is contended that the ticket agent at Blue Rapids, Kan., sold without requiring the purchaser to sign the contract. We think this makes no difference. He took them at a less price than the regular fare. The terms of the contract are set out in full, and we think, by accepting the tickets without signing, he accepted the terms of the contract, and was bound by them. Railroad Co. v. Read, 37 Ill. 484, 485; Railroad Co. v. McGowan, 28 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 274; Mosher v. Railroad Co., 127 U. S. 391, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1324. The court instructed the jury in opposition to these views, and in that regard his instructions are erroneous. We also think there is no evidence in the record to support the verdict.

But it is claimed that the conductor took up the tickets, and therefore the plaintiff should recover. But he had a right to do that under the contract, and the plaintiff was not damaged, as he had the tickets at the trial, and introduced them in evidence. As this error disposes of this case, we deem it unnecessary to pass upon the other alleged errors. The case is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

QUIBELL v. UNION PAC. RY. CO.

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INJURIES TO SERVANTS.

A laborer employed to load cars at night at defendant's coal chutes, and who has been so employed for several nights, so that he is familiar with the premises, knows the location of the chutes, and is accustomed to operate the cars, cannot recover for injuries occasioned by being caught between a chute and a moving car on which he was standing, on the ground that the company had failed to provide sufficient light, when the lights were sufficient for him to sort the coal by, and at the time of the accident he had his back to the chute, but could have easily seen it if he had looked.

P. L. Williams, for appellant. Kimball & Allison, for respondent.

MINER, J. This is an action by the respondent for damages for personal injuries received while in the employ of the appellant as a laborer at a coal mine, owned and operated by defendant, situated at Almy, in the state of Wyoming; the injury occurring, as alleged, on the 6th day of December, 1887. The respondent was working during the night, and the cause of action is based upon the alleged negligence of the appellant in neglecting to provide sufficient lights where respondent was working to enable him to perform his service safely, and in carelessly erecting and maintaining a screen and chute by which coal was discharged from a high trestle into railway cars, the negligence in that regard, as alleged, existing in the fact that the said screen and chute were so constructed and maintained as to be so near the top of the railway cars that there was not sufficient space for the body of the plaintiff to pass between the top of said cars and said chute. The situation and surroundings of the place were, in brief, that the coal mine was operated by means of an inclined shaft; that cars of coal were drawn up this inclined shaft, and onto the trestle, which was constructed over the railway track of the defendant company; that from this trestle the coal brought up in the cars from the mine was dumped into railroad cars standing on the track below, being poured down over the screen through which the fine coal or slack passed, the larger or lump coal being delivered into the railway cars on one track, and the slack thus screened being caught in the slack chute, and conveyed to other railway cars situated upon another track parallel to the one in which the lump coal was dumped. These screens were constructed of iron or steel rods, and the chute which caught the screenings of iron or steel sheets. These were permanent structures from three to six feet in depth, and firmly placed in position, and from their nature capable of being seen or observed wherever there was sufficient light for the men to proceed about their work. By the testimony on behalf of the respondent, which consisted of his own evidence and that of his fellow-laborer, Joseph Brown, it appeared the respondent and Brown were employed to work during nights; that they began work about the 1st of December, and had worked only five or six nights at the time of the accident. They were working on the outside, either on top of this trestle or in placing railway cars in proper position, underneath the chutes, to be filled with coal and slack; to pick out the rock from among the coal as it was delivered into the cars from these chutes; and to do whatever work was necessary outside of the mine, and in the vicinity of this dump and these chutes. Respondent and Brown were fellow-laborers, and had worked in coal mines before, as shown by their evidence; and in the actual execution of the work assigned them the respondent was engaged chiefly in picking the rock out of the coal as it was delivered into the railway cars, and Brown in removing these cars, as required, along the track for the purpose of loading them. This division of work, however, was one made by these two parties themselves, and merely as a matter of convenience between them, and not by the directions of the company. In the course of this work Brown usually had a lamp with him, which he carried in his hand in moving about from place to place, while the plaintiff did not use a lamp, as, in picking out the lumps of coal, he could not handle it, but was enabled to do his work by a lamp hanging upon the wall or post of the trestle supporting these chutes or mine tracks over which the coal was dumped from above. There were also some fires on the ground for the purpose of giving light in that locality, and they were kept in open grates or fire baskets, 30 to 40 feet from the track. These fires were to be kept up by the workmen themselves, and if they were not made to burn brightly it was because of their own neglect and forgetfulness. This fire-light in question was obstructed in places by the posts or timbers intervening. No one of the company's managers were present on the night of the accident. The respondent testifies that he could not have taken care of a lamp, and could not have used one very well in his business; that the lights provided were adequate to enable him to select the stone from the coal properly in pursuing his business; that he made no complaint on account of the insufficiency of the lights furnished by the company; that the conditions as to light were the same on the night of the accident as they had been on previous nights. Under these circumstances of employment, to do work on all these railway tracks as occasion might require, and with these means of seeing how to proceed with it, on the occasion of the accident he was called by Brown to come and help him lift up and hold an end-gate on the railroad car which Brown was placing under the slack chute on the track along-side of the one on which the respondent was working and taking out rock at the time he was called. This chute was so arranged as to permit the railway car to pass underneath it, and it extended some two feet just over and on the inside of the side of the railway car, leaving from two to three feet on the other side of the box of the car not occupied or taken up or covered by this chute. In response to Brown's request, the respondent went to help him lift up the end-gate on this car, and then Brown went to the brake to let the car down, it being on a slight descent, and while holding up this end-gate, which was frosty, and the car was being so moved, the respondent was caught between the slack chute and the top of the car, his position being so that he was facing in an opposite direction from the chute. He could have seen it if he had looked, but he did not look. Brown had his lamp with him in his hand. When Brown went to attend to the brake he faced away from Quibell, and just as he stopped the end-gate dropped down, and his attention was called to Quibell when he found he was hurt. He heard Quibell cry out, and when he looked round he could see him as his body lay there in the car, and he could also see the chute. There was light enough there to see the whole situation. Quibell held up the gate of the car with his back to the chute, and the movement of the car carried him near to it, and at length caught him between the chute and the top of the car. There was no lack of light to proceed about the work. On the track, parallel and next to it, he was, at the time he was called, selecting rock from the coal by means of light furnished in the usual course of his business. On having his attention called to the accident just as he was stopping the car, Brown looked around at the call of Quibell, and saw where and how he lay in the car; could see the chute, and, from the lamp either that he had himself in his hand or sitting down near him at the time he was attending the brake, or from the other light furnished, he could take in the whole situation. Plaintiff was 43 years old at the time of the accident, and was then receiving $2.25 per day. The result of the accident was the breaking of the left arm above the wrist and below the elbow, which left the arm useless. He had not worked under this particular chute before that day, but had worked above and around them for five days. No one had informed him of the condition of this particular chute. The evidence also discloses that the respondent, when injured, declined to accept the services of a surgeon tendered him by the defendant for the purpose of dressing his wounds, but put himself under the treatment of a man who was a miner, and not in any sense a surgeon or physician. The evidence of Dr. Perkins, who was there and saw him after the injury, is that there was nothing in the nature of the fracture of the respondent's arm that made it probable, taking into consideration his age and physical condition, that he should not have recovered, if not completely, substantially, from the injury; and that the chief damage resulted from the permanent disability which was caused by respondent's negligence in not obtaining proper surgical treatment, and not as a necessary or probable result of the original injury. At the close of the plaintiff's case defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence upon which the jury could render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, which was denied by the court, and the defendant introduced evidence. At the close of the case, and after the charge of the court, the jury brought in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,500.

The appellant assigns the following error as grounds for a new trial, among others, to-wit: Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that it is against the law in this case, in this, to-wit: The errors of law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the defendant, among others is: The court erred in overruling the defendant's motion for a judgment of nonsuit, made at the close of the plaintiff's testimony.

The main question presented in this case is whether there was any evidence of negligence or want of proper care on the part of the defendant in failing to provide materials, machinery, suitable light, and other means by which the plaintiff could perform the work for which he was employed, safe and adequate for his use, and whether the same was kept in order and fit for use, so as not to unnecessarily expose him to danger. Negligence, as I understand it, consists in the want of that reasonable care which would be exercised by a person of ordinary prudence under all the circumstances, in view of the probable danger of injury; and the principles of law involved in the consideration of the questions raised are really those relating to the duty of the defendant towards the plaintiff in the capacity in which he was employed. Those have been so frequently under consideration that a simple statement of them is all that may be required. They require the company to use due care to provide materials, machinery, (and in this case suitable light,) and other means by which the plaintiff was to perform the work for which he was employed, safe and adequate for his use, and to keep them in order and fit for use, so as not to unnecessarily expose him to danger; and, when the company has done this, the plaintiff assumed the risks and danger incident to his employment in the business or work in which he was employed, and the compensation is presumed sufficient to cover the risk. Included in the risks assumed by the plaintiff in this case were those originating from the negligent acts and omissions of his companion, Brown, a fellow-servant in the employ of the company, with whom he was working under the joint directions of both, and without the supervision of a master; and while it was the duty of the company to use reasonable care in all respects, and to furnish its employees suitable and proper light for them to pursue the work assigned to them without incurring danger or injury in coming in contact with objects to be met with in their usual and necessary avocations, and, without which light, danger would be imminent, still, if such sufficient light was not furnished, and injury in consequence occurred to the plaintiff when he had the same or equal means of knowledge with the defendant of such absence of proper light, and did not protest against the negligence now complained of, but continued in the employ of the company and worked without sufficient light, with knowledge, or with the means of knowledge, easily within his reach, which he could obtain by the reasonable exercise of his senses and sight, of the danger, he ought not to recover. It is generally held, and is, I think, the correct doctrine, that it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the injury of which he complains was caused by the negligence of the defendant, and that it did not arise from his own negligence or want of care. He cannot recover if he was negligent, because it cannot be said that defendant's negligence caused an injury which could not have happened but for his own want of care. Lane v. Crombie, 12 Pick. 176.

Where, therefore, from the whole evidence on which the case rests, it appears that the plaintiff was wanting in prudence and care, or that he directly or proximately contributed to cause the injury he received, or that by the use of ordinary care and prudence he could have avoided the injury, the court, it is held, may rightfully instruct the jury, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff could not recover, even though the defendant was guilty of negligence. And while the court should not invade the province of the jury, and pass upon the weight of the evidence, yet, where the jury have made a clear and unquestionable mistake of fact, or where the passion or prejudice of the jury have so clearly controlled their mind as to find a verdict where there is no evidence upon which to base it, the appellate court has the right, and it is its duty, to rectify the wrong done, and to set aside the judgment upon which such erroneous judgment is based, and grant a new trial. Where there is no conflict of evidence whatever upon the questions of fact presented, and such evidence falls short of making a prima facie case for the plaintiff, it is then the duty of the trial court to take the case from the jury. The case, however, should be a clear one to justify the court in exercising this responsibility; but where the necessity exists the court should not shrink from the responsibility. The question of negligence, diligence, or reasonable care is one of mixed law and fact, and seldom exclusively one of fact. Jurors may act upon a question only when there is some evidence tending to prove it. The relevancy and admissibility of evidence, and the tendency to prove diligence or negligence, or whether there be any such evidence, is a question of law to be determined by the court; and where the facts are found or admitted, or where there is no dispute or question as to what the facts are, if they be such that all reasonable men would be likely to draw from them the same inference, or in a case where there is no evidence tending to prove a case of negligence, the question is one of law. Railroad Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274; Fernandes v. Railway Co., 52 Cal. 45; Bowers v. Railroad Co., 4 Utah, 224, 7 Pac. Rep. 251. While there may be some difficulties in the way of this rule in some cases, yet the courts are held and bound judicially to know that absence of due care is not due care, and that no care is not due or reasonable care; that the absence of proof of negligence does not prove negligence. Jurors should act upon the question of diligence, negligence, and reasonable care when there is evidence in the case to prove it. If there be no evidence, there is nothing before them upon which to find negligence, diligence, or care. The question of the relevancy of evidence, and its tendency to prove negligence, diligence, or want of it, and whether there be any evidence, is not a question for the jury, but a question for the court, and it must be decided by the court, and not by the jury. This being the case, we are bound to determine, in the present case, whether there was any evidence in this case to prove negligence on the part of the defendant.

It has been held that if at the time the plaintiff closed his proofs there was no evidence upon the material point upon which the plaintiff had the burden of proof, or if it affirmatively appeared, by his own showing, that he had no cause of action, upon the undisputed testimony introduced by him, the defendant was entitled at that stage of the case to a direction from the court to the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. Equally so, under the same circumstances, was the defendant entitled to such direction after all the evidence was introduced. It is the duty of the judge, when asked to do so, before sending the case to the jury, as a preliminary question of law, to decide whether there is any evidence upon which the jury could properly find a verdict for the party on whom the onus of proof lies; and, if there is not, he ought to withdraw it from the jury. Railroad Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274; Conely v. McDonald, 40 Mich. 158; Carver v. Plank-Road Co., 61 Mich. 584, 23 N. W. Rep. 721. On looking into the evidence, it will be seen that the chute and screens were properly and permanently constructed and entirely suitable for the use for which they were built; that the chute extended about two feet over the side of the car, and was for the purpose of allowing the coal to drop into the car from above, and could in no way interfere with the safety of the plaintiff had he used reasonable care, and looked to see where he was going. Instead of doing so, he turned his back to the chute and the lamp, and was carried onto and under the chute by the moving car being drawn by his companion, which he knew was moving in the direction of the chute for the very purpose of receiving coal into the car from that chute. The defendant was not negligent in so constructing the chute as to be useful and suitable in the business in which it was used. It was a large, stable, and substantial structure, easy to be seen, which was located, as he must have known, on the very track over which the car was passing, and from which the coal was to be emptied into the car. Nor can we find from the evidence a negligent absence of proper light. It was the same light the plaintiff had been in the habit of working by and using for several days without objection or complaint. From it he was able to pick out stone from the coal on this and previous nights. His companion, Brown, could and did see all the surroundings at the time of the accident. The lamp was on a post near by, Brown's lamp was near him, and open grate fires were burning 30 or 40 feet away, left on purpose to light the premises; and it was the duty of these men, including the plaintiff, to keep them burning on this occasion, and if they were allowed to go out it was through the plaintiff's and his co-laborer's negligence. The plaintiff's employment was in, around, and about these chutes; he had been there five days, and long enough to see the surroundings. He could have seen the chute if he had looked, but he did not look. He knew, or is chargeable with knowledge, of the situation of the tracks, the condition of the trestle, the existence of the chutes and screens, and the use they were put to, but on this occasion he forgot to look; he did not think of the chute at that time; did not look in that direction, but was facing away from it, and also from his companion. He was simply absent minded, and did not use his eyes, his recollection, or his reason. He was not using that reasonable care which would be exercised by a reasonable person of ordinary prudence, under all the existing circumstances, and in view of the probable danger. It was an accident resulting from the character of the work in which he was employed, and, if it resulted from anybody's fault, it was from the plaintiff's lack of attention to his surroundings, which must have been known to him at the time, and which he could have avoided by the use of ordinary care. Any other rule in this case would render the defendant an insurer of the lives and safety of its employes. Without considering the other questions involved in the case, our conclusions, from the whole testimony bearing upon the question of negligence, are that there was no evidence showing negligence of the defendant in the case to justify the verdict given for the plaintiff, and that the judgment below should be set aside and a new trial granted, with the costs of this court; the costs in the court below to abide the result.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Feb. 4, 1891.)

LARCENY—EVIDENCE OF ACCESSORY AFTER THE FACT—CORROBORATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Comp. Laws Utah, § 5049, providing that a conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice unless corroborated by other evidence.

dence, does not require that the testimony of an accessory after the fact shall be corroborated, in order to sustain a conviction, since sections 4391 and 4949 make a clear distinction between an accomplice and an accessory after the fact.

2. The mere fact that the hide of a stolen cow is found in defendant's possession is not sufficient to warrant a conviction; but when it is connected with the fact that defendant attempts to conceal it, or to put off a person looking for it, or makes a false pretense in reference to it, the question of guilt is for the jury.

3. Where full and accurate instructions are given, it is not error to reject charges asked, even though they are technically correct.

4. Where the jury are told, in substance, that they are the sole judges of the evidence, and of the credibility of the witnesses, it is sufficient, though the words of Comp. Laws Utah, § 5033, subd. 6, requiring such instructions, are not precisely followed.

Appeal from district court, first district; BLACKBURN, Justice.

MINER, J. The defendants, Chadwick and Whipple, were jointly indicted on the 4th day of March, 1889, charging them with the felonious larceny of a cow about the 15th day of January, 1888. They were tried together, September 26, 1890, and both found guilty by the verdict of a jury, and a motion for a new trial was made and denied. The errors assigned, upon which a reversal of the judgment is asked, are: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) the admission of improper testimony by the court against the defendants' objection; (3) misdirection of the court to the jury as to the possession of the evidences of the crime, as to the testimony of the accomplice, and in failing to charge the jury that they were the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses, of the weight of the evidence, and of the facts, as provided by law. We will consider these questions as they were stated in the defendants' brief.

1. As to the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. On examination of the evidence given in the case, we find there was some evidence of a larceny given before the jury, and facts and circumstances sufficiently shown to justify the court in submitting the case to the jury. Where there is evidence introduced tending to show guilt, this court will not review the weight of the testimony, nor the credit of the witnesses. These are purely questions for the jury. In this connection, however, it is claimed by defendants that without the testimony of one William Green, a witness for the prosecution, there would have been no evidence upon which the jury could convict; and that Green was an accomplice, or at least an accessory after the fact, in the alleged crime, and that therefore his testimony could not be considered testimony, in any respect, except when it was corroborated, as provided by statute. In reviewing this question, it is not necessary to go over the testimony in the case. We are satisfied that if Green had not been used as a witness at all, there was still sufficient testimony to go to the jury upon the question of the defendants' guilt; and, had it been otherwise, the testimony disclosed that

Green was corroborated in most of the important parts of his testimony. But it is not claimed, from any evidence pointed out in the record, that Green was an accomplice, or that he knew of or had any hand or complicity in the alleged larceny at the time or before the offense was committed, or that he aided, abetted, or participated in its commission. He knew of certain facts and circumstances after the time of the alleged larceny that tended to show guilt on the part of the defendants; but it cannot be urged that Green was shown to have had full knowledge of the larceny. This being the case, the most that defendants could claim, and what the defendants claim in their brief, is that Green was an accessory after the fact. If he was an accessory after the fact, under section 4391, Comp. Laws 1888, he could not have been an accomplice, under section 4390. Our statute makes a clear distinction between the two offenses. As an accessory after the fact, he could not be indicted jointly with the principal defendant, nor tried with him, but, if tried at all, he must be tried separately, under sections 4391, 4949, Comp. Laws 1888. Com. v. Wood, 11 Gray, 93; Com. v. Boynton, 116 Mass. 345; Com. v. Drake, 124 Mass. 24; U. S. v. Kershaw, 5 Utah, 618, 19 Pac. Rep. 194. If he was an accessory after the fact, he could not become a partaker of the guilt, as there would be no union of criminal intent and act. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, (3d Ed.) § 692. One who is a principal cannot be an accessory after the fact. A person is an accessory after the fact only after he has full knowledge that a felony has been committed, and then conceals that knowledge from a magistrate, or harbors and protects the person charged or connected therewith. Comp. Laws 1888, § 4391. If, then, Green was not a principal or accomplice in this crime, under section 4390, it was not necessary that his testimony should have been corroborated, under section 5049, in order to give it such weight as would ordinarily attach to it. Nor do we think it was the intention of the legislature to require the testimony of an accessory after the fact to be corroborated, under the provisions of section 5049, before his testimony could be credited without corroboration. People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342; People v. Farrell, 30 Cal. 316; Com. v. Boynton, 116 Mass. 345; Com. v. Blood, 4 Gray, 31; State v. McKean, 36 Iowa, 343; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 382. The court was not required to submit any charge upon that subject to the jury; the question was not in the case. Notwithstanding this, the question as to how far Green was corroborated, and whether he was an accomplice, was left to the jury. The charge was favorable to the defendants, and they cannot complain.

The second assignment of error has reference to the admissibility of evidence introduced by the prosecution. Witness Green had testified that he asked defendant Chadwick for wages one day after the alleged larceny, and Chadwick replied that "he didn't have to pay me;" that he would "turn everything over to his wife." Witness told him, "All right." Chadwick replied, "saying for me to go ahead; that I didn't have none the best of it." Whereupon the people's attorney asked Green the following question: "Question. Do you know what that had reference to?" Objected to by defendant as calling for an opinion of the witness. The objection was overruled by the court, and an exception was taken. The question, as it appears upon the record, was not subject to the objection made. It simply called for an answer, "yes," or "no." But that and another similar question was answered by the witness, detailing the facts; which were proper, in connection with the other testimony in the case.

Error is also assigned upon the refusal of the court to give the jury the following requests: "First. You cannot convict the defendants, or either of them, on this evidence, upon the proofs alone of the possession of the hide by them, however recently after the cow was lost. Second. You cannot convict the defendants, or either of them, upon proof alone that the hide was found on the premises of the defendant, however soon after the cow was lost. Third. In order to warrant a conviction in this case, it would be necessary for you to find further facts indicative of guilt than the mere fact of the property being found on defendant's premises." The court declined to give these requests, but charged the jury as follows: "I am asked to instruct you that the mere possession of stolen goods does not of itself justify the jury in finding the defendant guilty of taking the property, but it is a circumstance for you to consider. As a proposition of law, that, perhaps, is true: it is true, indeed. From the mere fact that one is in possession of stolen property, that stolen property is found with one man, if there is no other circumstance looking towards his guilt the jury would not be justified in finding him guilty. But where there are other circumstances, such as the property being hidden away or concealed, or any effort made to put the party who was looking for the property off his guard, any false pretense in reference to the property, or anything of that kind, it will be matter for the jury to consider as to whether that is evidence of guilt or not." To which exception was taken. While the above instruction was not given in the language of the learned counsel presenting them, yet it embodies the substance of the request, and leaves the question to the jury as a circumstance for them to consider, and to say whether, under all the facts and circumstances shown, possession of stolen property was evidence of guilt or not; and at the same time the court instructed the jury that possession alone is not sufficient evidence upon which to convict. These instructions were given with reference to the proofs before them at the time, which the jury must have understood and applied with reference to such facts of possession as were shown; and, while the instruction was not as full and explicit as it might have been, yet it sufficiently covered the question presented. We think the proper rule in such case is that recent and exclusive possession of the fruits of crime, after its commission, is usually some evidence of guilty possession; and if unexplained, either by direct evidence or attending circumstances, or by the character and habits of life of the possessor, or otherwise, may, in some cases, be taken as prima facie evidence of guilt. But this presumption weakens as the period of time between the theft and the possession increases, and may scarcely arise at all if others besides the accused have had equal access with himself to the place where the goods were found; for the real criminal may have placed the property where it was found, or sold it so that it came innocently into the possession of the defendant. If, however, the fact of such possession stands alone, and wholly unconnected with any other fact or circumstance, the presumption will be slight; therefore it is not considered safe to convict on this fact of possession alone without other attending circumstances indicative of guilt. But where the recent possession of stolen property is accompanied with the prisoner's denial of possession; his refusal to explain his possession; his giving incredible, false, or contradictory accounts of the manner of acquiring it; his attempting to conceal it, or to destroy marks upon it; his fleeing on being accused, or being near the place where the property was stolen,—such and other like circumstances, when shown, might raise a strong presumption of guilt in the possessor. No rule can be laid down that will apply to all cases alike, but all the circumstances should be shown to, and the weight of the evidence left for, the jury, under the instructions of the court. 2 Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 746, 747; Gablick v. People, 40 Mich. 292; People v. Walker, 38 Mich. 156; People v. Ah Ki, 20 Cal. 178. Where the charge of the court, as a whole, covered the questions embraced in the request to charge, so as to fairly submit them to the jury, and leave the question for them to pass upon, it is not error to refuse the request to charge, though technically good in law. In such cases the court is not bound to use the language of the counsel, but may use his own. This has uniformly been the practice in this territory, and is sustained by the federal court. Railroad Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291; Cunningham v. Railway Co., 4 Utah, 206, 7 Pac. Rep. 795; U. S. v. Musser, 4 Utah, 153, 7 Pac. Rep. 889; People v. Olsen, 4 Utah, 413, 11 Pac. Rep. 577; People v. Hampton, 4 Utah, 258, 9 Pac. Rep. 508; Clampitt v. Kerr, 1 Utah, 247; Laber v. Cooper, 7 Wall. 565.

Objection is made that the court did not instruct the jury as required by section 5033, Comp. Laws 1888, subd. 6, that they were the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses, of the weight of the evidence, and of the facts. The court instructed the jury as follows: "You are the judges of the evidence, its force and credibility; that where there is a conflict in testimony, where the witnesses swear against each other, it is your duty to reconcile that testimony, if you can; if not, it is your province to decide which is telling the truth, and which is not. In determining these questions, you must exercise your judgment,—that kind of judgment which influences you in the ordinary affairs of life; your experience; your observation. Take into consideration the bearing of the witnesses on the stand, their interest in the controversy, their feelings towards the parties, and all that. These things you are to consider," etc. And, while the exact words of the statute were not used, yet the jury must have understood from them that they were the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses, of the weight of the evidence, and of the facts. All these questions were left to them; and, while it is the better rule to give such instructions in the language of the statute, yet it is not obligatory to do so, where the language used is clearly within the plain intent and meaning of the statute. No specific exception was taken to the charge as given, nor was the court then requested to amplify it in any way. Had the attention of the court been directed to the omission, it would doubtless have supplied it. Griffiths v. Clift, 4 Utah, 462, 11 Pac. Rep. 609; People v. Boggs, 20 Cal. 432. Upon the whole record we find no error. The judgment and conviction in the court below are affirmed.

ZANE, C. J., and ANDERSON, J., concur.

PERRY v. CITY COUNCIL OF SALT LAKE CITY.<sup>1</sup>

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—LICENSE — DISCRETION IN GRANTING.

Under 1 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 1755, subd. 40, providing that the council of Salt Lake City shall have power "to license, regulate, and tax" the sale of intoxicating liquors, it is competent for the council in its discretion to refuse a license notwithstanding the applicant has complied with the ordinance in respect to the petition, bond, etc., and no previous ordinance has specified the persons to whom, nor places where, licenses may be granted. MINER, J., dissenting.

Application for mandamus.

W. H. Dickson and O. W. Powers, for plaintiff. Sam'l A. Merritt and C. S. Varian, for defendant.

ZANE, C. J. This is an application by the plaintiff for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the council of Salt Lake City to grant him a license to retail intoxicating liquors. In a verified petition, he shows a compliance in all respects with the express requirements of the statutes and the ordinances in making his application for the license. To the alternative writ the defendant makes its return, verified by George M. Scott, its mayor, and signed by Samuel A. Merritt, its attorney, and Charles S. Varian, associate counsel. On the return the defendant states the following facts, and relies upon them as a sufficient reason for not granting the license: That the city had issued a theater license to Charles F. Reynolds & Co., with the express understanding that no intoxicating liquors should be retailed in the building, and that the plaintiff, as is believed, in collusion with that company is endeavoring to obtain the license to sell liquors in a room in its basement; that the building is situated on Franklin avenue, a narrow street; that this street, and the block through which it extends, is occupied almost exclusively by residences; that about 20 rods from the theater are a public school and a house for religious worship, and 15 or 20 rods from them is another church; that there is one saloon in the avenue opposite the theater, believed to be sufficient to supply all reasonable demands there; that the performances in the theater are of the variety class, and are attended almost exclusively by males; that the plaintiff, without license and contrary to law, sold liquor in the room on two nights after the first refusal to issue the license; and that on the night of the 14th inst. a ring fight was permitted in the theater. In conclusion the defendant claims that it acted within its discretion in refusing to grant the license, and that the sole purpose of its members in doing so was a desire to preserve public order, and the morals and happiness of the people of the neighborhood. In view of the foregoing facts, ought the court to grant the peremptory mandate? If the refusal to grant the license was not within the discretion of the council, the writ should issue; but, if it was, then it ought not.

The power of the city council with respect to the subject is found in volume 1, Comp. Laws Utah, 1888. Section 1755 is as follows: "The city council shall have the following powers: (40) To license, regulate, and tax the manufacturing, selling, giving away, or disposing of in any manner, any * * * intoxicating liquors." The section also provides that the term of the license shall not extend beyond the municipal year in which it is issued, and it is subject to the restrictions of the general laws of the territory, and a bond is required, and the sale to minors, idiots, habitual drunkards, or persons intoxicated, is prohibited. Section 4518, vol. 2, same compilation, forbids the selling or furnishing of intoxicating liquors to any person in the auditorium or lobbies of any theater, etc. The power to license, regulate, and tax the sale or disposition of intoxicating liquors within its limits is possessed by Salt Lake City except so far as it is regulated by the above provisions. The council of Salt Lake City, under the power to license, regulate, and tax, has by ordinance required a petition by the applicant to be presented, in which the place of business and some other minor facts are required to be stated, and also a bond in the sum of $1,000, with sureties and conditions as provided. The license is required to be limited to three months, and for a retail business $300 is charged. The sale without license, and the sale to Indians, insane, or idiotic persons, or to minors, and the sale on Sunday, is forbidden and punished; and it is also provided that the mayor may by proclamation forbid the sale or disposition of such liquors on election days and legal holidays.

The question now comes, has the council any further discretion with respect to granting such licenses? Under its power to regulate, has it any discretion as to the person to whom licenses shall be granted, as to the place of business, or as to the number of licenses to be granted? The legislature could have prohibited the traffic, but it did not do so. However, it did give the city council the power to license, regulate, and tax it. The power is conferred on a deliberative body, and its authority with respect to the subject is not limited to mere ministerial duties. The power of the legislature was unlimited with respect to the business, and all of it except the power to prohibit, subject to a few restrictions named, was conferred by the charter upon the local legislature; and the will of such a body is expressed by a vote, and with the right to vote upon any question is implied the discretion to vote for or against. The business of retailing liquors may be regulated in various ways. To regulate is to control, restrict, and direct. To regulate the liquor traffic according to the purpose for which the power was granted would be to so govern it that it will be attended with good order, and, so far as may be, be consistent with the happiness and welfare of the people in the communities in which it is conducted.

In Packing, etc., Co. v. City of Chicago, 88 Ill. 221, the court said: "We are clearly of opinion that the power to require a license is one of the means of regulating the exercise or pursuit of this business. There is, no doubt, a great variety of other means that might be adopted to accomplish the purpose, but these municipalities are not restricted as to the means they shall employ to regulate the business. In the various illustrations of the meaning of the word 'regulate,' we find, among others, 'to direct,' 'to rule,' 'to govern,' 'to conduct.' As the language is used in reference to the power of a city or village government, we must suppose it was intended to mean that such bodies might rule or govern this character of business." The general rule is that public corporations and officers are required to do what they are authorized to, when such performance would be beneficial to an individual or to the public. Upon the subject of imperative and discretionary powers, Judge Dillon says: "It is often material to determine whether a duty imposed by law or charter upon municipal corporations or public officers is imperative or discretionary. This is always a question of legislative intention, and therefore of construction. The general tests to ascertain this intention, propounded in the cases are of doubtful value. * * * Each case, we repeat, must be largely decided on its own circumstances, and the legislative intent gathered from the whole act. No positive, inflexible, or stereotyped rule can be laid down." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 98.

It is apparent from the act under consideration that the intention of the legislature in conferring on the council the power to regulate the sale of liquor was to enable that body to protect society from the evils attending it. The benefit of the dealer was not the chief end. Therefore the duty of the council with respect to him must depend largely on the good of the neighborhood. It follows that it is the duty as well as the right of the council to use all reasonable means to give such protection as the public welfare demands. We are of the opinion that the council, in the regulation of the business, has a wide discretion, but it is not arbitrary discretion. Under the power to regulate, the business may not be prohibited. The authority is delegated to the councilmen as reasonable men, and with the expectation that they will employ reasonable means. To intrust the privilege of selling intoxicating liquors to persons whose antecedents, habits, and characters are such as to inspire confidence in them, and warrant the belief that they would not violate the law by selling to minors, habitual drunkards, or intoxicated persons, and would be likely to conduct their business in other respects with due regard to good morals and the peace and happiness of society, would appear to be within that discretion included in the right to regulate. The exercise of a reasonable discretion as to the localities in which the business shall be carried on would appear to be within the power to regulate. A saloon along-side of a school-house or a church would be very undesirable, and to establish one along-side of a man's home would be regarded as very objectionable. To authorize the retailing of liquors in the midst of the homes of the people would be palpably wrong. Neighborhoods infested with liquor saloons are not suitable communities for boys and girls to grow up in; and so a limitation of the number of places for retailing intoxicating liquors in a city would be a reasonable regulation. Because the council may be authorized to license liquor sellers it does not follow that they must license all who may apply. The powers delegated to the legislative departments of municipal governments are usually exercised by ordinance. The council grants the license by a vote. In that way the power is expressed. When the application is made, it would appear to be a suitable time to inquire and decide as to whether the applicant is a suitable man to be intrusted with the business; and so as to the determination of the place, and as to whether more licenses should be granted. General tests might be established by ordinance, by which to determine the fitness of persons to be intrusted with the business of selling liquor, and ordinances might be adopted designating localities in which the business may be conducted, and limiting the number. But we are not prepared to say that the business may not be regulated in such respects without ordinance. The charter confers the power to regulate the traffic upon the city, without expressly requiring it to be exercised by ordinance. But it is said that the councilmen may act from mere whims, caprice, partiality, or prejudice unless the regulation is by ordinance. The court should assume that public officers will act from proper motives until the contrary appears. It is also claimed that the court must presume that the council acted arbitrarily or without sufficient reason in refusing the license, because no reason appears upon its record. The court will not assume that the council refused the license arbitrarily, and without sufficient reason, without some proof. Being public officers, and acting under the sanction of an oath, the court will assume that they acted lawfully until the contrary appears.

We have been referred to a decision of the supreme court of the United States involving the validity of an ordinance of the city of San Francisco, in which this language is found: "The sale of such liquors in this way has therefore been at all times, by the courts of every state, considered as the proper subject of legislative regulation. Not only may a license be exacted from the keeper of the saloon before a glass of his liquors can be thus disposed of, but restrictions may be imposed as to the class of persons to whom, * * * and the hours of the day, and the days of the week, on which the saloons may be opened. Their sale in that form may be absolutely prohibited. It is a question of public expediency and public morality. * * * There is no inherent right in a citizen to thus sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of the state, or of a citizen of the United States. As it is a business attended with danger to the community, it may, as already said, be entirely prohibited, or be permitted under such conditions as will limit to the utmost its evils. The manner and extent of regulation rests in the discretion of the governing authority. That authority may vest in such officers as it may deem proper the power of passing upon applications for permission to carry it on, and to issue license for that purpose." Crowley v. Christensen, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13.

The case of State v. Holt Co. Court, 39 Mo. 521, was an application for a writ of mandate to compel the county court to issue a license. The statute provided that, if the court shall be of the opinion that the applicant is a person of good character, the court may grant a license for six months. This fact was admitted. The application was made in conformity with the requirements in all respects of the statute governing licenses, and the county court refused to grant the license. The mandamus was refused; the court holding that, although a party applying for a dram-shop license may show himself to possess all the qualifications requisite for the issuing of a license under the statute, the county court may still, in the exercise of its discretion, refuse to grant such license. Muller v. Commissioners, 89 N. C. 172, was an application for mandamus. The statute involved in the case provided that the applicant might obtain a license from the county commissioners to retail liquor upon proving a good moral character. The court held that such commissioners were not bound to license an applicant though he be qualified by proof of good moral character; that they had a limited legal discretion, and, in passing upon an application, they have a right to take into consideration the question whether the demands of the public require an increase of such accommodations, and whether the place proposed to establish a bar-room at would be a suitable one. To the same effect is Attorney General v. Justices of Guilford County, 5 Ired. 315; Petition of Raudenbusch, 120 Pa. St. 328, 14 Atl. Rep. 148; Schlaudecker v. Marshall, 72 Pa. St. 200;

Trotter's Appeal, 90 Pa. St. 376. The statutes providing for licenses construed in these cases differ in some respects from the Utah statute; but the principles laid down in them are similar in effect to the North Carolina cases, supra. Parker v. Portland, 54 Mich. 308, 20 N. W. Rep. 55, was a petition for mandamus to compel the board of trustees of the village of Portland to approve a liquor bond. The power to regulate the business had not been granted by the legislature to the board. Their simple duty was to determine the sufficiency of the bond. The discretion only extended to that duty. The court held that mandamus to compel a village board to approve a liquor bond will be denied if there is nothing to show that the refusal to approve it was capricious, or to rebut the presumption that the board had fairly passed upon all the questions which determine the sufficiency of the bond, and the reliability of the sureties. Potter v. Village of Homer, 59 Mich. 8, 26 N. W. Rep. 208, and Amperse v. City of Kalamazoo, (Mich.) 26 N. W. Rep. 222, are also mandamus cases involving a construction of the same law as the last case. In Potter v. Village of Homer, the court held that the village council in approving the bond had the same discretion and no more than is possessed by other persons called on to approve sureties. We do not regard the Michigan cases as analogous to the one in hand. The plaintiff also relies upon Zanone v. Mound City, 103 Ill. 552. The court held that the village council, under the power to regulate the liquor traffic, might refuse to license persons of such habits and character as rendered them unfit to be licensed, and to limit the number of dram-shop keepers, but held that the discretion should be exercised by ordinance in order to avoid favoritism and monopoly. From this opinion three of the seven judges dissented.

After a careful consideration of the statutes, the ordinances, and the cases cited, we hold that the defendant possesses the power to license, regulate, and tax the liquor business, and that in the use of such authority it may exercise a reasonable discretion in determining who are suitable persons to intrust the business to, the places where it may be conducted, and the number of licenses it will issue, and that the council may exercise that discretion when the application is made, when it has not done so by ordinance before, and that the court will not assume that the council acted arbitrarily, or from any improper motive, without some evidence to that effect. The writ of mandamus is denied.

ROCK SPRINGS COAL CO. v. SALT LAKE

PLEADING—ANSWER—SUFFICIENCY OF DENIAL.

Plaintiff, by verified complaint, alleged that between November 9, 1889, and February 6, 1890, he sold and delivered to defendant coal of the "kinds and amounts specified, to-wit: 88,700 pounds of lump coal; 218,500 pounds of slack coal in wagon-load lots; 256,600 pounds of slack coal in car-load lots," etc. Defendant averred, on information and belief, "that it is not true that plaintiff, between said dates, sold and delivered to defendant 88,700 pounds of lump coal," etc.; and therefore he denies, in the same words, plaintiff's allegations. Held, that this was a negative pregnant, and not a good denial, under Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 8226, providing that the answer must contain a general or specific denial of the material allegations of the complaint, and, if the complaint be verified, "the denial of each allegation controverted must be specific and be made positively."

C. F. LOOFBOUROW, for appellant. E. B. CRITCHLOW, for respondent.

MINER, J. On April 3, 1890, the plaintiff filed in the third district court in Utah its complaint, alleging: "(1) The corporate capacity of both plaintiff and defendant. * * * (3) That between the 9th day of November, 1889, and the 6th day of February, 1890, the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant * * * coal of the kinds and in the amounts specified, as follows, to-wit: 88,700 pounds of lump coal; 218,500 pounds of slack coal in wagon-load lots; 256,600 pounds of slack coal in car-load lots. That defendant agreed to pay for the same as follows, to-wit, * * * $788.05." That payment has been demanded. That no part thereof has been paid, and the whole remains due; and praying judgment for $788.05, with interest and costs. The defendant filed its answer: (1) Admitting that it is a corporation. (2) Denying that the plaintiff is a corporation. (3) Further answering, the defendant avers, on information and belief, that it is not true that plaintiff, between the 9th day of November, 1889, and the 6th day of February, 1890, sold and delivered to defendant 88,700 pounds of lump coal, or that plaintiff between said dates sold and delivered to defendant 218,500 pounds of slack coal in wagon-load lots; and defendant therefore denies that between the 9th day of November, 1889, and the 6th day of February, 1890, or at any other time, the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant 88,700 pounds of lump coal, and denies that between said dates, or at any other time, plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant 218,500 pounds of slack coal in wagon-load lots. Also alleges payment of $88.20 on account of claim sued upon." The cause was tried before the court, a jury being waived. At the commencement of the trial, and before the production of any evidence, the plaintiff made an oral motion and request for judgment upon the pleadings on account of the alleged insufficiency of the defendant's answer to put in issue any of the allegations of the complaint. Whereupon the court ruled and held, upon said oral motion and request of plaintiff, that the answer of the defendant was not sufficient to put in issue any allegation of the complaint, except that of the corporate capacity of the plaintiff, and gave defendant permission to amend its answer so as to deny each allegation in the complaint, and defendant refused to avail itself of this privilege. And the court thereupon, and upon said trial, took all the other allegations of the complaint as confessed by the defendant, and made its findings of fact, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for $802.40, and costs taxed at $33.35. The defendant alleges error on the above ruling, and appeals to this court from an order denying a motion for a new trial on such alleged error.

It will be observed that in the answer it is averred, on information and belief, "that it is not true that plaintiff, between the dates named, sold and delivered to the defendant 88,700 pounds of lump coal," but it is nowhere denied that some other kind of coal, or some amount of lump or other coal, was sold and delivered to the defendant; and the attempted specific denial, that plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant 218,500 pounds of slack coal in wagon-load lots, is not a denial that 218,500 pounds, or any less number of pounds, of coal was not sold and delivered to defendant, nor that 218,500 pounds of coal was not delivered defendant in cars or carts or by hand, or in some other way than by wagon-load lots; nor is any attempt made to deny it sold and delivered defendant 256,600 pounds of slack coal in car-load lots or otherwise. It does not appear by the answer that defendant did not receive the stated amount of coal from the plaintiff, or that it was not indebted to the plaintiff therefor. What the answer does say is simply this: "I received from the plaintiff within the time stated, the amount of coal he has charged me with, for which I agreed to pay him the price named in the complaint, but it was not delivered to me in wagon-load lots; and I am still indebted to the plaintiff therefor in the sum claimed in the complaint, less $80.20, which I have paid plaintiff on the claim sued upon prior to the commencement of this suit." In other words, defendant admits the allegations in the complaint to be true, and that he is indebted to the plaintiff for the coal as claimed.

Section 3226 of the Compiled Laws of Utah of 1888 provides that the answer of defendant shall contain a general or specific denial of the material allegations of the complaint controverted by the defendant; and if the complaint be verified, as in this case, "the denial of each allegation controverted must be specific, and be made positively," etc. Counsel for the defendant relies on Mahana v. Blunt, 20 Iowa, 142; Doolittle v. Greene, 32 Iowa, 123; Bank v. Hogan, 47 Mo. 472; Ellis v. Railroad Co., 55 Mo. 278; and Wall v. Water-Works Co., 18 N. Y. 119. I am aware that, under the statutes and decisions of Iowa and Missouri, slight innovations have been made upon this rule, but the general weight of authority sustains it. In 18 N. Y. 119, cited by defendant's counsel, the court holds the pleading open to criticism, and justifies its decision only under the statutes of that state recently amended. Upon the general doctrine, see Steph. Pl. 381. Woodworth v. Knowlton, 22 Cal. 164; Bradbury v. Cronise, 46 Cal. 287; Bliss, Code Pl. § 332; Boone, Code Pl. § 61. It has been held that an answer in terms merely denying "each and every material allegation in the complaint" is evasive, and not good pleading. And, generally speaking, a denial in the precise language of the complaint is not good, but is a "negative pregnant," with an admission that the alleged facts may have transpired on some other day or under different circumstances. Robbins v. Lincoln, 12 Wis. 9; Miller v. Brumbaugh, 7 Kan. 343; Seward v. Miller, 6 How. Pr. 312. So, in an action of trespass for assault and battery, the defendant justified, alleging that, "as master of a ship, he commanded the plaintiff to do service which he refused to do, whereupon the defendant moderately chastised him." The plaintiff traversed with a denial "that the defendant moderately chastised him," and this traverse was held to be a "negative pregnant," or as being such a form of negative expression as may be implied to carry with it an affirmative. Steph. Pl. p. 378. A denial that A. and B. and C. and D. were present on a certain occasion is no denial that B. was present; or that A. and B. were present; and so as to either. A denial that A. went to Washington, and to Boston and to Chicago, and returned from Chicago to New York, is not a denial that A. went to Boston or to Chicago. Young v. Catlett, 6 Duer, 437; Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 639; Kubland v. Sedgwick, 17 Cal. 123; Caulfield v. Sanders, Id. 569; Landers v. Bolton, 26 Cal. 393. And, where there are no conjunctive averments, a denial in the very words of the averment is often held to admit a material part of it. Woodworth v. Knowlton, 22 Cal. 164; Bradbury v. Cronise, 46 Cal. 287. So, also, a denial that the defendant "wrongfully and unlawfully entered upon the premises, and closed the window," is an admission that he closed the window therein. Larney v. Mooney, 50 Cal. 610. A denial of the exact value alleged in the complaint is an admission of any less value. Scovill v. Barney, 4 Or. 288. A denial that the defendant wrongfully took and detained the plaintiff's goods is not a denial of the taking or detention. Moser v. Jenkins, 5 Or. 448. So a denial in the language of the petition, that the defendant carelessly, negligently, and wantonly ran over the plaintiff's mare is not a denial of the injury complained of. Harden v. Railroad Co., 4 Neb. 521; Bliss, Code Pl. § 332. The trial court was more than liberal with the defendant in allowing it to amend its pleading during the trial, and after the question was raised, without terms. The defendant should have accepted the privilege. I think no issue was raised by the answer, and judgment for the plaintiff was properly entered on the pleadings. The judgment below should be affirmed, with costs.

COSTS ON APPEAL—TRANSCRIPT.

1. Under 2 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 8099, providing that the party ordering a transcript of the testimony or proceedings must pay the reporter's fees, an appellant who gets the judgment reversed cannot collect the costs of such transcript ordered by him, from the appellees.

2. Under the rules of the supreme court allowing reasonable costs for printing the record and briefs, not more than one dollar per page should be allowed.

3. No attorney's fee for trying the case in the supreme court is recoverable as costs.

Appeal from district court, first district; BLACKBURN, Justice.

Arthur Brown and J. G. Sutherland, for appellants. David Evans, Geo. Sutherland, and S. R. Thurman, for respondents.

ANDERSON, J. This cause was tried in the district court, and plaintiffs recovered a verdict and judgment against the defendants. An appeal was taken to this court, and the cause was reversed and remanded and a new trial ordered. After the case was sent back to the lower court, the defendants filed therein their bill of costs incurred on said appeal, containing, among other items, the following, viz.: Paid stenographer, for making transcript of evidence below, $226; printing record, 161 pages, $2.10, $338.10; printing brief, 14 pages, $15; attorney fee, $20. On motion of plaintiffs' counsel the court struck out and disallowed the amount paid the stenographer for transcribing the evidence, and the item for attorney fee, and all in excess of one dollar per page for printing the record and brief, to which ruling and order of the court the defendants excepted, and bring this appeal.

The statute provides that, "in cases where a transcript has been ordered by the court, the fees for transcription must be paid by the respective parties to the action or proceeding, in equal proportions, or by such of them, and in such proportions, as the court, in its discretion, may order." 2 Comp. Laws 1888, § 3099. It is further provided that "the party ordering the reporter to transcribe any portion of the testimony or proceedings must pay the fees of the reporter therefor." Id. The transcript having been ordered and paid for by the appellants, they are not entitled, under the provisions of the section of the statute above referred to, to recover the amount from the appellees. This is the construction placed on a similar statute in a recent case by the supreme court of California. Barkly v. Copeland, ante, 3. While costs are recoverable for printing abstracts and briefs in accordance with the rules of this court, only usual and reasonable expenses therefor, not exceeding one dollar per page, should be allowed by the court, and there was no error in disallowing so much of this charge as was in excess of one dollar per page. As to the item charged as "attorney fee," we know of no law authorizing its allowance for trials in this court on appeal. Section 824 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizes the allowance of an attorney fee of $20 on a trial before a jury, in civil or criminal causes, or before referees, or on a final hearing in equity or admiralty, except that in cases of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction, where the libellant recovers less than $50, the docket fee of his proctor shall be but $10. We think the statute contemplates only the trial in the nisi prius courts, and even then it has been held that it can be allowed but once, although there may be several trials, and must be allowed only in the trial which results in the final disposition of the case. Strafer v. Carr, 6 Fed. Rep. 466; Cleaver v. Insurance Co., 40 Fed. Rep. 863. The decision of the court on the appeal was not a final disposition of the case, it being reversed and a new trial ordered. We find no error in the record, and the order of the district court is affirmed.

ELLISON v. LINDFORD.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TAXATION—AGRICULTURAL LAND.

Farming land situated within the corporate limits of a city, but entirely without the platted and settled portions thereof, cannot be taxed for municipal purposes when the owner will derive no benefit from the expenditure of the taxes either by the extension of the platted limits or of streets or other improvements in that direction.

Appeal from district court, third district; ZANE, Justice.

J. L. Rawlins, for appellant. Arthur Brown and Sutherland & Judd, for respondent.

ANDERSON, J. The defendant, as tax collector of the city of Kaysville, levied upon and sold a wagon belonging to plaintiff for unpaid municipal taxes levied by said city upon his property. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant to recover damages for the taking and selling said property, upon the ground that the taxes were illegal, for the reason that the property on which the taxes were levied was not liable to taxation for city purposes, being situated outside the platted and settled portions of the city, and so remote therefrom as to receive no benefit from the expenditure of the taxes for municipal purposes. The defendant by his answer admitted the seizure and sale of the plaintiff's property as alleged, but claimed that the taxes for which it was taken were legal. The cause was tried to the court without a jury upon an agreed statement of facts. The court held the tax invalid, and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $50, and costs, and the defendant brings this appeal from said judgment. From a plat of the city showing its corporate limits, the platted and settled portion thereof, and the location of plaintiff's premises,—which plat is made a part of the record,—and from the agreed statement of facts, it appears that the property of plaintiff, on which the taxes were levied, and on which he resides, consists of three tracts of land used for farming purposes, and a store, and all within the corporate limits of the city. One tract is situated a little over half a mile from the nearest part of the platted portion of the city. The second tract is situated about one mile, and the third tract about two miles, from the platted portion of the city, while the store is situated about two miles away, at a little place called "Layton," on a county road leading to the city proper, and also on the line of the Utah Central Railroad. This so-called "city" is only a small village, containing about 600 inhabitants in the platted portion thereof, and yet its corporate limits include more than 23 square miles. It is not shown that the platted and settled portion, or what may be termed the "city proper," is likely to be extended in the direction of plaintiff's premises, nor that any streets, drive-ways, or other improvements in that direction are contemplated or at all probable; nor is it shown that plaintiff will or can derive any benefit from the expenditure of these taxes, except in that general sort of way in which it may be said that all persons residing in the country are benefited by good streets, sidewalks, etc., in the town or city where they usually go to transact their business. But this kind of benefit is too slight to make it equitable or just that their property situated in the country should be taxed for city purposes. The questions involved in this case were fully considered and elaborated by this court in the case of Territory v. Daniels, (Utah,) 22 Pac. Rep. 159. That case involved the validity of a tax on agricultural lands for city purposes, and the tax was declared void. In that case ZANE, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said that "taxation for city purposes should be within the bounds indicated by its buildings or streets or alleys or other public improvements, and contiguous or adjacent districts, so situated as to authorize a reasonable expectation that they will be benefited by the improvements of the city or protected by its police; that no outside districts should be included when it is apparent and palpable that the benefits of the city to it will be only such as will be received by other districts not included, such as will be common to all neighboring communities." We see no reason to doubt the correctness of that decision, and, as it is decisive of the point involved in this case, the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

EX POST FACTO LAW—TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE—POWERS.

1. Under Organic Act Okla. T. § 6, providing that the legislative power of the territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the laws and constitution of the United States, it is competent for the legislature to continue in force, after the adjournment of the first legislature, the Criminal Code of Nebraska, extended to the territory by the organic act, § 11, until the adjournment of the first session of the legislature.

2. Act 1st Assem. Okla. T. § 1, continuing in force the Criminal Code of Nebraska, which, by the organic act, was extended to that territory till the adjournment of the first session of the legislature, is valid, and not ex post facto, as to offenses already committed, but not prosecuted and punished.

Habeas corpus.

Chas. Brown and C. B. Freeman, for the Territory.

GREEN, C. J. This is a petition in this court for a writ of habeas corpus. The writ was issued, directed to the sheriff of Logan county, who brought the body of the petitioner into court, together with the cause of his caption and detention. It appears from the petition and return, that the petitioner was indicted by the grand jury of Logan county, at the September term, 1890, of the district court, for the crime of incest and rape upon the person of his daughter, Della Larkins, and that he was taken upon a capias issued upon that indictment, and, in default of bail, was committed to the common jail to await his trial. The ground upon which his discharge from imprisonment is asked is that the indictment is for an offense against the Criminal Code of the state of Nebraska, which was extended to, and put in force in, the territory of Oklahoma, by the organic act, until after the adjournment of the first session of the legislative assembly of said territory, which occurred at the close of the 24th day of December, 1890, and, inasmuch as the law creating the offense has expired, there can be no trial, conviction, and judgment upon the indictment; and that the legislative assembly had no power to continue the law in force as to crimes already committed against it and prosecutions pending therefor. Before the adjournment of the first session of the legislative assembly, an act was passed and approved, which provides, inter alia, as follows: "Section 1. That as to all offenses committed in this territory, against the laws of Nebraska, while in force in this territory, said laws so offended against shall continue in force until the apprehension and prosecution, and until the punishment and penalty is [are] imposed upon such offenders. Sec. 2. That, as to all offenses mentioned in the preceding section in which prosecutions are now pending, the laws of criminal procedure of the state of Nebraska, now and heretofore in force in this territory, shall continue in force for the purpose of prosecuting such offenses, but for no other purpose. Sec. 3. That as to all offenses mentioned in section 1 of this act, where prosecutions have not yet been commenced, such offenses shall be prosecuted under the procedure in force in this territory after the adjournment of the first session of the legislative assembly." The last section of the act provides that it shall take effect, and be in force, from and after the adjournment of the first session of the legislative assembly. Section 11 of the organic act, which extends to, and puts in force in, the territory of Oklahoma, the Criminal Code of the state of Nebraska, so far as necessary to be stated, has the following provisions: "That the following chapters and provisions of the Compiled Laws of the state of Nebraska, in force November first, eighteen hundred and eighty-nine, in so far as they are locally applicable, and not in conflict with the laws of the United States, or with this act, are hereby extended to, and put in force in, the territory of Oklahoma, until after the adjournment of the first session of said legislative assembly of said territory." But no saving clause or provision is made in the organic act as to crimes committed and prosecutions pending at and before the adjournment of the first session of the legislative assembly. It is very clear upon principle and authority that if the act of the legislative assembly, continuing in force the Criminal Code of Nebraska, as to all crimes committed and prosecutions pending under it, has no validity to accomplish what was proposed by it, the petitioner cannot be further prosecuted for the crime charged against him in the indictment, and should be discharged from his imprisonment. Sir Matthew Hale, in his history of the Pleas of the Crown, states the rule of the common law that when an offense is made treason or felony by an act of parliament, and then the act is repealed, the offense committed before such repeal, and the proceedings thereupon, are discharged by such repeal, and cannot be proceeded on after such repeal, unless a special clause in the act of repeal is made, enabling such proceedings, after the repeal, for offenses committed before the repeal. 1 P. C. p. 291. The law, as stated by this learned author, has been steadily adhered in England and in this country, and has been held and applied in innumerable cases, a few only of which it is necessary to cite. In the cases of Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch, 281, and The Rachel v. U. S., 6 Cranch, 329, judgment of forfeiture upon proceedings in admiralty had been pronounced in the court of original jurisdiction, before the repeal of the statutes which gave the forfeiture, and both judgments were reversed, on account of such repeal, by the supreme court. In the first case, Chief Justice MARSHALL said: "After the expiration or repeal of a law, no penalty can be enforced, nor punishment inflicted, for violations of the law committed while it was in force, unless some special provision be made for that purpose by statute." The result of all the authorities is briefly and clearly stated by Mr. Bishop: "If the common or statutory law, which authorizes a prosecution and conviction for any offense, is repealed or expired before final judgment, the court can go no further with the case, even after verdict rendered against the prisoner; or, after he has pleaded guilty, sentence cannot be pronounced, and he must be discharged. The same result follows if there is a judgment which has been vacated by an appeal or writ of review, but, after final judgment, a repeal of the law will not arrest the execution of the sentence." St. Crimes, p. 165, c. 20.

It is earnestly contended by counsel for the petitioner that the legislative assembly had no power to continue in force the Criminal Code of Nebraska, and that the act by which it is attempted to be done is an ex post facto law, and forbidden by the constitution of the United States. By section 6 of the organic act it is provided "that the legislative power of the territory shall be extended to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States." This delegation of power is very ample, and there is no provision of the constitution, and no law of the United States, with which the act of the legislative assembly is not entirely consistent, unless it is obnoxious to the objection of being an ex post facto law. Surely the continuing in force of the criminal law offended against, until the offender is convicted and the penalty of the law enforced, is a "rightful subject" of legislation within the meaning of the organic act. It is urged, however, that inasmuch as the Criminal Code of Nebraska was extended to and put in force in the territory of Oklahoma, until after the adjournment of the first session of the legislative assembly, by act of congress, it cannot be continued in force by an act of the legislative assembly of the territory; in other words, that only the power which created the laws could continue them in force. It was intended by congress that the laws of Nebraska should constitute a territorial code, as distinguished from the laws of the United States in force in the territory of Oklahoma, and that they should sustain the same relation to the courts, and to the people of the territory, and to the legislative assembly, as a code of laws enacted by the legislative assembly, and no reason is perceived why the legislative assembly might not have continued in force all the laws of Nebraska that were extended to, and put in force in, the territory by the organic act; and, if the legislative assembly had the power to continue these laws as a whole, it had the power to continue them in force as to all crimes committed and criminal prosecutions pending under them.

It is also objected to this act that it is an independent act, and that a saving clause can only be made in the repealing statute itself. That the saving clause is usually found in the repealing act may be admitted, but that it must be found there cannot be conceded. In most of the states of the Union, a saving of rights and prosecutions under a repealed statute is effected by a general law, and no provision is made in the repealing act at all, but the repealing act and general law are construed together. The case at bar does not, however, involve the question of a saving clause in a repealing statute; it is the expiration of a statute by its own limitation; and, if continued in force at all as to crimes committed and prosecutions pending, it could only be done by an independent act, and so we understand the language of Chief Justice MARSHALL quoted from Yeaton v. U. S., ubi supra. The act of the legislature took effect eo instanti the Criminal Code of Nebraska would have expired, and continued in force as to all crimes committed and prosecutions pending, so that the continuity was not broken, and there has been no moment of time, as to such crimes and prosecutions, when it can be said that it has not been in force.

The only remaining objection to the act of the legislative assembly is that it is an "ex post facto law," within the meaning of the constitution of the United States. This objection to the act is wholly without force. It in no manner changes the punishment to be inflicted upon the petitioner in the event of his conviction, nor does it, in the least, change the mode of trial, but the proceedings are to be conducted to conviction and judgment under the provisions of the law against which the alleged crime was committed. In Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87-138, Chief Justice MARSHALL defined an ex post facto law to be one which rendered an act punishable "in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed;" and Chancellor Kent expressed his approval of this definition, which he says is distinguished for its comprehensive brevity and precision. 1 Kent, Comm. p. 409. In Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, Judge CHASE stated his apprehension of what is meant by an ex post facto law. He said such laws were—"First, any law which makes an act done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; second, any law which aggravates a crime and makes it greater than it was when committed; third, any law which changes the punishment and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed; fourth, any law which alters the legal rules of evidence." No valid objection is perceived to the act of the legislative assembly continuing in force the Criminal Code of Nebraska as to all crimes committed and prosecutions pending, and the discharge of the petitioner from his imprisonment is denied, and he will be committed to the common jail of the county to await his trial on the indictment. Discharge denied. The other judges concur.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 3, 1891.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—FORECLOSURE—COMPLAINT—STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

1. Where, in an action to foreclose a lien for materials furnished the contractors, the complaint fails to state the contract price between the owner and the contractors, or the reasonable value of the work, but only that after the owner had notice that plaintiff was furnishing the materials there became due to the contractors an amount in excess of the sum due plaintiff, an objection to its insufficiency must be taken by demurrer or answer, and cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 1183, 1184, providing that in certain cases material-men may give notice to the owner of the amount and value of the materials to be furnished, and that the owner must reserve a sufficient amount due or to become due the contractor to answer such claim, a complaint to foreclose a lien for materials furnished is sufficient when it avers that due notice was given the owner of the amount and value of the materials to be furnished the contractors.

3. Where the complaint states the general character of the materials furnished, and their price, and then avers that plaintiff gave the owner written notice of the agreement to furnish the materials "as aforesaid," the notice given is sufficient, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1184, requiring that it state the amount and value of the materials.

4. A claim of lien stating that defendant is the owner of a described lot, that he contracted with named persons to build a house thereon, that plaintiff furnished materials under a contract with the contractors, and gave due notice to the owner, wherefore it claimed the benefit of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to liens on property, is sufficient.

5. It is not necessary in a lien foreclosure suit that there be a personal judgment against the contractors who are personally liable for the materials.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

L. L. Boone, for appellant. Reinhoehl & Harrison, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff, a corporation, brought this action to foreclose a lien for materials furnished for, and used in, the erection of a building on land owned by defendant Garrettson. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 17th day of February, 1888, defendant Garrettson entered into a contract with defendants Wanberg & Nelson, whereby they agreed to erect and finish for him a building on a certain described piece of land; that on various occasions between the 22d day of February and the 20th day of May, 1888, the plaintiff, at the instance and request of the contractors, furnished materials, viz., lumber, laths, shingles, and windows, to be used, and which were actually used, in the erection and construction of the building specified in the contract; that the market value of the materials so furnished, and the amount agreed to be paid therefor, is the sum of $1,112.56, of which sum $300 has been paid, and the balance of $812.56 is still due, owing, and unpaid to the claimant; that on the 23d day of February, 1888, the plaintiff duly gave to Garrettson a written notice that it had agreed to furnish the materials as aforesaid for the erection of said building, and thereafter there became and was due and owing from him to the contractors, on account of the contract, an amount largely in excess of the balance so due and unpaid to plaintiff, and sufficient to answer its claim, including costs and attorney's fees; that Garrettson is now, and during all the time herein specified was, the owner of the lot of land on which the building was erected, and all thereof is necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building; that on or about the 20th day of June, 1888, the building was completed, and thereafter, on the 13th day of July following, plaintiff, for the purpose of securing and perfecting a lien for the moneys so due upon the building and land described, under the provisions of chapter 2, tit. 4, pt. 3, Code Civil Proc., filed for record, in the recorder's office of the county in which the property was situated, its claim of lien, which was duly verified, and three days later duly recorded, and a copy of which, marked "Exhibit A," was attached to and made a part of the complaint. Defendant Garrettson demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, "for the reason that the instrument set forth in said complaint as 'Exhibit A,' and purporting to be a notice of claim filed for record in the recorder's office, does not comply with the statute in such cases made and provided, inasmuch as there are no words or clauses contained therein which set out a claim of lien on certain property to be charged therewith, and the statement of demand is entirely wanting;" and also on the ground that the complaint was ambiguous, uncertain, and unintelligible, "for the reason that it appears upon the complaint that the contract therein was for an amount exceeding one thousand dollars from the sum of money therein set forth, and from the fact that Wanberg & Nelson are made party defendants; but it does not state whether there was a written contract filed in accordance with law, or set out said contract in the complaint as the best evidence." The demurrer was overruled, and he then answered. The case was tried, and judgment rendered foreclosing the lien, as prayed for. From that judgment Garrettson alone appeals, without any statement or bill of exceptions.

It is argued for appellant that the complaint was insufficient, because there was no averment as to what was the contract price between the owner and contractors, or that there was any express agreement to pay anything, or as to what was the reasonable value of the work to be done; and hence, it is said, there was nothing to show that any sum ever became due under the contract from the owner to the contractors. It is true that neither the contract price nor the reasonable value of the work was specifically set forth in the complaint; and the averment that, after the plaintiff gave Garrettson written notice that it had agreed to furnish the materials, there became and was due and owing from him to the contractors, on account of the contract, an amount in excess of the balance due and unpaid to the plaintiff, was a statement of conclusions of law rather than of facts. And, of course, this statement, if tested by demurrer, would have been insufficient. It was, however, not so tested nor was it in any way traversed by the answer. The point seems to be made here for the first time. Under such circumstances, we think the complaint should be held sufficient in this regard.

In this connection it is suggested that if Garrettson agreed to pay a price for the erection of his building, and the amount exceeded $1,000, the contract was void, unless properly recorded; and if the amount was less than $1,000, he was not required to reserve 25 per centum thereof for 35 days after the building was completed, but could pay the price at any time and in any way agreed on by the parties. And it is said, for aught that appears in the complaint, the price may have been fully paid before the work commenced, or may have been a prior indebtedness. But the statute, after providing that if the contract price exceeds $1,000, the contract, or a memorandum thereof, must be recorded or otherwise be wholly void, goes on to say: "And in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to be done and furnished at the special instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." Section 1183, Code Civil Proc. And the next section (section 1184, Id.) has this provision: "Any of the persons mentioned in section 1183, except the contractor, may at any time give to the reputed owner a written notice that they have performed labor and furnished materials, or both, to the contractor, or other person acting by authority of the reputed owner, or that they have agreed to do so, stating in general terms the kind of labor and materials, and the name of the person to or for whom the same was done or furnished, or both, and the amount and value, as near as may be, of that already done or furnished, or both, and of the whole agreed to be done or furnished, or both. * * * Upon such notice being given, it shall be the duty of the person who contracted with the contractor to, and he shall, withhold from his contractor, or from any other person acting under such reputed owner, and to whom by said notice the said labor or materials, or both, have been furnished, or agreed to be furnished, sufficient money due, or that may become due, to such contractor, or other person, to answer such claim, and any lien that may be filed therefor for record under this chapter, including counsel fees not exceeding one hundred dollars in each case, besides reasonable costs provided for in this chapter." Under these provisions, whether the contract was recorded or not, if proper notice was given, and if sufficient money was then due, or afterwards became due, from the owner to the contractors to pay the plaintiff's claim,—and that sufficient did become due is not denied or questioned,—it was the duty of the owner to withhold the same from the contractors, and the plaintiff is now entitled to have his claim of lien therefor enforced.

But it is urged that it does not appear what were the contents of the notice given by the plaintiff to the owner, and that it should therefore be held insufficient to meet the requirements of section 1184 of the Code. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff furnished the materials to be used in the construction of the building, stating in general terms the kind of materials, at the instance and request of the contractors, naming them, and that the amount agreed to be paid for all thereof was $1,112.56. It is then alleged that the plaintiff gave to the owner of the property a written notice that it had agreed to furnish the materials as aforesaid, etc. The words "as aforesaid" evidently referred to the materials and the persons to whom they were furnished, and the value thereof as before stated, and hence we think the notice must be held sufficient.

It is also objected that the complaint must allege that a claim of lien has been verified and filed, containing certain statements, and that the complaint is insufficient in this respect. It was alleged that a claim of lien was verified and filed, and a copy thereof was attached to and made a part of the complaint, and whether it contained the required statements or not was shown by the lien itself. It is further objected that the claim of lien is defective, in that it does not purport to charge the property, nor state the name of the owner of the building, nor state to whom the materials were furnished, nor the terms of the contract. A substantial compliance with the statute is all that is required. Tredinnick v. Mining Co., 72 Cal. 78, 13 Pac. Rep. 152. The claim of lien states that Garrettson was the owner of of a lot of land, which is described, and that he entered into a contract with Wanberg & Nelson by which they agreed to erect and finish for him a building on the lot, and that the building was completed at a time named; that the plaintiff furnished the materials under a contract with Wanberg & Nelson, by which they agreed to pay the market value thereof at date of delivery in cash, and the whole value and balance unpaid are stated; and that the plaintiff, on a day named, duly gave a written notice to Garrettson that he had agreed to furnish the materials as aforesaid; wherefore it claimed the benefit of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to liens of mechanics on real property. The above seems to be a sufficient statement that Garrettson was the owner of the building which was erected for him on his land, and that the materials were furnished to Wanberg & Nelson, his contractors. To say that the name of the owner of the building, and the names of the persons to whom the materials were furnished, are matters of mere inference, since it does not necessarily follow that the owner of the land is the owner of the building, and the materials might have been furnished to a subcontractor or other persons, seems to us to be not even a plausible argument. So the terms of the contract, we think, were sufficiently stated. See Hills v. Ohlig, 63 Cal. 104, and Jewell v. McKay, 82 Cal. 144, 23 Pac. Rep. 139. And the demand that the plaintiff have the benefit of the law relating to liens was a sufficient statement that it claimed a lien on the described lot of land, with the building thereon. It is objected that there is a variance between the contract set out in the complaint and that set out in the claim of lien. We see no material variance. The contract, as set out in both papers, seems to be substantially the same.

It is also objected that the findings of the court are insufficient to support the judgment. This is rested upon the tenth finding, which reads as follows: "That on the 13th day of July, 1888, plaintiff, for the purpose of securing and perfecting a lien for the money so due it as aforesaid upon the land and premises and building aforesaid, hereinafter described, pursuant to the provisions of chapter 2, tit. 4, pt. 3, Code Civil Proc. Cal., filed for record in the office of the recorder of San Diego county, Cal., where said premises are situated, its claim therefor, duly verified in its behalf by its manager, S. S. Johnson, and that said claim of lien is in due form, and was filed in due time, and is a valid subsisting claim of lien under the law." We think the finding sufficient.

Lastly, it is said that there is no judgment against the parties personally liable, and that such judgment is necessary to support the lien. We know of no law or decision supporting this position. The case of Phelps v. Mining Co., 49 Cal. 336, cited in support of it, only holds that the material-man, in an action to enforce a lien, was not entitled to a personal judgment against the owner. We find no material error in the record, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed, and the court below is directed, upon the filing of the remittitur therein, to allow the plaintiff, as a part of the costs upon this appeal, a reasonable fee for the services of its attorneys in this court.

DREW v. PEDLAR et al. (No. 13,758.)

CONTRACT TO CONVEY LAND—FORFEITURE—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—DEMAND.

1. Defendant sold plaintiff land: terms, $1,000 cash, $7,500 in 60 days, balance on mortgage; time to be of the essence: defendant to be released from the contract if plaintiff failed to comply with the terms, and all money paid to be liquidated damages for non-fulfillment. Plaintiff failed to make the payment in 60 days, and, defendant having about a year thereafter refused to accept a tender of the amount and to execute a deed, plaintiff brought suit for the $1,000, and defendant answered, admitting the contract; the payment of the $1,000; alleging his performance of the contract, and plaintiff's abandonment thereof, and failure to make payments when due; but admitting plaintiff's subsequent tender and demand of a deed. Defendant also alleged that, on plaintiff's failure to perform his covenants, he treated the $1,000 as forfeited, and the contract as abandoned by plaintiff, and that he converted it to his own use. The answer also alleged that, between the time of plaintiff's failure to make his payment and his subsequent tender, the property increased in value $2,000. Held, that under Civil Code Cal. §§ 1670, 1671, providing that a stipulation fixing damages in case of breach of contract shall be void except where, from the nature of the case, it is impracticable to determine the actual damages; and section 3307, providing that the damages for breach of contract to purchase real estate shall be the excess of the amount due on the contract over the value of the land,—plaintiff was entitled to judgment on the pleadings.

2. Defendant, having elected to rescind the contract, was bound to return the money, and no demand therefor was necessary before suit.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

R. B. Terry and C. W. Thomas, for appellants. J. R. Webb and F. H. Short, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On the 20th day of April, 1888, the parties to this action entered into a written agreement whereby the defendants agreed to sell, and the plaintiff to purchase, three lots of land in the town of Fresno, at the price of $12,500, to be paid as follows: One thousand dollars upon the execution of the agreement; $7,500 within 60 days from the date of the agreement; and to assume and pay a mortgage of $4,000 to Robert B. Thompson; and also to pay the interest on the mortgage, and all taxes thereafter to become due on the land. The agreement also contains the following provision: "In the event of the failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said party of the second part, the parties of the first part shall be released from all obligation, in law or equity, to convey said property, and said party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto, and all money paid thereon shall be as liquidated damages for the non-fulfillment hereof by the party of the second part. And the said parties of the first part, on receiving such payments at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agree to execute and deliver to the said party of the second part, or to his assigns, a good and sufficient deed conveying the said land free and clear of all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the said parties of the first part, except as above specified. And it is understood that the stipulations aforesaid are to apply to, and to bind, the heirs, executors, and administrators and assigns of the respective parties, and that time is of the essence of this contract." The plaintiff paid $1,000 upon the execution of the agreement, but failed to pay the $7,500 when the same became due, and never offered to pay the same, or any part thereof, until the 24th day of April, 1889, (about 10 months after maturity,) when he tendered full payment, and demanded a deed for the land. The defendants then refused to accept payment or to execute a deed, and also refused to refund to plaintiff the $1,000 paid by him upon the execution of the agreement, and elected to rescind the agreement. Thereupon the plaintiff commenced this action to recover the $1,000 paid by him upon the execution of the agreement, formally alleging in his complaint the facts above stated. The defendants filed an amended answer, in which they expressly admit the execution of the contract and the payment of $1,000, as alleged in the complaint; but allege that they have performed their part of the contract, and that plaintiff failed and refused to pay the $7,500, or any part thereof, when the same became due, and that he abandoned the contract. They admit, however, that plaintiff made the tender of payment and demand for a deed on April 24, 1889, as alleged in the complaint. They further "allege that, on the failure of plaintiff to perform his said covenants, they treated the $1,000 heretofore paid as forfeited, and said contract as abandoned by the plaintiff, and annulled, and that they converted the said $1,000 to their own use." They further allege that "the said property had greatly increased in value between June 20, 1888, and April 24, 1889; that said increase was of the value of $2,000." They "deny that they are indebted to plaintiff in any sum, or that plaintiff has sustained any damage by reason of any act of defendants, or either of them." To this answer the defendants added a cross-complaint, in which they set out the agreement; allege the payment of the $1,000; the performance thereof on their part; the failure and refusal of the plaintiff to perform on his part, except as to the payment of the $1,000; "that defendants are the owners and in possession of the land described in said contract; that said contract is a cloud upon defendants' title to said land;" and praying that the contract be declared void and of no effect, and that it be canceled, and for such further relief as they may be entitled to.

Upon due notice, plaintiff's counsel moved for judgment on the pleadings. At the time appointed, counsel for the respective parties appeared, and plaintiff's counsel argued the motion, and it was submitted on briefs to be thereafter filed, but defendants' counsel failed to file any brief. Some time after the expiration of the time agreed upon and allowed for filing briefs, to-wit, on October 12, 1889, the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff for $1,000, and interest thereon from April 24, 1889, and costs. Thereafter, upon due notice, defendants' counsel moved the court to set aside the judgment on the grounds (1) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that no written findings of fact were filed or made; (3) that material allegations of the complaint were denied; (4) that no answer was made to the cross-complaint; (5) that the answer stated new matter constituting a defense to the action. At the same time defendants' counsel made another motion to vacate the judgment on the ground "that said judgment was made and entered against defendants through their mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect." This motion was made on affidavits, in connection with which they proffered a draft of a second amended answer which they proposed to file in case the judgment should be set aside. The following are the affidavits upon which the motion was made: "R. B. Terry, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is now, and at all times since the defendants have appeared in this action has been, their attorney in said matter; that when the motion heretofore made by plaintiff for judgment upon the pleadings herein was ordered submitted by the court upon brief thereafter to be filed by counsel for plaintiff, and briefs of defendants in reply thereto, affiant, upon receiving the briefs of counsel for plaintiff, was unable to find in the city of Fresno the authorities upon which his answer to said brief would be made and that upon an examination of said authorities at hand affiant determined that, in order that the case should be fully determined upon its merits, that he would ask leave of the court to file a second amended answer; that, so intending, he did not answer such brief. R. B. TERRY." "A. J. Pedlar, being first duly sworn, deposes and says, that he is one of the defendants in the above-entitled action; that the judgment herein entered on the 12th day of October, 1889, was entered through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, and was shown in the affidavit of R. B. Terry, filed herewith. Affiant further says that he has fully and fairly stated the case in this action to his said counsel, R. B. Terry, who resides in the county of Fresno, state of California, and after such statement is advised by said R. B. Terry that he has a good and substantial defense on the merits of the action, and thoroughly believes the same to be true. A. J. PEDLAR." The proffered amended answer contained two averments in addition to the first amended answer, to the effect (1) that defendants had tendered to plaintiff a sufficient deed for the lots on the 20th day of June, 1888, and at the same time demanded payment of the sum of $7,500, which, by the terms of the agreement, the plaintiff was to pay "on or before sixty days from the date" of the agreement, but that plaintiff then refused to pay said sum, or any part thereof, and thereby released the defendants from all obligations under said agreement, and thereby also released all claim to the $1,000 theretofore paid by him; and (2) that between April 20, 1888, and April 24, 1889, certain taxes and assessments, amounting to $114.65, were levied upon said lots, and became due and payable, and that plaintiff never paid nor tendered them, or any part thereof, and that defendants were compelled to pay a street assessment of $45. The proffered answer also contained the following, which was not in the first amended answer: "Defendants deny that they, or either of them, elected to rescind said contract of sale in complaint mentioned, or that they did rescind the same; but, on the contrary, allege that plaintiff rescinded said contract, and every portion thereof, long prior to the 24th day of April, 1889." The court denied the motions to set aside the judgment; and the defendants appeal from the judgment, and also from the order denying their motion, upon the judgment roll containing their bill of exceptions.

1. I think there was no error in rendering judgment on the pleadings. It clearly appears that the contract was rescinded long before the commencement of the action, and that it was so considered by both parties. Time was of the essence of the contract. Plaintiff failed to pay the $7,500 on or before June 20, 1888, according to the agreement, and did not tender payment thereof until April 24, 1889, when the defendants refused to accept it and execute a deed, on the ground that plaintiff had abandoned and annulled the contract by failing to tender payment within the stipulated time,—60 days. They say in their answer that, upon the failure of plaintiff to pay according to the terms of the contract, they treated the contract as abandoned and annulled by plaintiff, and the $1,000 paid as forfeited; and they do not deny the averment in the complaint that they "elected to rescind said contract of sale." From the time defendants refused to accept payment and execute a deed, (April 24, 1889,) the plaintiff has considered the contract rescinded, and bases his action partly upon that ground; his complaint stating facts from which a rescission is a necessary inference. Under these circumstances the plaintiff was entitled to recover the $1,000 paid by him, less such actual damages as may have been sustained by the defendants by plaintiff's breach of the contract, (Grey v. Tabbs, 43 Cal. 364; Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280;) but such damages cannot be recouped in this action, for the reason that none such have been pleaded, (Id.) Counsel for appellants contend, however, that his clients are entitled, under the express stipulation of the contract, to retain the $1,000 paid as liquidated damages, whereas respondent's counsel claim that the stipulation as to liquidated damages is void. This is the principal issue presented for decision. I think the stipulation is void, under the following sections of the Civil Code: "Sec. 1670. Every contract by which the amount of damages to be paid, or other compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation, is determined in anticipation thereof, is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in the next section. Sec. 1671. The parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damage sustained by a breach thereof, when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage." It appears from the nature of the contract under consideration that it would not be impracticable, or at all difficult, to fix the actual damage in this case, since section 3307 of the Civil Code provides a rule by which the damage in all cases of this kind may be measured and definitely fixed, as follows: "The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to purchase an estate in real property is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the amount which would have been due to the seller, under the contract, over the value of the property to him;" that is, the excess of the agreed price over the value of the property to the party who agreed to sell. In Field on Damages (section 508) the rule is stated as follows: "The general rule of damages on failure of the vendee to take the property purchased, and pay for the same, would be the actual loss sustained by the vendor thereby; which would ordinarily be the difference between the actual contract price and the actual value of the land at the time of the breach, if the property shall have declined in value." See, also, Eva v. McMahon, 77 Cal. 467, 19 Pac. Rep. 872. The defendants not only failed to plead any damages to them, but alleged in their answer an increase of $2,000 in the value of the property between the default of the plaintiff and their refusal to accept payment and execute a deed; and it does not appear that plaintiff ever had possession of the property, but does appear that defendants were in possession at the time they answered, and they can claim nothing for use and occupation. No material averment of the complaint was denied. The denial of indebtedness was but a conclusion of law inconsistent with the admitted facts. The defendants were not entitled to any affirmative relief upon their cross-complaint, which they have not obtained by the judgment on the pleadings. Both the complaint and answer admitted that the agreement had been rescinded and annulled by the parties; and, as the judgment on the pleadings partly rests upon that fact, it is conclusive evidence of the fact. The agreement was not recorded, and, not being acknowledged, was not entitled to record. Besides, the cross-complaint does not offer to refund the money, or any part thereof, admitted to have been received by the defendants under the contract. Bohall v. Diller, 41 Cal. 533. It is alleged that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, in that no demand is alleged. The action is to recover money had and received by defendants to the use of the plaintiff; and it is alleged the defendants "refused, and still refuse, to pay to plaintiff said sum of one thousand dollars, or any part thereof." The answer admits the receipt of the money, and alleges that defendants "converted the said $1,000 to their own use." From the time the defendants elected to rescind the contract, or to consider and treat it as rescinded, it was their duty to refund the money they had received under the contract, and no demand before suit was necessary. Quimby v. Lyon, 63 Cal. 394.

2. It does not appear that there was any error or abuse of the discretion of the court in overruling the defendants' motions to set aside the judgment, and counsel for appellants has not urged this point here. The averment in the proffered answer that defendants tendered to plaintiff a deed of the 20th day of June, 1888, and demanded payment, etc., only shows that plaintiff was first in default. It does not change or dispute the fact that both parties considered and treated the contract as rescinded, as above stated; and, had it been inserted in the answer on which the judgment was rendered, the plaintiff would still have been entitled to judgment on the pleadings. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

BIDWELL V. BABCOCK. (No. 13,695.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1891.)

CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—PLEADING.

1. Const. Cal. art. 12, § 8, provides that a stockholder of a corporation shall be personally liable for such proportion of all its debts contracted while he was a stockholder as the amount of shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock. In an action to recover thereunder against a stockholder, plaintiff averred that between certain dates he sold to the corporation certain goods; that the total number of shares of stock thereof was 2,500; that 2,170 shares "were subscribed for, issued to, and owned by, various parties who were the owners of said stock" during said time; and that during that time defendant owned 972 shares, "and is indebted to plaintiff herein in the sum of $384.91," etc. Held, that the complaint was insufficient, since it failed to show that the 2,170 shares were all the shares subscribed at the time the debt was incurred, and consequently for what proportion of the debt defendant was liable.

2. Defects in the second and third causes of action in a complaint cannot be supplied by the statements in the first cause of action, in the absence of references thereto.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Hunsaker & Britt, for appellant. Alex. G. Watson and W. J. Walker, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant was sued as a stockholder of a corporation—the San Diego Street-Car Company—under section 322 of the Civil Code, to recover his proportionate part of certain alleged indebtedness of the corporation. His demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and, upon his failure to answer, judgment was rendered against him by default. This appeal is from the judgment, on the judgment roll, and the overruling of the demurrer is assigned as error. The complaint embraces three causes of action: (1) Indebtedness of the corporation for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff "during the time" between December 6, 1888, and January 23, 1889; (2) indebtedness of the corporation to H. L. Shaug, for goods sold and delivered by him, during the same time, assigned to the plaintiff; and (3) indebtedness of the corporation to Morris and Breadlove for goods sold and delivered by them, during the same time, assigned to plaintiff. The indebtedness of the corporation, alleged in the three causes of action, amounts to $858.72. After properly stating the organization of the corporation, its existence during the time within which the indebtedness was incurred, and that its whole capital stock consisted of 2,500 shares of the par value of $100 per share, the complaint proceeds as follows: "(4) That a large number of shares of said stock, to-wit, twenty-one hundred and seventy, were subscribed for, issued to, and owned by, the various parties who were the owners of said stock, as hereinafter specified, during the time between the 6th day of December, 1888, and the 23d day of January, A. D. 1889, both days inclusive, between which dates the debts hereinafter set forth were incurred." Then, after alleging the indebtedness of the corporation as above indicated, comes the ninth paragraph, as follows: "(9) That during the time mentioned in paragraph 4 of this complaint, to-wit, between December 6, 1888, and January 23, 1889, the defendant, E. S. Babcock, Jr., was the owner of, to-wit, 972 shares of the capital stock of said San Diego Street-Car Company, and is indebted to plaintiff herein in the sum of, to-wit, $384.91, under section 322 of the Civil Code of California, and other laws of the state of California; that said sum has been demanded of defendant, but he has refused to pay the same, or any part thereof." The allegations as to the organization and existence of the corporation, the amount of its whole capital stock, and in regard to the portion thereof subscribed, and the portion thereof owned by the defendant, are made only in connection with the first cause of action. None of them are repeated or referred to in connection with the second or third cause of action, as alleged in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the complaint.

The grounds of the demurrer are stated as follows. "(1) That the said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) That the said complaint is uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible, in this: that it does not appear therefrom what number of shares of the capital stock of the San Diego Street-Car Company had been subscribed for at the time of the creation of the alleged indebtedness mentioned in said complaint; nor does it show what proportion the amount of stock and shares of stock alleged to be owned by the defendant bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock of the San Diego Street-Car Company; nor does it show what proportion the stock of the defendant bore to the whole subscribed stock of said company at the time of the creation of such alleged indebtedness; nor does the said complaint show what proportionate part of each of the several sums of indebtedness of the San Diego Street-Car Company shown in said complaint is the liability of the defendant. Second. Defendant also demurs to that portion of said complaint contained in the paragraph thereof numbered 7, upon the ground that the same attempts to set forth a separate cause of action against this defendant, and that the same does not state facts sufficient for that purpose. Third. On the same grounds stated in the above specification of demurrer No. 2, the defendant demurs to that part of the plaintiff's complaint contained in the paragraph thereof numbered 8."

The constitution of 1879 (article 12, § 3) provides: "Each stockholder of a corporation * * * shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred, during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation." Section 322 of the Civil Code, as construed by this court, has substantially the same meaning and effect as the above quotation from the constitution.

1. It is essential, to the statement of a cause of action under this provision of the Code and constitution, that the complaint state the proportion which the stock, owned by the defendant at the time the debt sued for was incurred, bears to the whole subscribed stock at the same time, or that it state facts from which such proportion can be deduced. But the complaint in this case states neither the proportion, nor facts from which it may be deduced. In this case, the required proportion cannot be ascertained, by any process, without a knowledge of the whole number of shares of "the subscribed capital stock" existing immediately before and at the time each debt sued for was contracted or incurred. This knowledge, however, is not communicated by the complaint. To affirm, as in the fourth paragraph of the complaint, that 2,170 shares "were subscribed for, issued to, and owned by the various parties who were the owners of said stock during" a specified period of 49 days, within which the debts were contracted, is no limitation upon the number of shares subscribed for and owned during a portion of that period within which the debts, or some of them, may have been incurred; since the debts may have been incurred at different points of time within that period, and all may have been incurred on the last day of the period. Nor, indeed, does the averment limit the number of subscribed shares owned prior to and during the entire period specified. It is perfectly consistent with an averment that all the capital stock of the corporation (2,500 shares) was subscribed and owned by various persons prior to the specified period; and also consistent with an averment that the remainder of the stock (330 shares) was subscribed and owned on the third day of the period, and thence until the close of the period. Therefore, for aught that is alleged in the complaint, 2,500 shares may have been subscribed for prior to the period specified, and certainly that 330 shares, in addition to the 2,170, may have been subscribed within that period and prior to the creation of the debts sued for. The averment relates only to subscribed stock that existed during the whole period of 49 consecutive days. It neither affirms nor denies, expressly or by implication, that an additional number of shares of subscribed stock existed during the last 40 days of that period; yet, according to paragraphs of the complaint numbered 5, 7, and 8, all the debts sued for may have been incurred within the last 40 days of that period. The complaint should have averred, in substance, if the fact was so, that there were 2,170 shares of subscribed stock, and no more, at the time each debt was incurred.

2. The second and third counts are defective, in that they fail to state the existence of the corporation, the amount of its capital stock, the portion thereof subscribed, or the portion of the subscribed stock owned by defendant, or to refer to the statement of these facts in the first count. The defects in the second and third counts are not supplied by statements in the first count, in the absence of any reference to them in the second and third. Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 262; Barlow v. Burns, 40 Cal. 351. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instruction to sustain the demurrer.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE—NOTE DUE ON DEFAULT IN INTEREST—TAXES—COUNSEL FEE—PLEADING.

1. Where a note secured by mortgage declares that, on failure to pay the annual interest when due, the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder, demand after default is not necessary to support an action for the entire sum. Bringing the suit to foreclose is sufficient demand. Following Whitaker v. Webb, 44 Cal. 127.

2. A delay of three months after default in the interest is not a waiver of the right to exercise the option, when the delay is caused by reason of defendant's request to be allowed a few days additional in which to pay the interest.

3. A mortgage, given to secure a contemporaneous note bearing 12½ per cent. interest, provided that "all payments made by the mortgagee for taxes and assessments on said premises, excepting taxes on the interest of the mortgagee therein," might be included in the decree of foreclosure. The mortgagee signed a separate agreement to credit the mortgagor with 2½ per cent. interest on the note if the latter presented receipts showing that he had paid "all taxes against the property covered by the mortgage." Held, that this was not an agreement by the mortgagor to pay taxes on the money loaned, nor could parol evidence be given that such was the intention, for the purpose of avoiding the entire interest, under Const. Cal. art. 13, § 5, declaring any contract by which a debtor agrees to pay taxes on the money loaned shall be void as to any interest specified therein.

4. The note provided that, if suit was commenced to enforce its payment, the maker would pay 5 per cent. on the principal as an attorney's fee, and the mortgage provided for the payment of "a reasonable counsel fee" upon foreclosure. The complaint alleged "that the sum of $300 is a reasonable attorney's fee or counsel fee for the foreclosure of said mortgage." Held, that this was sufficient to support a judgment for an attorney's fee without averring that plaintiff had actually incurred expense for that purpose.

5. But plaintiff was not entitled to recover as counsel fee more than 5 per cent. on the principal, as provided in the note.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Victor Montgomery, for appellants. Ray Billingsley, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage on real property. The note, to secure which the mortgage was given, was for $2,500, dated October 29, 1887, and payable three years after date, with interest at the rate of 12½ per cent. per annum, payable annually, and if not so paid to be compounded annually, and bear the same rate of interest as the principal. The note then contained the following provisions: "And should the interest not be paid when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note. Should suit be commenced to enforce the payment of this note, we agree to pay an additional sum of 5 per cent. on principal as attorney's fees in such suit." The mortgage also provided: "And the mortgagors promise to pay said note according to the terms and conditions thereof, and in case of default in payment of same, or of any installment of the interest thereon when due, the mortgagee may foreclose this mortgage, and may include in such foreclosure a reasonable counsel fee, to be fixed by the court." The action was commenced on the 18th day of January, 1889, and the complaint alleged that no part of the principal or interest mentioned in the note had been paid; and "that because of said interest not having been paid when due, and upon the provision with reference thereto contained in said note, the plaintiff elects to consider and declare the whole sum of principal and interest of said note now due and payable." The prayer was that the plaintiff have judgment for the sum named in the note as principal, and interest thereon as the note specified, compounded annually, "and for 5 per cent. on the said principal sum of $2,500, for attorney's fees, as provided in said promissory note, and being such reasonable counsel fee, as provided in said mortgage, and for costs of suit," and also that the usual decree of foreclosure be entered. Subsequently the plaintiff filed an amendment to his complaint, alleging that on or about the 20th of November, 1888, he demanded personally of the defendant G. L. Dean the payment of the whole sum of principal and interest; and on the 4th of December, 1889, he filed a supplemental complaint, alleging that on the 29th of October of that year another installment of interest fell due, and that no payment whatever of interest or principal had been made. The defendants demurred generally and specially to the complaint as amended, and the demurrer was overruled. They then answered, and by their answer denied that plaintiff made any demand for the payment of the principal of the note prior to the commencement of the action, and alleged that no notice of plaintiff's election or option to consider the principal and interest of the note due was ever given by him to them, or either of them; prior to the commencement of the action. They also set up a written memorandum, signed by the plaintiff, agreeing to credit the defendants with 2½ per cent. of the 12½ per cent. stipulated interest, provided the defendants should present receipts showing the payment of all taxes against the property covered by the mortgage on or before the 15th day of December of each year, and alleged that the memorandum was made at the time the note and mortgage were executed, and was a part of the transaction, and that they had paid all state, county, and municipal taxes assessed against the property, and were therefore entitled to a credit of the 2½ per cent. per annum on the interest. The case was tried, and the court found that the plaintiff signed and delivered to the defendant G. L. Dean the memorandum set forth in the answer, at the time the note and mortgage were executed; that an agreement was thereby made between the plaintiff and defendants that the rate of interest on the note should be 10 per cent. per annum only, provided the defendants should pay all taxes levied against the mortgaged property subsequently; that the defendants paid the state, county and municipal taxes on the property for the fiscal year 1888-89, and the municipal taxes for the fiscal year 1889-90, but had not paid the state and county taxes for the last-named year, and were entitled to a reduction of the interest on the principal to 10 per cent. per annum for the first year only; that the plaintiff had paid all state, county, and municipal taxes assessed against the mortgage; that no part of the principal sum nor of the interest thereon mentioned in the note and mortgage had been paid; that no notice that plaintiff had elected, or exercised his option, to consider the principal and interest of the note due was given by plaintiff to defendants, or either of them, prior to the commencement of the action, and that no demand was made by plaintiff upon defendants for the payment of the whole sum of principal and interest other than by bringing the suit; that the sum of $300 is such reasonable attorney's fee as is provided in the note and mortgage; and that at the time of the trial, December 21, 1889, the amount of principal and interest due and unpaid on the note was $3,149.60. A decree of foreclosure was accordingly entered, adjudging that there be paid to the plaintiff from the proceeds of the sale of the property the amount found due, and $300 for attorney's fee, and costs of suit. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and have appealed from the judgment and order.

1. The appellants contend that it was necessary for respondent, before commencing his action, to give them notice that he had exercised his option to treat the whole sum of principal and interest as due, and to make demand for the payment of the whole sum, and also that, by his delay to commence the action for nearly three months after the first installment of interest became due, he waived the right to exercise such option. The promise to pay the interest annually was absolute, and the first installment became due at the expiration of one year after the date of the note. The stipulation in the note that, if the interest should not be paid when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest should immediately become due and payable at the option of the holder, was without any conditions or limitations requiring notice or demand. The makers knew of this provision, and their failure to pay the interest when it became due left it wholly optional with the holder to insist upon the payment of the whole debt, or not, as he might elect. In Whitcher v. Webb, 44 Cal. 127, where the note in suit contained a provision similar to that involved here, it was held that a failure to pay the interest when it became due made the whole amount of the note due absolutely, at the option of the holder, without any notice from the holder to the payor. The court said: "The plaintiff had no duty to perform to the defendant, and the latter no excuse to delay the payments which he had stipulated to make." In Dean v. Applegarth, 65 Cal. 391, 4 Pac. Rep. 375, the note in suit bore interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, payable monthly, in advance, and it was stipulated that, in case default should be made in the payment of any of the interest when due, such installment or payment thus in default should bear interest from the day of maturity until payment at the rate of 2 per cent., compounding monthly, and at any time during such default the entire unpaid balance of the principal sum should, at the option of the holder of the note, and not otherwise, become due and payable, and the principal sum so due and payable should bear interest thereafter at the rate of 2 per cent. per month, compounding monthly, until paid. When the action was commenced, the note, by its terms, had become due, and the question was as to what interest the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The court said: "This provision as to the compounding of the interest on the principal sum was only intended to have operation when, after default in the payment of an installment of interest, and before the principal sum had matured, the plaintiff elected to have the principal become due, so that he might bring his action at once to foreclose." It did not appear from any averment in the complaint or otherwise that any option was made or manifested in any way by the plaintiff prior to the commencement of the action; and it was held that this option must have been exercised and manifested in some way before it could have effect. The court then, speaking of the ways in which the option might have been manifested, said: "He [the plaintiff,] might have brought his action to foreclose immediately on default, and this would have been a sufficient election." In Insurance Co. v. Shepardson, 77 Cal. 345, 19 Pac. Rep. 583, the court said: "The promise to pay the interest annually was absolute. The only question left to the option of the holder was whether, upon the failure to pay such interest, the whole amount of principal and interest should immediately become due and payable, without any act on the part of the holder showing his election to exercise the option given him. The case as presented does not call for a decision of this question, but we think the case of Whitcher v. Webb, 44 Cal. 127, determines it adversely to the appellant." As to demand, the general and well-settled rule is that, in an action to recover money payable on demand, or at a fixed time, or on the happening of an event, it is not necessary to show actual demand before bringing suit. The institution of the suit is a sufficient demand. Zeil v. Dukes, 12 Cal. 479; Halleck v. Moss, 22 Cal. 266; Luckhart v. Ogden, 30 Cal. 556; Cummings v. Howard, 63 Cal. 503.

In the light of the foregoing authorities, it is clear, we think, that the plaintiff could maintain his action without showing notice of his election or demand of payment prior to, or otherwise than by, the institution of his suit. In Crossmore v. Page, 73 Cal. 213, 14 Pac. Rep. 787, it was held that an option given to the holder of a promissory note to have the same become due immediately upon default in the payment of the interest as therein provided, in order to be available as against an indorser, must be exercised within a reasonable time after default, and that a delay of seven months before attempting to exercise the option was unreasonable.

The delay in commencing this action was, as we have seen, less than three months after the default in paying interest, and the circumstances connected with and accounting for the delay are as follows: The plaintiff testified that on or about October 20, 1888, he met the defendant G. L. Dean, and that "Mr. Dean said to me he wanted I should have this money, but he said, 'I have use for it, and if you can just let me have a few days,'—or something like that,—'I want it to pay for a car-load of material.' I told him, 'Mr. Dean, I am expecting it. I have counted on it, and want the money, but I can get along for a few days.' We was speaking about the interest, and that was a little before the interest became due. I wanted the money, but I didn't propose to press him." The defendant G. L. Dean testified substantially to the same effect, but fixed the time as about October 27th. He stated that plaintiff told him he had use for the money, but under the circumstances he would extend the time to pay the interest, and would not push him. The defendants also put in evidence a letter, dated October 27, 1888, which was written by plaintiff's attorneys, and addressed to and received by defendants, stating that the interest on their note, due the 29th inst., was payable at the attorneys' office, where the note would be found, and that prompt payment was expected. It thus appears that the delay complained of was at the request of defendants. Under this showing we do not think it can be said that plaintiff's delay to institute his action was for an unreasonable length of time, or that he thereby waived his right to exercise the option given him.

2. The point is made that the words "all taxes against the property covered by the mortgage," as used in the memorandum set up in the answer, included taxes upon the mortgage as well as upon the land; and, if so, it is argued that the memorandum, under the provisions of section 5 of article 13 of the constitution, rendered null and void the promise in the note to pay any interest. At the trial counsel for defendants offered to prove that the words above quoted were intended by the parties, and understood by them, to cover and include the mortgage tax. On objection, the offered evidence was excluded, and this ruling is assigned as error. We see no error in the ruling. The section of the constitution cited reads as follows: "Every contract hereafter made by which a debtor is obligated to pay any tax or assessment on money loaned, or on any mortgage, deed of trust, or other lien, shall, as to any interest specified therein, and as to such tax or assessment, be null and void." The promise in the note to pay interest at 12½ per cent. was absolute; and the mortgage provided that the mortgagee might include in a decree of foreclosure "all payments made by the mortgagee for taxes and assessments on said premises, excepting taxes on the interest of the mortgagee therein." The memorandum was not signed by the defendants, and they did not thereby obligate themselves to pay any taxes on the land or mortgage. It simply provided that, if they should present receipts showing the payment of all taxes against the property, then the interest on their note was to be 10 per cent. per annum only. They might or might not pay all or any of the taxes at their pleasure, and the evidence showed that the plaintiff in fact paid all taxes assessed against his mortgage at the time they became due. See Marve v. Hart, 76 Cal. 291, 18 Pac. Rep. 325.

3. It is contended that the court erred in finding that $300 was a reasonable attorney's fee, and in allowing the plaintiff that amount. This is rested upon the fact that there was no allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff had paid that sum, or incurred any liability to pay it, and hence it is claimed that the finding was outside of the issues, and not authorized. But the complaint alleged "that the sum of $300 is a reasonable attorney's fee or counsel fee for the foreclosure of said mortgage;" and, if any averment as to the fee was necessary, this certainly was sufficient. See Carriere v. Minturn, 5 Cal. 435; Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 568, 14 Pac. Rep. 514; Rapp v. Gold Co. 74 Cal. 532, 16 Pac.

Rep. 325; White v. Allatt, (Cal.) ante, 421. The cases cited and relied upon by appellants are not in point. In Patterson v. Donner, 48 Cal. 369, the action was commenced and prosecuted by the plaintiff personally; and in Bank v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379, the attorney for plaintiff was employed by it to perform its legal business under a regular monthly salary, and it had neither paid nor become liable to pay to him anything as counsel fees. It was held in each case that, under the circumstances shown, counsel fees could not be allowed; the court, in the latter case, saying: "The object of the law allowing counsel fees is not to afford an opportunity, under cover of the name, for a speculation on the part of the creditor, but to reimburse him in a proper amount for a sum which he pays, or becomes liable to pay, or to relieve him of the burden of paying counsel fees." No such circumstances appear here.

But, even if the plaintiff was entitled to a counsel fee, it is strenuously urged that the amount allowed was too large; that the court could properly allow only $125. This position, we think, should be sustained. The note provided for an attorney's fee of 5 per cent. on the principal in case an action should be commenced to enforce its payment. The mortgage provided for a reasonable attorney's fee in case of foreclosure. These papers should be read together as constituting one contract in this regard. Civil Code, § 1642. And, besides, the plaintiff asked for only "five per cent. on the said principal sum of $2,500 for attorney's fees. It has been held that, when the mortgage fixes the amount of the attorney's fee, it is error for the court to allow a larger sum than that so fixed. Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 568, 14 Pac. Rep. 514. We think that rule should be applied here.

We find no other error in the record. The findings seem to be sufficient and without conflict. We therefore advise that the judgment be modified by reducing the amount allowed for attorney's fees to $125, and that as so modified the judgment and order be affirmed; the appellants to recover costs on appeal.

WE CONCUR: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is modified by reducing the amount allowed for attorney's fees to $125, and as so modified the judgment and order are affirmed; the appellants to recover costs on appeal.

WATER-RIGHTS—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

A water contract provided that defendant could make connections by two 2-inch pipes with plaintiff's flume, and that "all water drawn from said flume shall be taken and drawn from said pipes for the purpose of irrigating, through standard pipes of not more than 1½-inch diameter;" that plaintiff will convey "a water-right of 2¼ inches of water, miner's measure, under a 4-inch pressure," etc.; that the amount of water he is entitled to shall be measured by "the amount of water that he may draw from said pipes through 1½-inch iron pipe standards in his said grounds," etc. Held, that defendant was entitled only to 2¼ inches of water under 4 inches pressure, and not to all he could take by the two 2-inch pipes, and distribute through the two 1½-inch pipes.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Shaw & Holland, for appellant. Levi Chase and Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought for the purpose of having a contract for the sale of a water-right for irrigation purposes reformed, and that it be declared that the amount of water "conveyed to and owned by the defendant be limited by said contract to 2¼ inches of water, miner's measure, under a 4-inch pressure, and no more, and that he be entitled and required to take the same in accordance with such reasonable rules and regulations as may be established from time to time by plaintiff," and for such other equitable relief in the premises as should be proper. The contract sought to be reformed is made a part of the complaint, and shows that plaintiff and appellant, who is the party of the first part, "contracts and agrees that the party of the second part [defendant and respondent here] shall have the right to make two connections with the said flume of said party of the first part of a two-inch pipe entering the side thereon near the bottom. * * * The pipe aforesaid shall be extended from the points of connection with said flume to, and be connected with, the pipe system of the party of the second part in said orchard, and thereafter all water drawn from said flume shall be taken and drawn from said pipes for the purpose of irrigating, through standard pipes of not more than 1½-inch diameter, or carried through 1½-inch rubber hose, as hereafter provided. That the party of the first part will convey to the party of the second part a water-right of two and one-quarter (2¼) inches of water, miner's measure, under a four-inch pressure, to be taken and used as hereinafter provided, and subject to the conditions usual with said party of the first part in the sale of water-rights to other parties. That the water to be taken and had by the party of the second part under this agreement, and under and by virtue of his water-rights aforesaid, shall be measured, estimated, and determined by the amount of water that he may draw from said pipes through 1½-inch iron pipe standards in his said grounds, and to be used exclusively thereon, from the 1st day of May to the 1st day of November, both inclusive, during ordinary seasons; but, should an extraordinarily dry spring or fall necessitate a longer use of water for irrigation, he shall have the right to use and take the same through said pipes in the same way as hereinbefore provided, but in that case shall pay the party of the first part an extra amount therefor, proportionate to the sum hereinafter specified to be paid by the party of the second part for the six-months use first aforesaid." A demurrer to this complaint having been overruled, the defendant answered, admitting the contract to be as set out in and attached to the complaint, and denying all other allegations, and also filed an amended cross-complaint, (a demurrer to the original having been sustained,) the gravamen of which was that under this contract he was entitled to have a specific performance of it, so that the effect thereof would be that he was to take and receive (through two 2-inch pipes placed in the side of the flume of the plaintiff, from whence water was to be drawn, and connected with the defendant's pipe system, by which he irrigated his fruit farm) all the water he might require for the irrigation of his said property, and for the use of the stock and persons kept or employed thereon, that he might draw from one and one-half inch standard pipes in his irrigation system, and for damages and other relief, consisting, among other things, of the restoration of the 2-inch pipes connected with the flume as they had originally stood, and to remove all natural obstructions to the flow of the water in these pipes; the defendant having been limited as to the flow of water by an obstruction erected by the plaintiff at the flume so that only 1½ inches would flow into each of the 2-inch pipes. An answer to this cross-complaint was filed. When the case came on for trial the plaintiff abandoned its action for a reformation of the contract. Then the defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings in the cross-action for the specific performance of the contract, as he claimed it was to be interpreted, and for nominal damages; he alleging that the plaintiff, by its answer to the cross-complaint, had admitted all the material allegations of that pleading. This motion was sustained, and judgment entered in accordance therewith. The plaintiff appeals.

The real matter to be determined on this appeal is how much water the defendant was entitled to under the contract to take from the plaintiff's flume; the appellant claiming it to be only 2¼ inches under a 4-inch pressure; the respondent claiming it to be all the water he could take through his two 2-inch iron pipes connected with the flume, to be distributed by means of two 1½-inch iron standard pipes. The construction given by the trial court to the contract, as appears by its decree or judgment, is not correct. The quantity of water which the defendant was to get from the plaintiff's flume for a certain specified sum of money was 2¼ inches, miner's measure, under a 4-inch pressure, from "the 1st day of May to the 1st day of November, both inclusive, during ordinary seasons; but, should an extraordinarily dry spring or fall necessitate a longer use of water for irrigation," he is to have the right to use "and take the same through said pipes in the same way" as he took the 2¼ inches for a specified term, as above set forth, but in that case he must pay the plaintiff an extra amount therefor, proportionate to the sum he was ordinarily to pay for the season from the 1st day of May until the 1st day of November, inclusive. But the quantity of water to be taken was to be admeasured to him through his two 2-inch iron pipes, connected on his land with two 1½-inch standard pipes. The method of taking this quantity of water does not affect the amount which the first clause of the contract relating thereto fixed, unless a construction be given to that clause which will make it entirely inoperative. It reads thus: "That the party of the first part will convey to the party of the second part a water right of two and one-quarter (2¼) inches of water, miner's measure, under a four-inch pressure, to be taken and used as hereinafter provided, and subject to the conditions usual with said party of the first part in the sale of water-rights to other parties." But, giving it the construction we have, it is in entire harmony with the clause following: "That the water to be taken and had by the party of the second part under this agreement, and under and by virtue of his water-rights aforesaid, shall be measured, estimated, and determined by the amount of water that he may draw from said pipes through 1½-inch iron pipe standards in his said grounds." The one clause refers to the amount of water to be taken; the other to the manner of its taking.

Two and one-quarter inches of water, miner's measure, under a 4-inch pressure, it is the privilege of the defendant to take and distributed daily, as he pleases, over his land, through its pipe system attached to the plaintiff's flume; and this daily quantity of water he is entitled to for the season heretofore set forth. But he is not entitled to any more during that season, except, as stated in the contract, when an "extraordinarily dry spring or fall necessitates a longer use of water for irrigation," when he is to get it by paying a sum of money proportionate to the sum he was ordinarily to pay for water during the season as above stated. Judgment reversed.

HARRIS v. SAN DIEGO FLUME CO. (No. 13,998.)

AGENCY—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—BROKER'S COMMISSIONS.

1. A resolution of the board of directors of a flume company authorizing its superintendent to "enter into negotiations with contractors and others for work on the line of the flume, in his discretion, subject to the approval of the board," does not empower him to employ a broker to find a suitable contractor, in the absence of evidence that such a course is necessary and usual in the ordinary course of business.

2. The fact that the superintendent had been permitted to do many things in San Diego county outside the ordinary duties of his position did not imply authority to bind the company to pay the broker, when the latter had no knowledge of his doings in San Diego county.

3. The company cannot be held on the theory that it accepted the benefit of the broker's services, when it had no knowledge of them at the time it made the contract with the contractor thus found to build the flume.

Commissioner's decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county, GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Deakin & Story and Thos. J. Capps, for appellant. Shaw & Holland, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action to recover $5,000 as brokerage for negotiating a contract. The complaint contained two counts, but the plaintiff elected to go to trial upon a quantum meruit. The trial court gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. The principal question discussed by counsel relates to the authority of the person who employed the plaintiff. The defendant was a corporation "to construct and operate a flume for the transmitting of water." At the period in question its flume had not been constructed. The engineering work was being done, and the business of acquiring rights of way, etc., was being attended to. In the beginning of August, 1886, the company sent its superintendent, one W. E. Robinson, to San Francisco to negotiate a contract for the construction of the flume. He employed the plaintiff as broker to find a contractor, and through the plaintiff's exertions a suitable person was found. The claim is for compensation for services as such broker.

1. The defendant cannot be held on the ground of ostensible or apparent authority. There is evidence to the effect that, in the county of San Diego, Robinson was permitted by the company to do things outside of his ordinary duties as superintendent. And the plaintiff's son, who was an engineer in the employment of the company, testified that, on the eve of Robinson's departure for San Francisco, the president told him that Robinson "had full authority" to enter into contracts. This latter evidence is contradicted; the former is not. But neither is ground for a decision in favor of plaintiff on the theory of an ostensible or apparent authority. For it does not appear either that the alleged statement of the president was communicated to the plaintiff, or that he was aware of the latitude which had been permitted Robinson in San Diego. It may possibly be surmised that he had knowledge of the circumstances; but the fact is not stated, and a mere surmise is not sufficient. "Ostensible authority is such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess." Civil Code, § 2317. There are two essential features of an authority of this character, viz., the party must believe that the agent had authority, and such belief must be generated by some act or neglect of the person to be held. A belief founded on the agent's statements is not sufficient; for a party has no right to take the agent's word for the existence of his authority. In the case before us, as above stated, it does not appear that the acts of the company which are supposed to have been sufficient to justify a belief in Robinson's authority were known to the plaintiff; and, if not, they could not have generated in his mind any belief on the subject of the agency. There may be other reasons why the plaintiff cannot recover on this ground, but the foregoing is sufficient.

2. There was no actual authority, either express or implied. The measure of the agent's authority was the following resolution of the board of directors of the company: "Resolved, that W. E. Robinson be authorized to proceed to San Francisco and enter into negotiations with contractors and others for work on the line of the flume, in his discretion, subject to the approval of this board; also that he be authorized to enter into negotiations with capitalists for the purchase of not exceeding $500,000 in the bonds of the company." Nothing appears to have been done by the plaintiff in relation to the disposition of the bonds. His claim is for finding a contractor who was willing to enter into a contract for the building of the flume. In the language of appellant's counsel, "for the peculiarly difficult and rare services rendered by him in introducing and assisting in procuring Mr. Moore to take this contract, the plaintiff claims the moderate commission of $5,000." In relation to this we concede in favor of the appellant that the words, "subject to the approval of this board," contained in the resolution, refer only to the contract for the construction of the flume, which was to be negotiated by Robinson, and that he had implied authority "to do everything necessary or proper and usual in the ordinary course of business for effecting the purpose of his agency. Civil Code, § 2319. But we are not able to say that the employment of a high-priced broker is necessary or proper and usual, in the ordinary course of business," for finding a contractor to build a flume. At least, we do not think that the court can take judicial notice that such is the case, and we do not find any satisfactory evidence of it in the record. There is evidence that it was a matter of some difficulty to induce contractors to go to so distant a field of action, and some evidence that the plaintiff's services had a value. But the latter evidence seems to be on the general theory that whatever a broker does has a value. Upon the whole evidence, we cannot say that the finding of the trial court should be disturbed.

3. The defendant cannot be made liable upon the theory that it appropriated the benefit of the plaintiff's services. The unauthorized arrangement made by Robinson with the plaintiff was collateral to the flume contract, and the defendant knew nothing of such services at the time the flume contract was entered into. The other matters do not require special attention. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

CLARKE v. REIS, Treasurer. (No. 13,880.)

CITY POLICE DEPARTMENT—LIFE INSURANCE FUND.

Act Cal. April 1, 1878, (St. Cal. 1877-78, p. 879,) fixed the compensation of police officers of the city and county of San Francisco at a certain sum per month, and directed the treasurer of the city and county to "retain from the pay of each police officer the sum of two dollars per month, to be paid into a fund to be known as the 'Police Life and Health Insurance Fund,' of which $1,000 was to be paid to the personal representative of any member of the police force on his death. Held that, as the police officer never received the amount so retained, nor had any power of disposition over the same, he had no vested property right in such fund, and on his discharge from the force he was not entitled to a return of the amount contributed by him. Following Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 269, 22 Pac. Rep. 176; affirmed, 132 U. S. 471, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 149.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. GARBER, Judge.

Act Cal. April 1, 1878, (St. Cal. 1877-78, p. 879,) fixed the compensation for each member of the police force of San Francisco at a sum not exceeding $102 a month for each one, and provided that the treasurer of said city and county should "retain from the pay of each police officer the sum of two dollars per month, to be paid into a fund to be known as the 'Police Life and Health Insurance Fund.'" The act declared that on the death of any member of the police force after January 1, 1878, there should be paid to his representatives, by the treasurer, out of the said life and health insurance fund, the sum of $1,000; and that in case any officer should resign, from bad health or bodily infirmity, there should be paid to him from that fund the amount of the principal which he may have contributed thereto.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought for the purpose of forcing, by writ of mandate, the respondent to pay the appellant, who was the assignee of a claim of a dismissed police officer, one Pugh, the amount of $256, principal, and costs and damages to the amount of $25. This sum of money was claimed under and by virtue of an act of the legislature approved April 1, 1878, St. Cal. 1878, p. 879. It is asserted that the $2 per month which the police officer claims to have paid into the fund held by the treasurer was money in which he had a vested right, and that on his discharge he was entitled to have it returned to him or his representative. The petition was demurred to as not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; the demurrer was sustained, and the writ dismissed. From the judgment rendered in the premises this appeal is taken. The statute, under which this right is set up by the plaintiff, has received construction from the appellate court of this state in Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 269, 22 Pac. Rep. 176, and from the supreme court of the United States, in the same case, on writ of error, 132 U. S. 471, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 149. These cases hold that a police officer, such as the assignor of the appellant, never had any claim on the fund involved here, except upon the happening of certain contingencies, mentioned in the act of the legislature of California, to which we have just adverted, under which act alone could any right have vested in the plaintiff or his assignor. The voluminous and argumentative petition filed herein does not, in our opinion, state such facts as bring the appellant within any of the contingencies of the statute which he invokes, and we therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; BELCHER, C.

McLENNAN V. BANK OF CALIFORNIA. (No. 12,944.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 31, 1891.)

TRIAL—BY COURT — FAILURE TO FILE DECISION—FINDINGS.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 632, which requires a judge, in an action tried before him without a jury, to render and file his decision within 30 days after the cause of action has been submitted to him, is directory merely; and a new trial will not be granted for the judge's failure to comply with the provision.

2. Plaintiff, the owner of a note, placed it for collection in the hands of defendant's cashier, his intimate friend, and in whom he had unbounded confidence. The cashier had the note renewed, placed the renewed note in the bank for collection as deposited for his own account individually, and used the proceeds personally. Though informed by the cashier that the renewed note had been collected, plaintiff never demanded payment from the bank, or any one else except the cashier, and never drew a check against the proceeds, or made any effort to get them. Years afterwards, when the cashier had died, and during a temporary suspension of the bank, plaintiff brought an action against it for the proceeds of the note. Held, that the court was justified in finding that the note had been left with the cashier for collection in his individual capacity, and not as agent for the bank, and that the court was not bound to believe plaintiff's confused and contradictory testimony that he had deposited the note with the bank for collection.

3. The fact that the statute of limitations has apparently run against a counter-claim set up by the bank against plaintiff does not render inadmissible the books of the bank containing the original entries of the transactions, as the bank may be able to show facts which will take the claim out of the operation of the statute.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

George B. Merrill, (T. I. Bergin, of counsel,) for appellant. F. G. Newlands, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought by Donald McLennan, now deceased, and was tried, judgment entered, and notice of intention to move for a new trial served and filed during his life-time. After his death his administrator, the present plaintiff, was substituted, and a new trial refused. From the order made in the premises the plaintiff appeals. The action is to recover of the defendant, a banking corporation, the sum of $10,000, and interest. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 27th day of November, 1869, the Mission & Pacific Woolen Mills, Consolidated, a corporation, made, executed, and duly indorsed and delivered to the plaintiff a certain promissory note for $10,000. That upon the receipt of that note the plaintiff deposited it with the defendant, to be collected in due course of banking business.

That the note, and certain accrued interest thereon, was paid by the maker of the note to the defendant on the 26th day of April, 1870. That afterwards, on the 26th of August, 1875, the defendant closed the doors of its bank, stopped payment, etc., and refused to pay the plaintiff the money collected by it for him. The defense was that the note was never received by the bank from the plaintiff for collection, but was given by the plaintiff into the hands of W. C. Ralston to be collected, and the proceeds used by him for his own benefit, and that in accordance with this the money was collected by the bank at the request of Ralston, placed to his credit, and paid out to him on his checks drawn against his account as a depositor with the bank. The statute of limitations was set up, and also certain demands against the plaintiff held by the bank, were pleaded by way of set-off, to an amount exceeding the claim of the plaintiff. The court found in favor of the defendant: "That the plaintiff never deposited the said note of November 27, 1869, with the defendant to be collected; that the plaintiff never deposited said note of November 27, 1869, with the defendant." It further held that the plaintiff's cause of action, if it had been otherwise good against the bank, which it was not, was not barred, but that the cause of action by the defendant, on its counter-demands against the plaintiff, was barred by the statute of limitations. So that, upon the findings as made, judgment was rendered against the plaintiff for costs.

The first ground urged for a reversal of the order denying a new trial is that the court did not give its decision and file it with the clerk within 30 days after the cause was submitted for decision under section 632 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The provision of the statute in question is directory merely. Broad v. Murray, 44 Cal. 228; McQuillan v. Donahue, 49 Cal. 157; Hayne, New Trials & App. § 238, note 13.

The main ground, as it seems, urged by the appellant for the reversal of the order is that the trial court misconstrued the evidence given in the cause, and that the findings against the plaintiff are not in accord with such evidence, if properly and legally considered. The only oral evidence in the case introduced by the plaintiff to sustain the contention that the note was placed in the hands of Mr. Ralston, the then cashier of the Bank of California, for collection by the bank, the proceeds to be placed therein to the credit of the plaintiff, was the testimony of Donald McLennan and the witness Tibbey; the latter having been at one time an employe of the bank, but was not at the time he testified. Mr. Ralston, the only other person who might have testified as to the exact nature of the transaction by which he took the note from McLennan for collection, was dead at the time of the trial. So that whether he took it as cashier of the bank, or in his individual capacity, must rest mainly, if not entirely, upon whether the emphatic and positive statements made by McLennan and Tibbey ought to have been given full credit by the trial court. The note which it is claimed that Ralston collected, and had the proceeds placed to his credit in the bank, and drew it out by check and used it for his own private purposes, was made in renewal of a second note, which last had been in the hands of Tibbey, a friend of McLennan's, to be collected by Tibbey for McLennan. When it became due, Tibbey placed it in another bank for collection, and Col. Fry, the president of the mill corporation, the maker of the note, was not ready to pay it, and told Mr. Ralston, who was largely interested in the corporation, of the fact of the inability of the corporation at that time to meet the note, and that Tibbey had it for collection. Ralston was, as appears abundantly in the record, a man and friend in whom McLennan had the utmost confidence, at whose instance the latter had several times given his name on various notes, and had at Ralston's personal request loaned at one time $30,000 to the mill corporation. In fact, it would appear as if McLennan, on account of the confidence he had in Ralston, and his intimate personal and business relations with him, as shown by McLennan's evidence, if he had been requested to do it, would at any time have intrusted or loaned to Ralston either his name, credit, or money. Under these existing personal relations between Ralston and McLennan, Mr. Ralston inquired of Tibbey about this second note. He was informed that the note was held in confidence as agent by Tibbey. Then Tibbey saw McLennan, who told him to tell Ralston who the note belonged to. This was done, and an interview occurred between Ralston, Tibbey, and McLennan, by means of which Ralston became possessed of the note, had it renewed, and placed the renewed note in the bank for collection as deposited for his own account individually, and used the proceeds personally. Another circumstance appears in the case in the evidence of McLennan, and that is that although he says that Ralston told him the money had been collected on the note, and placed to McLennan's credit in the Bank of California, he never once made any inquiry of any one else about the bank if such was the fact; never made any demand for it for years afterwards, or during Ralston's life-time, except to Ralston; and never drew a check against it, or made any effort to get it, as is usual in cases when men have money on deposit in banks. After Ralston's death, and during the temporary suspension of the bank, this action is brought, and when a large alleged indebtedness of McLennan to the bank is barred by the statute of limitations, and his claim, being against a bank, cannot be likewise barred. All these facts were before the trial court. In addition to certain suspicious facts and circumstances, which time does not admit of mention, it appears in the testimony of McLennan that he first positively and emphatically declared that he had no interest or claim in the third note, and afterwards declared that he had; the reason which he assigns for not claiming this interest in the first instance being as stated by himself, in answer to questions by his counsel, which questions and the answers are: "Question. This morning you were asked in regard to the first and second notes, and you said that the third note was not yours. I should like to know if you have any explanation to make about that. Answer. Well, I made a great mistake this morning, because I thought that, not having any physical connection in the third note, that it might not belong to me, or it might prejudice my standing in court. I at once saw my mistake, and beg now to correct it. I claim ownership in that note, the same as the other two notes. I claim ownership in any note having any connection with the transaction. Q. You also said that you never authorized or ratified the taking up of the third note. What do you mean by that? A. Well, I mean to say by that, whatever the bank done in connection or in the shape of an accommodation to the mill, of course it was no doings of mine, any more than the proceeds from any accommodation they might afford the mill. I claim the payment,—claim the money." From this it seems as if the witness thought himself justified in making his recollection conform to his supposed interests, and that he was ready to and did make what he calls a "mistake" in his own favor as to the statement of a fact, or a claim of interest, when to do otherwise, and state the fact or claim correctly, would, as he said, "prejudice my standing in court." Space forbids us to enumerate all the other instances, either, as claimed, resulting from the want of recollection or otherwise, where it would seem that the witness caused "intestinal" conflicts in his testimony, or made statements inherently improbable in their nature. But such appears to us to have been the character of his testimony; and under such circumstances we do not see, in view of the decisions of the appellate court of this state, that the trial court was compelled to regard as true his statement as to how Ralston became possessed of the note. Crook v. Forsyth, 30 Cal. 662; Bernal v. Wade, 46 Cal. 667; Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 639-646; Baker v. Insurance Co., 79 Cal. 34-41, 21 Pac. Rep. 357; Mogk v. Peterson, 75 Cal. 501, 17 Pac. Rep. 446. Mr. Tibbey's mistakes and corrections also leave it doubtful if his recollection of the facts just as they occurred when Ralston took the note are to be relied on; and, besides, the peculiar relations between Ralston and McLennan, and all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, and the conduct of the plaintiff afterwards, as above adverted to, might well cause the trial judge to doubt the correctness of the memory of the witness.

It is further claimed that the books of the bank showing the alleged indebtedness of the plaintiff, as set up by counterclaim, were inadmissible in evidence. The transactions of a bank, relating, in large measure, to its customers, to the receipt of money from them, and the paying of it out to them, on loan or check, it would seem as if their books showing the original entries of such transactions are admissible and competent evidence for the bank. Morse, Banks, (3d Ed.) § 295, note, pp. 510, 511; Bank v. Kuapp, 3 Pick. 96, 109; Watson v. Bank, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 217, 220, 221. Even if the claim of the defendant was barred by the statute of limitations, this did not render this evidence to show the original indebtedness inadmissible, for it might happen in such a case that the party introducing it would be able to show facts which would take it out of the operation of the statute; and after the date of the claim, and its nature, are shown, it then becomes a question for the court to determine, from all the evidence, whether such claim is or not enforceable under the statute. While a recovery on such claim may be barred, this does not render proof of the claim in the first instance incompetent. Besides, the findings of the court are that the claim was barred; hence the plaintiff is not prejudiced. The same rule applies to the objection to the admission in evidence of the promissory note for $16,841.75 executed by the plaintiff to the defendant.

There are other objections urged to the admission or exclusion of evidence. We have given to arguments made and authorities cited minute and thorough consideration, and have examined the transcript carefully, but we cannot see wherein any prejudice could have been suffered by the plaintiff. The decision of the court was unquestionably correct; and even if some evidence was admitted, and other evidence excluded, perhaps improperly, it yet appears that even then the evidence unobjectioned to in the record was unaffected, as that admitted against objection and that excluded was not of sufficient importance to change the result. Perceiving no prejudicial error in the record, we advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

I concur: BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

Plaintiffs claim title under a United States patent to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, dated April 4, 1879, and a deed from said company to plaintiffs, dated June 20, 1887. Defendant claims as a pre-emptor, contending that at the date of the definite location of the Southern Pacific Railroad, which was on or about April 3, 1871, the land in contest was within the exterior limits of the San Jose Rancho, a valid Mexican grant, and was therefore reserved from the grant to the railroad company. There was a former trial of this case, and a former appeal. At that trial the court made certain findings, and gave judgment for plaintiffs. On appeal, this court determined most of the questions involved favorably to defendant. (Foss v. Hinkell, 78 Cal. 158, 20 Pac. Rep. 393.) and the decision of this court then made as to those questions has become the law of the case. But this court reversed the judgment for want of a finding whether or not the land was within the exterior boundaries of said rancho. The court below had found that according to a survey called the "Thompson Survey" the land was within said boundaries, and that according to a survey called the "Hancock Survey" it was not; and this court, in its opinion, said: "The exterior limits of the rancho do not depend on any survey made of it. The land sued for may be within such exterior limits, though excluded from the survey. Though Hancock may have excluded this land from his survey, it still may be within the exterior boundaries of the rancho as granted by the Mexican government. What the exterior limits of such granted rancho were must be determined by the expediente of the grant issued by the Mexican government, including petition, diseno, and grant, the boundaries designated in which may be identified by parol evidence. See Doolen v. Carr, 125 U. S. 618, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1228." And for this defect in the findings the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded, "with directions to the court below to find, on the testimony already introduced, and such further testimony as may be introduced by either party, whether or not the land in suit was, on the 3d day of April, 1871, within the exterior boundaries of the Rancho San Jose, as granted by the Mexican government, and on such findings to enter judgment." And so, when the case went back to the trial court, there was only one issue—the one last above stated—to be determined. When the case was heard again in the trial court, that court, following the said directions of this court, found "that the land in suit was on the 3d day of April, 1871, within the exterior boundaries of the Rancho San Jose as granted by the Mexican government," and gave judgment accordingly for defendant; and it is evident that the judgment must stand, unless the court committed material errors in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, or unless the said finding is not supported by the evidence.

Appellants took certain exceptions to the admission of certain evidence; but the point is not pressed in the brief, and—especially when we consider what was decided when the case was here before—we see no error on this point.

evidence. Their counsel argue that the court must have found the land in suit to be within the exterior boundaries of the rancho, simply because it was claimed that said boundaries included said land. But there was introduced in evidence the original petition, the expediente, the diseno, the act of judicial possession, various maps, decrees, and proceedings, and also oral testimony of witnesses as to the exterior boundaries of the rancho. It would be a useless labor here to review all this evidence. It is sufficient to say that after a full consideration of the evidence we are not prepared to say that the court was not warranted in finding that the land in suit was within the exterior limits of the San Jose Rancho "as granted by the Mexican government." The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

MORTGAGES ON GROWING CROPS—STORING IN WAREHOUSE—MORTGAGOR'S INSOLVENCY.

1. The lien of a mortgage on growing crops is not lost by the mortgagor's storing the property in a warehouse, under an agreement with the mortgagee that it should be stored in the latter's name; and the action of the warehouseman in issuing the receipt in the name of the mortgagor, instead of the mortgagee, as he had been directed to do, does not entitle the mortgagor's assignee in insolvency to a preference over the mortgagee.

2. Section 55 of the California insolvent act, which provides that any transfer of property by an insolvent shall be void as to his creditors, when the transferee has reasonable cause to believe that it was made to hinder and delay creditors, does not make void the transfer of the warehouse receipt to the mortgagee by the mortgagor on the day he filed his petition in insolvency, as the mortgagee, by virtue of his mortgage, was entitled to the property, which was worth less than the debt for which it was mortgaged.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

PER CURIAM. Action to recover damages for the conversion by defendant of certain personal property, consisting of beans and barley, grown upon land farmed by one Dodge, in the county of San Luis Obispo, in 1888. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and from this, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. The court below found, in substance, that in May, 1888, the said Dodge duly mortgaged to plaintiff the said beans and barley then growing to secure the sum of $1,500 and interest, which mortgage was properly recorded. That between May 31, 1888, and October 27, 1888, the said Dodge, at the request of plaintiff, had the said property hauled from the land on which it was grown, and delivered to the defendant at its warehouse, instructing the person hauling it to store the same as the property of plaintiff, in accordance with plaintiff's request. That upon delivery of the first lot hauled the defendant was notified that said property belonged to plaintiff, and that the delivery was made for him. That from time to time, as delivered, the defendant gave to the teamster of Dodge who hauled it tags of weight, reciting that the same was received from said Dodge, and not naming the plaintiff. On October 27, 1888, Dodge surrendered these tags to defendant, and requested the agent in charge of defendant's warehouse to issue a warehouse receipt to plaintiff for said property, but that the agent issued such receipt in favor of said Dodge, the said Dodge protesting that the same should show that said beans and barley were stored for plaintiff. Plaintiff did not know that the property had been stored in the name of Dodge until October 28, 1888, when he was informed of that fact by Dodge, and of the further fact that the same had been attached on the day before by one Aaron in a suit against Dodge. On the 29th of October, Dodge indorsed and assigned the warehouse receipt to plaintiff, and the defendant was on the same day notified by plaintiff that he was the owner of the property. After this assignment, and upon the same day, Dodge filed his petition in insolvency, and was thereupon adjudged insolvent. Aaron was appointed assignee in the insolvency proceedings, and as such sold the property in controversy to one Sinsheimer, and on December 17, 1888, the defendant, by order of said Sinsheimer, shipped the same, and without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, to the consignee of said Sinsheimer in San Francisco.

1. These findings support the judgment. The lien of respondent's mortgage was not lost by his permitting the mortgagor, Dodge, to haul the mortgaged property from the land on which it was grown, and its storage in defendant's warehouse, under the circumstances disclosed in the findings. Byrnes v. Hatch, 77 Cal. 244, 19 Pac. Rep. 482. The neglect or refusal of defendant's agent to issue a receipt showing that the property was stored in the warehouse for the plaintiff did not change the effect of the agreement, made between plaintiff and his mortgagor, Dodge, as to the way in which it should be stored, so as to destroy the mortgage lien in favor of the assignee of the insolvent Dodge. The attachment proceedings need not be considered, as the attachment was dissolved when Dodge was adjudged insolvent.

2. The assignment of the warehouse receipt, made by Dodge to the plaintiff, on the day of the filing of Dodge's petition in insolvency, was not void as a preference, under section 55 of the insolvent act.<sup>1</sup> As the value of the property was less than the debt for which it was mortgaged, nothing was withdrawn from the reach of the assignee representing the creditors of Dodge, and, if it be conceded that the ef-

ASSESSMENTS—VALIDITY—APPEAL—MANDAMUS.

Under Act Cal. March 18, 1885, § 11, providing that the contractor having any objections to the legality of the assessment shall appeal to the city council, which may alter the same as may be just, and that its decision shall be conclusive upon all persons entitled to appeal, a contractor who does not appeal from the act of the superintendent of streets in making an assessment, which includes the cost of work called for by the specifications, but not authorized by the "resolution of intention," cannot compel him by mandamus to make another assessment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Hugh J. & William Crawford, for appellants. Charles McFarland and Sargent & Harpham, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs applied to the superior court of Los Angeles county for a writ of mandate to the superintendent of streets of the city of Los Angeles, directing him to make an assessment for certain work done by them in laying a sewer in Seventh street, under a contract with the city authorities. In their application they aver that they entered into a contract with the superintendent of streets by which they agreed to lay the sewer "in accordance with plans and specifications therefor on file in the office of the city surveyor, * * * but said plans and specifications were faulty and erroneous, in this: that about eight feet of sewer more were required by said plans and specifications to be laid, and were laid by affiants, than was authorized by the resolution of intention;" that they had performed their work to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, and that he accepted the same and made an assessment therefor, "and in said assessment included the cost and incidental expenses of said unauthorized eight feet;" that they brought an action to recover the amount of a portion of the assessment against one H. L. Williams, who had refused to pay the same, "because of said excess of work;" and that they had dismissed the said action. The defendant demurred to the application, and his demurrer having been sustained, the plaintiff declined to amend, and appealed to this court from the order denying the writ. The plaintiffs do not, in their application, aver in terms that the assessment that had been issued was void, nor can we say from the facts averred by them that it was void. Neither do they aver that the court in which they brought an action upon it decided that it was void, but they say that they dismissed their action against Williams upon "becoming convinced from the rulings of the honorable court that judgment could not be recovered by them." If the assessment was a valid one, the superintendent of streets cannot be required to make another, and unless facts showing that it was not valid were clearly set forth in their application, the court was justified in refusing to grant the writ.

1. The plaintiffs do not show very clearly in their application wherein the plans and specifications which were on file in the office of the city surveyor "required about eight feet of sewer more to be laid" than was authorized by the resolution of intention, but we understand therefrom that they required the sewer to be laid to a point 988 feet west of the east line of Pearl street, instead of 980 feet westerly therefrom, as specified in the resolution. If this be the fact, it would result that the plaintiffs laid the westerly eight feet of the sewer without authority, and that they are not entitled to an assessment for that portion of the work done by them. It does not result, however, that the assessment for the work done by them that had been authorized by the resolution of intention was void. Neither does it clearly appear from the application where the lot of Williams was situated with reference to this excess of eight feet. If it was wholly or in part within the eight feet, the plaintiffs are not entitled to an assessment against that part of the lot not fronting upon the work authorized by the city council. If his lot was east of the 980-foot limit, the assessment against it would not be rendered void by the fact that the entire assessment purported also to make a charge upon lots that were not within the resolution of intention. Inasmuch as the price at which the plaintiffs were to do the work was estimated by the lineal foot, the cost of that which was done by them outside of the 980-foot limit could be easily segregated from the remainder. Himmelman v. Hoadley, 44 Cal. 276.

2. If the assessment embraced only the frontage upon the 980 feet covered by the resolution of intention, but included the expense of laying the sewer in the eight feet outside of that limit, it was an error which could have been corrected by the city council upon appeal, and the failure to take such appeal was conclusive upon the owner as well as upon the contractor. Himmelman v. Hoadley, supra; Boyle v. Hitchcock, 66 Cal. 129, 4 Pac. Rep. 1143. If the lot of Williams as assessed was partly within the 980 feet authorized by the resolution of intention to be "improved" by the sewer, and partly outside thereof, it was the duty of plaintiffs to appeal to the city council within 30 days after the date of the warrant for the purpose of having the assessment corrected. Upon such appeal the city council would have limited the assessment to the 980 feet authorized by their resolution of intention. Section 11 of the act of March 18, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 156,) provides that "the contractor * * * having or making any objections to the correctness or legality of the assessment * * * shall, within thirty days after the date of the warrant, appeal to the city council. * * * Upon such appeal the said city council may * * * set aside, alter, modify, or correct the assessment in such manner as to them shall seem just; * * * and may instruct and direct the superintendent of streets to correct the assessment in any particular, or to make and issue a new assessment to conform to the decisions of the city council in relation thereto. All the decisions and determinations of said city council * * * shall be final and conclusive upon all persons entitled to appeal under the provisions of this section, as to all errors, informalities, and irregularities which said city council might have remedied and avoided." It was the duty of the plaintiffs, and not of Williams, to take this appeal. They were interested in having a legal and correct assessment. If the assessment was illegal and created no lien upon his land, Williams was not a person who would feel "aggrieved," and was not required to appeal for the purpose of giving to the plaintiff a valid assessment. Smith v. Cofran, 34 Cal. 310. It follows that inasmuch as the plaintiffs did not appeal from the act of the superintendent of streets in making the original assessment, they are concluded thereby, and are not entitled to have it corrected in any other mode. It is unnecessary to decide whether any part of the work to be done under the resolution of intention "is the improvement of an entire crossing," or whether it was necessary to post notices of the passage of the resolution "in front of each quarter block liable to be assessed." The order appealed from is affirmed.

FINCH v. RIVERSIDE & A. RY. CO. (No. 13,657.)

STREET RAILWAYS—CONSTRUCTION—RIGHTS OF ABUTTERS—FRANCHISE.

1. A street-railway company may use a street for its track without compensating the owner of the fee. Distinguishing Weyl v. Railroad Co., 69 Cal. 203, 10 Pac. Rep. 510.

2. In Civil Code Cal. § 493, requiring street-railway tracks to be placed as "nearly as possible" in the middle of the street, the words "as nearly as possible" are equivalent to "as nearly as practicable."

3. Where the only evidence that it is impracticable to place the track in the middle of the street is the testimony of two witnesses that to so place it would interfere with traffic somewhat, because, the street being only 40 feet wide, there would not be room for teams to pass on either side of the track, but who do not state that there is an extensive traffic on the street, nor that it would not be practicable to put the track in the middle, it is insufficient to support a finding that it was not "practicable" to locate the track in the middle of the street.

4. Where a member of the board of city trustees is a subscriber to the stock of a corporation obtaining the franchise for a street railway, and is himself one of the committee to whom the application for the franchise is referred, which committee reports favorably, the franchise is void, notwithstanding that no corporation was formed at the time the stock was subscribed for, and that the franchise was granted to individuals, a committee of the subscribers, who conveyed it to the company.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

H. C. Rolfe, for appellant. W. J. McIntyre, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action of ejectment brought by the owner of the fee of one-half of a street in the city of Riverside called "Cypress Avenue," against a street-car company, which was alleged to be using such half of the street in an unauthorized and unlawful manner. The trial court gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

There is no dispute about the plaintiff's ownership of the fee of half of the street, nor about the existence of the street, and the consequent right of the public to use it as a highway. The question litigated is whether the defendant's use of it was unauthorized and unlawful. In this regard several points are made.

1. It is contended that the defendant could not use the street for the purposes of its track without first making compensation to the plaintiff, and the case of Weyl v. Railroad Co., 69 Cal. 203, 10 Pac. Rep. 510, is cited. But that case was not in relation to a street railway, but to an ordinary railroad whose route took it through a street. And we think there is a difference between such a case and the present. The dedication of a street to public use authorizes any ordinary use for street purposes; and the use of a street in a city or town for the tracks of a street-car company is of this class, and is therefore authorized.

2. It is argued that the track was not located as required by law. The provision of statute in relation to the subject is that "the city or town authorities, in granting the right of way to street-railroad corporations, in addition to the restrictions which they are authorized to impose, must require a strict compliance with the following conditions: * * * First, to construct their track on those portions of the street designated in the ordinance granting the right, which must be as nearly as possible in the middle of the street." Civil Code, § 498. The order granting the franchise did not prescribe the precise part of the street upon which the track was to be located. It was merely that the franchise be granted to the applicants "according to their application;" and, while the application named the streets through which the road was to run, it did not refer to any particular portion of any street. There was, however, a general ordinance, applicable to all street-car companies, providing that "the track shall be laid as near the center of the street or streets along the route of the railway as practicable." It will be observed that the effect of this was that the board did not exercise its own judgment as to the portion of the street to be occupied by the track, but left it to the company to construct their track as near the middle of the street "as practicable." The company evidently did not consider it practicable to place the track in the middle of the street, and accordingly placed it on the side next the plaintiff's lot. The precise location is not shown by the record; but the court finds that "it was not practicable to locate the track in the middle of Cypress avenue." The court further finds that the franchise provided that the track was to be laid "along the eastern side of Cypress avenue," (which, as above shown, it did not provide;) and that "the location of the defendant's track was in conformity with the requirements of said franchise." The plaintiff's position is, in the first place, that the words "as nearly as possible" do not mean "as nearly as practicable," as held by the trial court; and that, even if they do, the finding that it was not practicable to locate the track in the middle of the street is not sustained by the evidence. In relation to the first question we think that the statute means "as nearly as practicable." As a matter of course, it is always physically possible to place a track in the middle of a street. It may not be legally possible. For example, there may already be a track there under a franchise which it is beyond the power of the board to revoke. But even if a track were placed in the middle of the street, under a revocable license, we think that the board would have power to authorize the laying of another track so as not to interfere with the first. So if, as is sometimes the case in rural towns, a row of trees were in the middle of the street, the track could be placed on one side. And we are not prepared to say that the conditions of traffic might not be such as to require a similar location. The use of the words "as nearly," in connection with "as possible," shows that it was foreseen that a location in the middle of the street could not always be made; and we think that, from the nature of the case, the meaning must be that the location must be controlled in some degree by the circumstances of the particular case.

But we do not think that the evidence in the case before us shows any reason why the track could not be located in the middle of the street. Only two witnesses testified on the subject. One of them said, in substance, that it was "impractical" to place such a track in the middle of such a narrow street, (it was 40 feet wide,) because it would interfere with traffic. To use his own language: "It is impractical to put it in the center of such a narrow street, because it interferes a little bit with the travel, just about the same as when Mr. Finch goes across to his lot 210. It interferes with the travel in passing teams. If the travel is very great, it interferes materially. It depends on how much travel there is." But the witness did not state how much travel there was. The other witness said that a track in the middle of a street would interfere with traffic "very extensively." But he went on to say: "Putting a street railway in such a street would interfere with the use of the street for other travel wherever you put it. But I should deem it advisable not to put any street railway in the center of such a narrow street, for the reason that it will obstruct the travel to such extent that teams, for instance, cannot pass each other on either side of the track without crossing the track. There would be no room on each side for teams to pass. * * * Of course it is practicable." The effect of this testimony is merely that in the opinion of the witnesses the requirement of the law is wrong, and that it is more convenient to the traveling public to have the track on the side of the street.

But the law certainly means more than this. It is an injustice to the property owners on one side of the street to have the obstruction placed close to their doors. And for this, among other reasons, the law requires that it must be placed as near the middle of the street as practicable, and enjoins a "strict compliance" with the requirement.

3. It is contended that the franchise is void because a subscriber to the stock of the company was a member of the board of city trustees, and took an active part in the proceedings in relation to the franchise; and we think that this position must be sustained. It appears that when the application for the franchise was made a number of protests were put in, and the matter was referred to a committee of two, of which E. W. Holmes was one. This committee made a report in writing, recommending that the application be granted. The report was adopted, and the franchise granted at the next meeting. Several months prior to this an agreement to subscribe to the capital stock of a street-car company to be formed on lines similar to those of the defendant was gotten up, and by it E. W. Holmes subscribed for 200 shares of stock. A committee of subscribers was appointed to apply for a franchise. The personnel of this committee was subsequently changed to some extent. The application was made by the committee, and was granted, on the favorable report of the committee of two, of which Holmes was a member, as above stated. Subsequently the committee made a deed of the franchise to the company. It is true that there was no testimony to show that E. W. Holmes, the city trustee, was the same person as E. W. Holmes, the subscriber. But, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, identity of person will be presumed from identity of name. It is also true that no corporation was formed at the time of the subscription, and that the franchise was granted to several individuals, and not to a company. But, as above shown, the individuals constituted a committee of the subscribers appointed for the purpose of applying for the franchise, and after they obtained it they transferred it to the company formed in pursuance of the subscription. We think that it sufficiently appears that the franchise was granted for the benefit of a corporation to be organized by a number of subscribers, of whom the city trustee was one, and was subsequently transferred to the corporation; and, taking this to be the fact, the case falls within the principle of San Diego v. Railroad Co., 44 Cal. 106. The trustee was one of a committee of two to whom the application was referred, and the favorable report of this committee, which was adopted by the board, must have influenced its action. In our opinion this vitiated the franchise. For the above reasons we think that the defendant was a mere intruder upon the street, and under the case of Weyl v. Railroad Co., above cited, the plaintiff can maintain ejectment against it. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

(No. 13,920.)

DEPOSITARIES OF PUBLIC MONIES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. The charter of Los Angeles, § 44, (Act Cal. Jan. 31, 1889,) directing the city council to appoint as a depositary of the public moneys the bank offering the highest rate of interest therefor, and the treasurer to deposit the city funds there daily, is void, being inconsistent with Const. Cal. art. 11, §§ 13, 16, 17, providing that the legislature shall not delegate to any private corporation, company, or individual the right to interfere with or control any county, city, or municipal money, and that the public moneys shall be deposited with the treasurer, and that making any profit out of such moneys shall be a felony; and also with Pen. Code Cal. §§ 424, 426, punishing by imprisonment the misappropriation of public moneys by the person charged with keeping them.

2. A tax-payer of the city can sue to enjoin the execution of an illegal contract by the city with a bank for the deposit with it of the public moneys.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. C. McFarland, S. M. White, and Graff, Gibbon & Creighton, for respondents

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by a resident, and tax-payer, against the city of Los Angeles, M. D. Johnson, treasurer of said city, and the City Bank, a private corporation. The purpose of the action is to enjoin the said treasurer from depositing the public moneys of the city with said bank, pursuant to a certain contract between the city and the bank. Defendants filed a general demurrer "that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." An answer and supplemental answer were filed, together with some affidavits, and the case was submitted. Subsequently the court rendered judgment, by which it was "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the demurrer to the complaint be sustained;" that plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction; that the order to show cause be discharged, and the action dismissed; and that defendants recover their costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and it is clear that the appeal turns upon the sufficiency of the complaint, and the correctness of the decision of the court upon the demurrer. Upon the face of the complaint appear the following facts: The city of Los Angeles is a municipal corporation existing under what is generally called a "freeholders' charter," formed in pursuance of the amendment of section 8 of article 11 of the state constitution, approved March 10, 1887, (St. 1887, p. 88.) The charter was approved by the senate and assembly on January 31, 1889. Section 44 of the charter provides, among other things, (in brief,) that it shall be the duty of the city clerk, on a certain day of January in each year, to advertise for sealed proposals from banks of deposit as to the terms upon which they will "receive and disburse the public moneys of said city." The proposals are to specify the rate of interest, estimated upon daily balances, which the bank will allow on the public moneys deposited; and "the bank offering the highest rate of interest shall be appointed the depositary of public moneys." After it is ascertained who is the highest bidder, the council is to enter into a contract with the bank, providing that the latter shall pay "all warrants drawn upon the city treasurer" so long as there is city money in the bank to meet the warrants on the various funds. Provision is made for a bond to be given by the bank. "Upon approval of such bond, and the signing of such contract, the council shall direct the city treasurer to deposit each day, when such bank is open for transaction of business, with the bank thus selected, all public moneys of said city by him collected or received. For each such deposit the treasurer shall take the receipt of the bank, and from and after the deposit of such money in said bank the treasurer and his bondsmen shall no longer be liable therefor." Under this section of the charter the city made the kind of contract provided for therein with the defendant the City Bank, and the defendant Johnson, treasurer, was, under such contract, about to deposit the public money in said bank when this action was commenced. The question presented is whether or not the provisions of said section 44 of the charter are constitutional and valid.

Section 6 of article 11 of the constitution provides that "cities and towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws;" and the amendment to section 8, of article 11, under which the Los Angeles charter was framed, provides that certain cities may frame charters for their own government, "consistent with and subject to the constitution and laws of this state." If, therefore, the provisions above stated of said section 44 of the charter in question are inconsistent either with the constitution or with any law which is "general" in the sense in which it is used in the clauses above quoted, then they are invalid and void. And we think that they are inconsistent with both. There are several clauses of the constitution which point to the intent that public moneys shall not be used by or for the benefit of private persons and corporations, but one or two of them only need be invoked here. Section 12 of article 11 provides that "the legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, company, association, or individual any power to make, control, appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with any county, city, town, or municipal improvement, money, property, or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise, or to levy taxes or assessments, or perform any municipal functions whatever." The only method proposed to avoid this provision is to say that while the legislature may not do the thing prohibited it may authorize its creatures, municipal corporations, to do it. But the thing which the legislature is forbidden to do it cannot delegate to another to do, unless such power of delegation is given by the constitution itself. And in other places there is such power of delegation given; for instance, in section 12 of article 11 the legislature is forbidden to impose taxes on municipalities for municipal purposes, but may, by general laws, vest such power in the municipal authorities; and in section 14 of the same article, the legislature is prohibited from creating any offices in municipalities for the inspection, etc., of merchandise, etc.; but it is provided that the municipality "may, when authorized by general law, appoint such officers." In section 13, however, there is no such power of delegation given. Under the construction contended for by respondent, while the legislature is prohibited by section 26 of article 4 from authorizing lotteries, it could give that power to municipalities. Again, carrying out the same intention, section 16 of article 11, which does not speak of the legislature, but deals directly with municipalities themselves, provides that all moneys of any municipal corporation coming into the hands of any officer thereof shall immediately be deposited "with the treasurer, or other legal depository, to the credit of such city, town, or other corporation, respectively, for the benefit of the funds to which they respectively belong." The word "treasurer" is the one by which the custodian of public money is usually designated, and he is a public officer; and the phrase "other legal depository" is clearly used to designate such public officer, whether he be called in any particular municipality "treasurer" or by some other name. It certainly does not mean a private individual or corporation. And in the case at bar the relation between the city and the City Bank, under the contract, is, we think, simply that of creditor and debtor,—the bank being a borrower of the public money. But if the bank could be held to be a public officer, then the contract would be in the face of section 17 of article 11, which provides that "the making of profit out of county, city, town, or other public money, or using the same for any purpose not authorized by law, by any officer having the possession or control thereof, shall be a felony, and shall be prosecuted and punished as prescribed by law." In this section the phrase "making of profit out of county, city, town, or other public money" is an independent clause, and, of itself, constitutes a felony, and is not dependent upon the subsequent words, "not authorized by law," so that these latter words need not be here construed.

We think, also, that the section of the charter under review is inconsistent with both the spirit and the letter of the general laws of the state relating to public moneys. For instance, section 426 of the Penal Code defines "public moneys" as including all moneys belonging to "any city, county, town, or district;" and section 424 provides that "each officer of this state, or of any county, city, town, or district of this state, and every other person charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement of public moneys, who" commits certain acts with respect to such public moneys as are enumerated in ten subdivisions of the section "is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one nor more than ten years, and is disqualified from holding any office in this state." This is certainly a "general law" within any reasonable definition of that term that could be suggested, and the forty-fourth section of the charter is clearly inconsistent with it. Counsel contend that said section 424 (Pen. Code) is qualified, in most part at least, by the words "without authority of law," which occur in the first subdivision. But, waiving here the meaning of the word "law," as applied to a charter adopted by only a part of the law-making power, it is sufficient to say that section 424 enumerates a great many things which one having custody of public moneys may do which are not "authorized by law" in any sense, and which are declared to be crimes punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and by debarment from office. But if a private corporation should commit any of these crimes, how could it be made to suffer the penalty prescribed? It has neither a body to be imprisoned, nor a right to hold office of which it could be deprived. It seems clear, therefore, that a scheme which places public moneys in the possession and control of a private corporation is entirely inconsistent with the provisions of the section of the Code above quoted. Without referring with further detail to other provisions of the constitution and the laws, our conclusion is that the parts of section 44 of the charter of the city above referred to, and the said contract attempted to be made under it, are inconsistent with both the constitution and the general laws of the state; that the complaint in this action states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer.

(The point is hinted at, though not pressed in the briefs, that a tax-payer cannot maintain this action. We suppose that counsel wish the case decided on its merits, and not upon an issue in the nature of one raised by a dilatory plea, for their arguments go almost entirely to the point of the constitutionality and validity of the part of the charter assailed. We think, however, that in this case, where it is proposed to take all the public moneys of the municipality out of the hands of their legal custodian, and place them in the possession and control of a private corporation, a tax-payer has sufficient interest in the subject-matter to prevent by suit the consummation of the illegal act.)

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

WILLS—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—INSANE DELUSIONS.

1. Delusions are conceptions that originate spontaneously in the mind without evidence of any kind to support them, and can be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis. They have no foundation in reality, and spring from a diseased or morbid condition of the mind.

2. Where a person persistently believes supposed facts which have no real existence except in his perverted imagination, and against all evidence and probability, and conducts himself, however logically, upon the assumption of their existence, he is, so far as they are concerned, under a morbid delusion, and delusion in that sense is insanity. But where the belief or aversion to the contestant was formed on an apparent cause, leading on his part to a view unjust and erroneous, this only shows an unfortunate error of judgment or a want of reasoning power, but not an absolute want of intellect on the subject. It shows a bad judgment upon an insufficient state of facts, but not that his conclusion was formed without any foundation in fact, apparent or otherwise.

3. It is not enough that a delusion may exist, but its connection with the testator's will must be made manifest and shown to have influenced its provisions before the will can be set aside and declared void.

4. Where it was claimed that the testator was the subject of an insane delusion, but admitted to be of sound mind on all other subjects not connected with such delusion, but which delusion, the evidence disclosed,—assuming such delusion to have ever existed,—was not present influencing him when he executed the will, held, that the will was valid.

5. While it seems harsh and cruel that a parent should disinherit one of his children and devise his property to others, or cut them all off and devise it to strangers, from some unworthy motive, yet as long as that motive, whether from pride or aversion, spite or prejudice, is not resolvable into mental perversion, no court can interfere.

6. It is enough that the law recognized the right of the parent to make such testamentary disposition of his property as he chooses to select as the subject of his bounty, and in the exercise of this right he may have reasons satisfactory to himself why some of his children should enjoy his estate while others are excluded. Some may be more deserving than others,—more needful of help, for various reasons; some may have contributed largely to its acquisition. These and other reasons may exert an influence in favor of some and in exclusion of others.

Appeal from circuit court, Clackamas county; FRANK J. TAYLOR, Judge.

W. W. Thayer and C. D. & D. C. Lauterett, for appellants. Ira Jones and D. Stuart, for respondent.

LORD, J. This was a proceeding instituted in the county court of Clackamas county by the contestant to have the order admitting to probate the will of her father, Cyrus W. Jones, deceased, vacated and annulled, and the will set aside and declared void. The will was executed on the 19th day of January, 1887, and the testator died on the 20th day of August, 1887, leaving several children, to whom he devised his property, with the sole exception of the contestant, who was excluded from its bounty. The proceeding resulted in a decree vacating the order, and setting aside the will as void, which was affirmed on appeal by a decreed of the circuit court, and from which this appeal is taken. The theory upon which the will is alleged to be void is that the testator, though conceded to be of sound mind upon all other subjects, was laboring under a delusion in relation to the legitimacy of his daughter, the contestant, causing him to entertain a violent hatred or insane aversion towards her, which rendered him wholly incapable of doing any legal act in which her interest was involved, and which so affected and influenced him at the time of the execution of his will as caused him to deprive her of all benefit in his estate. The record discloses that the testator was married to his wife on the 10th day of May, 1835, in the state of Ohio; that a few years thereafter they emigrated to Missouri, where they continued to reside until 1861, when they emigrated to Oregon, having at this time a family of 10 children, and settled in Marion county, on what is commonly known as "Mission Bottom." Here they continued to reside until 1865, when they started on a return trip to Missouri, taking with them two of their boys and three of their girls, one of whom is the contestant, and going by the way of California, where they stopped for a short time and where the two boys concluded to remain. The parents with these three daughters went on to Missouri, and after their arrival there his wife and the contestant of their own choice left him and went to Ohio, where they remained and never lived afterwards with him. The testator returned to Oregon in 1867 with the other two girls. He bought another farm in Marion county, where he resided for a few years, and then purchased the farm in Clackamas county, to which he moved, and where he was living when the will was executed and until his death. In 1872 he obtained a decree of divorce from his wife on the ground of desertion and cruel treatment. The evidence shows that the testator was a man of sensitive disposition and of a nervous and jealous temperament; that early after his marriage, and especially while he and his wife resided in Missouri, he became suspicious of her chastity, and entertained the belief that she was intimate with a man who met her near a certain spring for adulterous purposes, and that two of the children—the contestant and Calvin Jones—were the offspring of such adulterous embraces. He also expressed the belief that another person in Oregon, while they lived together here, was on intimate terms with her, and at one time sought to chastise him for his supposed conduct. This belief, however, in the infidelity of his wife and the illegitimacy of two of his children was not proclaimed from the housetop, or to every one; but with few exceptions, and those intimate friends, it was only communicated to his brothers. His daughters who lived with him are now married, and never seem to have heard of the matter or knew he entertained such a belief until the commencement of this suit. They knew that there was an estrangement between their parents and that they did not live happily together, but they never supposed the cause of it was due to any morbid delusion involving the chastity of their mother or the illegitimacy of any of the children. To avoid prolixity, we shall say our conviction from the evidences is that his wife was a chaste woman and faithful to her marriage vows, and that the two children named were not the spurious product of her adulterous embraces with another man; but the fact remains, according to the testimony of those to whom he confided his domestic troubles, that he always furnished some grounds for his belief. He identified the party and the place, and described the clandestine manner in which their improper meeting was affected. That such things could occur, or have occurred under less probable circumstances, will not be denied; they are only rendered improbable in the present instance by the absolute confidence expressed in her marital fidelity by her acquaintances. While, therefore, we shall regard this suspicion or belief of her infidelity to her marriage bed with its attendant circumstances as unjust and unworthy of belief, we cannot disregard the fact that there was the opportunity for the parties to have met at the spring, and that it might have occurred in reality for perfectly proper and innocent purposes or without evil design or any concert of action; yet to a man of the testator's sensitive and jealous disposition a trifling circumstance of this kind or a slightly imprudent act would incite his distrust and fill him with jealous suspicions. Whether there were any such visits to the spring near his residence, surreptitious or otherwise, by his wife and the suspected party while they lived in Missouri, there is nothing shown by the evidence, except his declarations, to the persons already referred to, that he had often seen such party go to the spring, when his wife would don her bonnet and go clandestinely to the same place. The evidence of those whose testimony leads to the conviction that his suspicions or accusations were unjust and unfounded rests not upon any knowledge of the facts one way or the other, but on their knowledge of her character and confidence in her chastity as inconsistent with such conduct. Mr. Sampson Jones and his wife, people of excellent character, and whose testimony is entitled to credit, to whom the testator perhaps talked and gave vent to his insinuations and suspicions with more freedom than any others, regarded his accusations of unchastity as unjust and untrue, and the circumstances which gave rise to them as too inconsistent with her character to be worthy of belief, and express the opinion that she was faithful to her marriage vows and the duties of a wife, and that in view of his conduct the testator was laboring under a delusion upon this matter. Stress and importance have been given to this phase of the case and the evidence, as it is the main starting point of his domestic woes and infelicities, of his suspicions of his wife's infidelity and the illegitimacy of his two children,—the contestant and her brother Calvin Jones. It is true that while they lived in Missouri and in Oregon between 1861 and 1865 their married lives were embittered by estrangements. Much of the time they refused to speak with each other or to conduct themselves in any way calculated to resume confidence and affection; and it was doubtless during some such period, when the cup of their domestic unhappiness was overflowing, that the testator was disposed to give vent to his feelings and indulge in unjust accusations against his wife's chastity in the manner described by some of his relatives. It was about this time, when the testator and his wife were estranged and not on speaking terms, although living together as husband and wife, that the conversation with Northcutt took place in which that witness represents him as inveighing with great temper and acrimony against his wife's marital infidelity. There is no doubt that he was extremely jealous of his wife, and entertained a strong suspicion, if not conviction, of her infidelity and his own dishonor. But this was the time when their domestic troubles were hastening to a culmination which finally ended in separation. When they arrived in Missouri after leaving this state in 1865, Mrs. Wright, one of the daughters, gives an account of the separation of the testator and her mother. She heard her mother say to her father: "You have brought me here with the intention of leaving me here;" and father said: "No, I did not; if you want to go to Oregon with us you can;" and that her mother said she was going to Ohio; that as to the children "he gave us the choice to stay or go with him; that mother left us and went to Ohio with Libby Potter, [the contestant,] and shortly after that we started for Oregon."

Mrs. White, the other daughter, testified to the same, substantially. The contestant remembered "that her mother and father had a conversation after they went back to Missouri about separating." She does not know the cause of it, except she thought they were in bad humor; nor had she ever heard of any insane delusion or insanity on the part of her father until after his death, and heard that from her attorneys; nor does she remember that she ever heard her mother say anything about it. She remembers that her father was not given to caressing his children,—never caressed her nor repulsed her. Thinks she disliked her father at the time her mother left him, and remembers that she preferred to go with her mother when she left her father in Missouri and went back to Ohio; that she slept with her mother and father on the trip at the foot of the bed; that he never whipped or abused her; that she saw him whip one of the children; that her father gave her mother some money when they left for Ohio, but does not think it exceeded $300; that her mother received notice of the divorce proceedings in Oregon while she was living in Ohio; that neither her mother nor the contestant ever lived with their father afterwards; that she is married and has two children, is in good circumstances, and resides in Missouri. The evidence shows that the testator and his other two daughters returned to Oregon, and finally settled in Clackamas county, and lived there until his death, in 1887. The subscribing witnesses to the execution of the will were old acquaintances living in the neighborhood, who had traded with him, hunted and traveled together, had visited at his house, attended school-meetings together, met at the stores and other places, and they concur in the opinion that his mind was sound and free from all disturbing influences when he executed his will; that he mentioned the portions to be given to each of the children, and betrayed no bad humor, or anything to indicate that he was not rational; that he understood his business and the property he possessed and how he wished to have it distributed. His physicians, who had known him for years and who attended him, also express the opinion that he was rational, knew what he was doing and how he was doing it, and that he was competent at the time to execute a will, and that it was the product of his own free agency. They did not interrogate him in respect to his family matters. They never had had any conversation with him on this subject, and perhaps knew nothing about it, and only think from what they saw and observed that his mind was free from any disturbing influences, and that when he executed his will he knew and understood what he was doing. The evidence also shows that during the last 20 years—from the time he returned to Oregon until his death—he acquired property, was industrious and frugal, was a man of good judgment and business sagacity, attended to his own affairs, dealt extensively with numerous persons, took a proper interest in neighborhood matters, lived to a ripe old age,—past threescore and ten,—and, with the children about him who had chosen to remain with him, made his will giving his property to them. His reasons for disposing of his property in the manner he did and of excluding the contestant from his bounty is, taking the statement of the witnesses together for brevity, that he had given to the contestant and her mother the shares to which they were entitled when they separated; that he understood his daughter (the contestant) was married and had a good home; that he told the children that all of them that wished to remain with him could do so, and that they did so except the contestant, but that he said nothing about her illegitimacy; that he had made up his mind that those who had remained with him and helped to earn it ought to have the benefit of it. Referring to the fact that he wished to will to his wife and the contestant one dollar, as he did when the will was executed, he was asked, "Why do you intend to make your will in that way?" and he said: "The reason is very simple. When I left Missouri the children all went with me except her, and I gave her [his wife] some money; and I came back here, and the children. I have made all that I have got now by my own hands, me and the children here, and that is the reason." That he was in good humor; did not seem to be annoyed, but felt that the children who had remained with and helped him to earn the property which he had acquired were the rightful objects of his bounty and justly entitled to it under the circumstances. The evidence also shows that at the times mentioned he was as firm in the suspicion or belief that his son Calvin Jones was illegitimate as the contestant, and that he had indicated such belief by much more emphatic language than he had ever indulged in of the contestant; yet he did not exclude him from his share of the estate, but provided for him the same as he had the other children, guided by the principle that those who had remained with him and helped to accumulate the property which he was entitled to dispose of were the proper recipients of his bounty, and its application included his son Calvin, whom he had denounced in the days of his domestic troubles and just before the separation from his wife as a "tow-headed bastard." In this review it will be seen nearly all the important facts in reference to his declarations of his wife's infidelity and the illegitimacy of the two children extend back nearly a quarter of a century, when their lives were embittered by estrangement and their paths rapidly diverging, which was soon to terminate in final separation and divorce. The latest evidence of real importance is Mrs. Jones', of what occurred about the time he procured his divorce in 1872, in which he reiterated his belief in his wife's infidelity and exhibited much temper in its asseveration. As to the circumstances upon which he predicates his belief in the infidelity of his wife and the illegitimacy of the two children, there is no evidence of their existence other than his declarations as stated by the witnesses; but we think the evidence shows that the testator believed that his wife was unfaithful to him, and so expressed himself to those whom he could talk with upon the subject as late as Mrs. Jones' evidence, to which we have just referred.

After this there is little or nothing heard of it, and that of little consequence, and when he did refer to it just before making his will it was without temper or reference to his former suspicions or accusations, and, by his conduct, indicating that his sense of injury was apparently healed over and its effects passed away. The important question for our decision now is, was his belief in the infidelity of his wife and the illegitimacy of the two children an insane delusion, and, if so, was he so affected by such delusion at the time of the execution of his will as caused him to deprive the contestant of all benefit in his estate? This necessarily leads to the inquiry, what is an insane delusion? Sir JOHN NICHOLL in the celebrated case of Dew v. Clark, 3 Addams, Ecc. 79, defined "insane delusions" in these words: "Wherever the patient once conceives something extravagant to exist, which still has no existence whatever but in his own heated imagination, and wherever at the same time, having so conceived, he is incapable of being, or at least of being permanently, reasoned out of the conception, such a patient is said to be under a delusion in a peculiar, half-technical sense of the term, and the absence or presence of delusion, so understood, forms in my judgment the true and only test or criterion of present or absent insanity." In Boughton v. Knight, 6 Eng. R. 352, Sir JOHN HANNEN adopted this definition, and expressed the belief that it would solve most if not all of the difficulties which arise in investigations of this kind. In Banks v. Goodfellow, L. R. 5 Q. B. 560, COCKBURN, C. J., says: "When delusions exist which have no foundation in reality, and spring only from a diseased and morbid condition of the mind, to that extent the mind must necessarily be taken to be unsound." Chief Justice DENIO said: "If a person persistently believes supposed facts which have no real existence except in his perverted imagination, and against all evidence and probability, and conducts himself, however logically, upon the assumption of their existence, he is, so far as they are concerned, under a morbid delusion; and delusion in that sense is insanity." Society v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 624. See, also, 11 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 107, tit. "Insanity." The belief of facts which no rational person would have believed is insane delusion. 1 Williams, Ex'rs, 35; 1 Redf. Wills, 71. And in a later case, (Middleditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726, 17 Atl. Rep. 826.) VAN FLEET, Vice-Ordinary, said that "according to these definitions, it is only a delusion or conception which springs up spontaneously in the mind of a testator, and is not the result of extrinsic evidence of any kind, that can be regarded as furnishing evidence that his mind is diseased or unsound; in other words, that he is subject to insane delusions. If, without evidence of any kind, he imagines or conceives something to exist which does not in fact exist, and which no rational person would, in the absence of evidence, believe to exist, then it is manifest that the only way in which his irrational belief can be accounted for is that it is the product of mental disorder. Delusions of this kind can be accounted for upon no reasonable theory except that they are the creations of the mind in which they originate." Tested by these definitions, can it be said upon the facts as disclosed by this record that the testator was beset with an insane delusion in respect to the legitimacy of the contestant and her brother? The circumstances which he relates and upon which his belief is founded fix the place, identify the person and the manner of the improper meeting, nor is there any attempt to deny that there was such a place or person or that such a meeting might not have occurred, only that the adulterous purposes which he ascribed and professed to believe to be the object of such meeting were so absolutely inconsistent with her known character for chastity as to be utterly unworthy of belief, and only to be accounted for in him upon the theory of an unnatural dislike or aversion which amounted to an insane delusion. The evidence in contradiction of his belief proceeds on the assumption that there may have been such a place and man and meeting, and if so, her known character for chastity, her every-day walk and life, render it impossible that it could have occurred for the foul purposes which he imputes, or otherwise than accidentally and without concert, or evil design in thought or deed. But these facts, however falsely or unjustly he may have reasoned from them, or however absurd his conclusions as applied to the wife and contestant impugned by them, nevertheless furnished the evidence which inspired his suspicions, and the ground upon which his belief was founded. It is conceded that the conclusions he drew from the facts are wholly unwarranted and without any justification, indicating at least an unrelenting, jealous disposition; but unjust and absurd as they may be, they were not the pure creations of a perverted imagination without any foundation in reality. Delusions are conceptions that originate spontaneously in the mind without evidence of any kind to support them, and can be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis. The mind that is so disordered imagines something to exist, or imputes the existence of an offense, which no rational person would believe to exist or to have been committed without some kind of evidence to support it. They are as baseless as the fabric of a dream conjured into existence by a disordered or perverted imagination without any sort of foundation in fact. As in Snee v. Snee, 5 Prob. Div. 84, the testator imagined himself to be the son of George IV., and that when he was born a large sum of money had been put in his father's hands for him, but which his father in fraud of his rights had distributed to his brothers; or as in Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 398, the testatrix imagined herself to be one of the persons of the Trinity, and her chief legatee to be another. In cases like these the belief is the offspring of a disordered mind, and not induced by the existence of any facts or occurrences which could lead any sort of countenance to it. The case at bar is not such. Here there is a claim of facts upon which the belief is founded; and unjust and unfeeling as may be such belief, in view of the known character of his wife for chastity, it is not the spontaneous product of pure fancy, but a grave error showing a lack of judgment or a want of reasoning powers, the outcome of an oversensitive, jealous disposition, prone to exaggerate any trifling circumstance with which his wife may be connected into an unworthy and wicked importance, and to draw from them conclusions untenable, illogical, and unworthy of belief. There is no doubt that the testator was extremely jealous of his wife, and, like all such, disposed to magnify any act or trifling occurrence into undue importance, and to make it the occasion to draw unworthy conclusions of her marital integrity. The experience of mankind has demonstrated that a wife may have a spotless character, she may be justly regarded in the estimation of her friends as without moral blemish and worthy of all confidence and affection, and yet it might happen to her to do some trivial act which would pass unnoticed by them, or any one except the Arguseyes of an ever-watchful and jealous husband, who would stand ready to draw base conclusions from it derogatory to her chastity and character. To minds thus constituted, sometimes even a look of the wife, or perhaps a facetious or inadvertent remark, or some insignificant circumstance with which she may be associated, although it be wholly innocent, excites their distrust, and fills them with jealous rage; for it is as true now as when first uttered that "trifles light as air are, to the jealous, confirmations strong as proof of holy writ." To support the contention for the contestant, the belief or suspicion the testator entertained of his wife's infidelity and the illegitimacy of the children to be an insane delusion must have been wholly without foundation in reality, and the mere figment of his perverted imagination. But the evidence discloses that it was formed on an apparent cause, leading on his part to a view of his wife's conduct which we have admitted was erroneous, unjust, and unnatural; yet this only shows an unfortunate error of judgment or a want of reasoning power, but not an absolute want of intellect upon the subject. The conclusion which he drew from the facts was untenable and erroneous, and showed that he formed a bad judgment upon an insufficient state of facts, but does not show that his conclusion or belief was formed without any foundation in fact whatever. But even if we assume that his belief was utterly groundless and without any cause, actual or apparent, to justify it, would that authorize us, in view of the circumstances of this cause, to declare the testator was the victim of an insane delusion? In Re Cole's Will, 49 Wis. 181, 5 N. W. Rep. 348, Lyon, J., said: "It must be conceded that the belief of the deceased in respect to the unchastity of his wife, persisted in as it was without evidence to support it, and against all reasonable probabilities of its truth, looks very much like insane delusion. Yet it is not necessarily so. Observation teaches us that there is a very large class of people, whose sanity is undoubted, who are unduly jealous or suspicious of others, and especially of those closely connected with them, and who upon the most trivial, even whimsical, grounds, will wrongfully impute the worst motives and conduct to those in whom they ought to confide. This insanity, which is developed in a great variety of forms, is altogether too common, and too many persons confessedly sane are to a greater or less extent afflicted with it, to justify us in saying that because the deceased was so afflicted he was insane or the victim of insane delusion. The line between the unfounded and unreasonable suspicions of a sane mind (for doubtless these are such) and insane delusions is sometimes quite indistinct and difficult to be defined." Nor is it enough that a delusion may have existed, but its connection with the will must be made manifest, and shown to have influenced its provisions, before the will can be set aside and declared void.

Nor must it be generally overlooked, in considering this point, that the period of time when the principal witnesses express the opinion that he was the victim of an insane delusion about the chastity of his wife relates to conduct and conversation and circumstances that occurred many years ago; that he was divorced from his wife in 1872, and that in the year succeeding little or nothing of real importance is ever heard of his suspicions, and when he did speak of her or the contestant in relation to the matter in hand it was with composure, or without insinuations against her marital integrity or the legitimacy of the children. It is necessary, therefore, to show not only that he was the subject of a delusion, an insane hatred or aversion to his daughter, but that it was present when he executed his will, and influenced him in the making of it and in excluding her from its benefits. Upon this point the evidence has already been detailed, and it will be sufficient to briefly advert to it to show that those who were present at the execution of the will, including the subscribing witnesses and his physicians, all concur in the opinion that he was in the possession of all his faculties and free from any mental disturbance impairing his free agency; that he understood the extent of his property, and specified those among whom he wished it to be distributed. Several other witnesses there are with whom he conversed just prior to the making of his will which show his reasons for excluding the contestant, and his appreciation of the claims of those upon whom he thought his property ought to be bestowed. Among these were that the contestant was then in good circumstances; that she had separated from him in early life and chose to remain with her mother; that the property he had acquired was earned by himself and those to whom he intended to will it; that they had helped to lighten his burdens, sympathized with him and cheered him in adversity and disappointment, and were partners in its accumulation,—the justice of whose claims entitle them to it. Among those to whom he distributed his property was Calvin Jones, whom he had considered, as the contestant, to be illegitimate in the years gone by, yet he gave him his share based upon the principle already stated, and which he conceived to be just, and not on account of any belief in his illegitimacy. It would seem if he had been beset by any delusion of this kind it would have operated against him, for its effect is to impair free agency and cause the testator to do what he otherwise would not have done but for the presence of such delusion. His conduct before and at the time of the execution of the will are inconsistent with the existence of such delusion; no feeling of hatred or aversion is evinced; his mind acts from a sense of justice and affection which he feels he owes to those who have been his co-laborers, including Calvin, and influenced by that principle he distributes his estate accordingly. It may be harsh, and under some circumstances cruel, to disinherit one child and to distribute the estate among the others, but if the testator be of sound mind and execute his will as prescribed by law no court can interfere. "It may be contrary to the principles of justice and humanity, its provisions may be shockingly unnatural and extremely unjust, nevertheless, if it appears to have been made by a person of sufficient age to be competent to make a will, and also to be the free and unconstrained product of a sound mind, the courts are bound to uphold it." Middleditch v. Williams, supra. Sir JOHN HANNEN said: "He may disinherit either wholly or partially his children, and leave his property to strangers, to gratify his spite, or charities to gratify his pride, and we must give effect to his will however much we may condemn the course he has pursued." Boughton v. Knight, supra. And among the considerations which turn the scale in favor of the exercise of this testamentary power which may disregard the claim of kindred and disappoint their expectations, COCKBURN, C. J., mentioned these: "Among those who, as a man's nearest relations, would be entitled to share the fortune he leaves behind, some may be better provided for than others; some may be more deserving than others; some, from age, sex, or physical infirmity, may stand in greater need of assistance. Friendship and tried attachment or faithful services may have claims that ought not to be disregarded. In the power of rewarding dutiful and meritorious conduct, paternal authority finds a useful auxiliary; age secures the respect and attention which are its chief consolations." Banks v. Goodfellow, supra. The law is settled that if a testator, competent to make a will, executes it according to law, it cannot be disturbed for an inequality or unreasonableness in the distribution of his estate. He is under no obligation to devise it equally to his children or otherwise, but may devise it to a stranger. That fact may be considered as a circumstance in determining testamentary capacity, but, of itself, is not sufficient to set it aside. Where a delusion exists, and it is shown to have had an influence on the testamentary disposition of the property, as in Dew v. Clark, supra, consisting of an aversion to kindred, it is usually accompanied "with other signs," says Sir JOHN HANNEN, "which may be relied on to assist us in forming an opinion upon that point." In the case at bar we look in vain for them, but in that case it was the extraordinary importance the testator attached to medical electricity as a means of cure, which he conceived might be applied to almost every purpose. That case well illustrates the existence of a delusion, which consisted in an insane hatred without even the shadow of a cause of his child, persisted in through life, and his will, being shown to be the direct offspring of this delusion, was set aside and declared void. The facts in that case show that the testator entertained an unnatural dislike to his only daughter, whom he imagined vile and profligate, and whom he treated with the utmost severity, stripping her naked and unmercifully flogging her, and then rubbing her back with brine, compelling her to do degrading work, denying her decent clothes, denouncing her whenever she came in his presence, when she was in fact amiable, of superior talents, dutiful and affectionate; indicating that his instincts and affection had become perverted, and his mind a prey to an insane delusion which had affected his will and cut her off with an inadequate provision. But what possible similitude can the case at bar bear to that case? It is true the father of the contestant did not caress her, nor does it seem that he did the other children; but he did not repulse her, and she owns that she disliked him, and perhaps justly, but he did not whip her although he did some of the other children; nor did he maltreat her, or make any display of any unkind feeling. When his wife decided to leave him and the contestant chose to go with her he gave them money, and the preponderance of evidence is that he gave them their share of what he then possessed. He does not seem to have been a lovable man. He was sensitive and jealous, and, like all such, when brooding over some supposed wrong, indulged in a harsh and cruel judgment against the fidelity of his wife and the legitimacy of two of the children, but this conduct was marked by no course of harsh treatment, no bursts of violence, no display of outrages, or other indignities that we have noticed, and these were only denounced to a few, and generally to those in whom he had a right to confide. The truth is, after their separation, as time passed his sense of injury seems to have gradually healed over and its effects to have passed away, for after this he begins to acquire property, to take an interest in the affairs of his community, and to command the respect and confidence of his friends and acquaintances for his probity and business character, and during all this time so little is said by him to any one of his former grievances or belief, that his daughters are not aware of it until the commencement of this trial. Nor can we find any case upon facts analogous to these, in which it has been held fatal to the validity of the will. In a recent case, (Barbo v. Rider, 67 Wis. 600, 31 N. W. Rep. 155,) in which it was held that the appellant was the victim of an insane delusion and mentally incompetent to care for himself or his estate, the evidence showed that his health had been impaired by excessive drinking; that after living happily with his wife for more than 20 years, suddenly and without cause he conceived the idea she had been untrue to him, that she submitted her person to the criminal embraces of a number of men, some of whom she scarcely knew, and that some of these men had begotten children upon her; that he charged her with it and repeated it to all who would listen to him, wrote an incoherent and indecent letter on the subject, became morose and sullen, ceased to take any interest in his family or business, and wandered aimlessly into the fields; that he begged for a division of the property, refused to take medicine, and believed that his friends were trying to poison him. As the court said: "No argument is required to prove that such a change in the nature and conduct of Barbo, such unreasonableness and unfounded hallucinations respecting the chastity of his wife, and his causeless hostility to his family, which yield to no reason or persuasion, are sufficient evidence that he is the unfortunate victim of insane delusion." These cases illustrate delusions, but they are essentially different from the case under consideration. While it seems harsh and cruel, so counter to all the feelings of our nature, that a parent should disinherit one of his children and devise his property to the others, or to cut them all off and devise it to strangers, from some unworthy motive, yet so long as that motive, whether from pride or aversion, spite or prejudice, is not resolvable into mental perversion, no court can interfere. Reliance can usually be placed on the affections, independent of the law, which parents have for their children, to recognize their claim in the testamentary disposition of their estate. But while this is so, the law recognizes the right of the testator to leave his property to whomsoever he chooses to bestow it, and in the exercise of that right, he may have reason satisfactory to himself why some of his children should enjoy his estate while others are excluded. Some may be more deserving than others,—more needful of help for various causes; some may have contributed largely to its acquisition. These and various other reasons may exert an influence in favor of some and in exclusion of others. The law being so, upon the facts as disclosed by this record, we must give it as our judgment that the will of the testator, sought to be impeached by this proceeding, is valid, and not the product of an insane delusion; and in conclusion it is perhaps due to say that whatever suspicions or belief the testator entertained of his wife's infidelity are refuted by this record; that no wife or mother could be guilty of dishonoring the bed of her husband, and bastardizing her children, whose reputation for chastity and the domestic duties were attested by so many respectable witnesses and contradicted by none. The decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

DIVORCE—GROUNDS—DISEASE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence examined, and held insufficient to entitle plaintiff to a divorce.

Appeal from circuit court, Lake county; L. R. WEBSTER, Judge

Wm. M. Coloig and P. P. Prim, for appellant. C. A. Cogswell and W. D. Fenton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a suit for divorce, on the ground of extreme cruelty. The only ground upon which plaintiff relies in this court for her divorce is the communication to her by defendant of a venereal disease. The evidence is voluminous, and of such a character as renders it highly improper to make any extended extracts therefrom. The question is one of fact, and we deem it only necessary to briefly indicate our conclusions, arrived at after a careful and painstaking examination of the evidence. The parties were married on May 11, 1887, at Lakeview, after an acquaintance of only 15 days, and continued to live together as husband and wife until about the 20th of June, 1888, when plaintiff went to San Francisco on a visit, intending to return in a few weeks. After arriving in San Francisco she concluded to separate from defendant, and has from that time continued so to do. The evidence indicates that she married defendant, not on account of any love for him, but with the expectation that "she could leave him afterwards and get some of his money." We think the evidence fails to show a case entitling her to a divorce on the ground indicated. If the disease with which she was affected four or five months after marriage was a venereal disease, and was communicated to her by her husband,—a question, however, by no means free from doubt,—she was informed by him of his probable diseased condition, and the infectious nature of the disease, some 10 or 12 days after marriage, and as soon as he discovered the fact; and, in place of showing that surprise and indignation which would naturally have been exhibited by an innocent, pure-minded woman, she seems only to have been concerned about her own safety. She showed no surprise whatever, but quietly advised him to consult a physician of her acquaintance, and obtain medical treatment, and continued for more than a year, and down to the very last night they were together, willingly and without protest, to submit to his embraces. When she started on her visit to San Francisco, in June, 1888, she did so with the intention of returning in a few weeks to live with him as his wife. It was not until her arrival in San Francisco, her residence before marriage, that she concluded to separate from him. She does not in her testimony claim that she refused to live with him because of the acts charged in the complaint, but because he did not send her the amount of money after her arrival in San Francisco she desired. While she was writing and telegraphing to defendant for money, she was consulting with an attorney in San Francisco about a divorce, and the first indication defendant received that she contemplated leaving him was a letter from her attorney demanding $10,000, and consent to her obtaining a divorce in San Francisco. The communication by a husband of a venereal disease to his wife knowingly is undoubtedly a good and sufficient cause for a divorce, and cruelty of the most flagrant kind, but when, as in this case, the wife, after being informed of the diseased condition of her husband, and the nature of the disease, consents, willingly and without objection, to continue the marital relations, as did the plaintiff, a court of equity will not aid her in obtaining a divorce, especially when it is apparent that the principal object of the marriage and suit is to obtain a portion of defendant's property. The evidence in this case does not present either of these parties in a favorable light before a court of equity. The conduct of defendant, as disclosed by the testimony, is in many respects to be condemned, and we think he should pay the costs of this suit, both in this court and in the court below. Affirmed, at defendant's costs.

(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 28, 1891.)

COLLECTION.

1. The shares of stock of a national bank are taxable to the owners, and the bank is not liable primarily, or as the agent of the shareholders, under the act of congress, or the revenue laws of this territory, for the payment of a tax levied upon such shares.

2. But if such bank, through its proper officers, voluntarily list such shares as the property of the bank for taxation, and the taxing officers of the territory, in pursuance of such erroneous listing, tax the same in the name of the bank, equity will not relieve the bank from the payment of such tax by enjoining its collection, in the absence of a proper application to all the statutory tribunals authorized to hear such matter and determine and grant the proper relief.

3. Equity will not restrain by injunction the collection of a tax on the ground of excessive valuation, unless the party complaining has exhausted his legal remedies.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, Bernalillo county.

O'BRIEN, J. The complainant, on the 3d day of November, A. D. 1888, filed his bill of complaint in the district court for the county of Bernalillo against the defendants, Jose L. Perea, sheriff and ex officio collector of taxes, and Clifford L. Jackson, district attorney, of said county, for the purpose of obtaining an injunction restraining them from enforcing the collection of certain delinquent taxes assessed to the complainant. The bill, in substance, alleges that complainant made due returns to the county assessor of all its property for taxation. That at such time it protested against the assessment of its property, to-wit, its capital stock and surplus, at any higher rate of valuation than other property taxable in said county, and that it ought not to be assessed at its par value; that is, "that its stock could not be assessed at par, and its surplus at its full money value, because other property in said county and territory is not assessed at its full value." That the assessor, disregarding such protest, assessed said property at its full value. That, upon complainant's appeal from the action of the assessor to the board of county commissioners sitting as a board of equalization, the assessment on its surplus was reduced to 85 per cent. of its par value, while that of its capital stock was left unchanged. That its property valuation then stood as follows: Capital stock, $100,000; surplus, $10,000; total, $110,000. The bill proceeds: "That all other property in said county and territory is not assessed at nearly so high a valuation upon its actual value as said board of equalization assessed your orator's said property. That the average valuation of other property in the hands of individuals and other corporations in said county and territory does not exceed seventy per cent., and that it is so assessed systematically and continuously by the said assessor of said county and said board of equalization, and no valuation estimated upon its actual value of at least thirty per cent." That bank-stocks in a neighboring county are assessed at less than 85 per cent. of their value. That such discrimination is inequitable, unjust, and unlawful. That the amount of taxes upon said equalized assessment is the sum of $2,189. That such amount, if lawfully and equitably assessed, would be reduced to $1,532.30, which sum complainant brings into court, and tenders to defendant Perea. That said defendant refused to accept the same, and threatened to levy upon complainant's property to enforce the payment of the full amount so assessed. The bill continues: "Your orator further alleges that, should it pay the sum so unlawfully demanded of it by virtue of said assessment, and bring suit at law for the recovery thereof as is illegal and unjust, such suit would be unavailing, for the reason that any judgment recovered by your orator against said county of Bernalillo or territory of New Mexico would be paid in warrants of the said county and territory, which said warrants are not worth their face value, but are sold upon the market at a discount, there being no funds in the treasury with which to pay the same, if presented." The bill then informs the court of the legal effect of a forced sale of complainant's property. Then follows the prayer for a writ of injunction, etc. On November 29, 1889, complainant, by leave of the court, filed a supplemental bill, containing additional allegations, in substance as follows: That the shares of its capital stock can only be assessed to the individual owners thereof, and are not subject to assessment and taxation as the property of the bank; that a large portion of such capital stock is owned by non-resident heads of families; that a large portion of complainant's capital stock is invested in government bonds, etc. Defendants demurred to some and answered other portions of the bill. The parties then filed a stipulation, in accordance with which complainant struck from its original and supplemental bills all allegations that the assessor and board of equalization unjustly discriminated in the valuation and assessment of complainant's property. Defendants then withdrew their answer, and stood upon their general demurrer to the bills as amended. The demurrer was sustained, and judgment entered dismissing the bill. The cause is in this court by appeal from such judgment of dismissal. The appellant assigns as error: First. The order of the court below sustaining defendants' demurrer to the supplemental bill. Second. The demurrer did not answer the allegations that the assessment was upon complainant's capital stock and surplus, and was in solido, and against complainant, and not against its shareholders, and was therefore void. Third. The demurrer did not apply to the original bill, and the court therefore erred in dismissing the same. Fourth. Neither of the assessments for either of the years 1888 or 1889, alleged to have been made on the capital stock, surplus, and personal property of the complainant, against the complainant, and not against the shareholders, is valid, but they are void on their face, and both the assessor and board of county commissioners sitting as a board of equalization were wholly without jurisdiction to make the same; and the pretended tax-rolls referred to in complainant's bills confer no authority on the defendant collector to enforce the payment of said tax assessment. We shall consider the four assignments together. The statutes of the territory (sections 2822-2825, Comp. Laws 1884) impose the duty upon the assessor to make a proper return of all taxable property in his county, and require all taxable inhabitants to furnish such assessor with a list of all their taxable property, duly verified. The complainant made and delivered to the assessor such list, embracing the property referred to in the bill, including the shares of its capital stock. A certain percentage was extended on all this property at its par value for the purpose of taxation. No complaint was ever made to the assessor or to the county board of equalization that complainant did not own the property so voluntarily listed. Its sole objection was that its property had been assessed higher than a similar property owned by other parties, and that such discrimination was illegal. The public officers had a right to assume that the bank had no other grievance to redress. It never hinted that it had been mistaken in listing the shares of its capital stock as its individual property instead of the property of its shareholders. In such case, when complainant had had ample opportunity to have its error corrected by the proper statutory tribunal, it would be unfair to the public interests to allow it for the first time in its supplemental bill in this suit to set up as the basis of a bill in equity to restrain the collection of a tax its own mistake that misled the revenue officers of the territory, and its subsequent negligence in failing to ask the proper tribunal to relieve it from the consequences thereof. Admitting that the shares of its capital stock should not be assessed in solido to it, but to the respective owners, according to interest, we hold that it cannot be heard in this suit to complain of such erroneous assessment. Complainant, and not the public, should be made to suffer the consequences of such mistake. In considering the other points presented by the record, to-wit, that the property taxed was rated at a higher valuation than similar property owned by individuals and other private corporations, it does not appear that such property was valued higher than its market value, but that it was valued too high in comparison with similar property owned by others. We hold that such inequality alone does not afford ground for equitable relief in the present case. It was complainant's duty to apply to all the tribunals established by the laws of the territory to grant the desired relief. See chapter 73, Laws 1887. Failing in this, equity will not restrain the collection of the tax on account of such errors. Meyer v. Rosenblatt, 78 Mo. 495. If the county board refused complainant the reduction demanded, an appeal lay to the territorial board, and, having failed to take such appeal in the manner prescribed by the statute, complainant is not entitled to the relief sought. The foregoing views are, in our opinion, a sufficient answer to all the substantial grounds of error presented by the record. It follows that the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(5 N. M. 533)

ARMIGO et al. v. ABEYTIA et al.

(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. Term, 1891.)

APPEAL—REQUISITES—FILING TRANSCRIPT—ACCORD AND SATISFACTION.

1. Under Comp. Laws N. M. 1884, § 2189, providing that if appellant fail to file in the supreme court, at least 10 days before the first day of the term to which the appeal is returnable, a transcript of the record, the appellee may produce in court such transcript, and have the judgment affirmed, unless good cause is shown to the contrary, a motion to affirm will be denied when filed after appellant has filed the transcript less than 10 days before the commencement of the term.

2. Rule 23 of the supreme court provides that appellant shall deliver to the attorney of the adverse party, at least 10 days before the first day of the term, two printed copies of the transcript, and, in case appellant fails to furnish the copies, appellee may, on 24 hours' notice, move on the second day of the term to dismiss or affirm. Comp. Laws N. M. 1884, § 2189, provides that, on appellant's failure to file a transcript 10 days before the first day of the term, the judgment may be affirmed on appellee's motion, "unless good cause is shown to the contrary." Held, that where it appears from the affidavit of appellant's counsel that appellant was a poor man, and unable to get the money to pay for printing the transcript until less than 10 days before the first day of the term, the judgment would not be affirmed on appellee's motion, under rule 23.

3. In an action on a sealed contract by which plaintiffs rented to defendants a number of ewes at a certain rent, the ewes to be returned at the termination of the lease, or $1.25 a head to be paid for all not returned by reason of "accident," and $1.50 for those disposed of "in any other manner," a plea of accord and satisfaction is bad that sets up that defendants entered into a new contract with plaintiffs, whereby one of defendants agreed to hold the balance of the ewes, after having redelivered a part, and to pay therefor 20 cents per head annual rent, instead of 25 cents as stipulated by the original contract, and that the new contract was executed by that defendant's continuing to hold the sheep thereunder, and that it was agreed that this new contract should be a full and complete satisfaction of the original contract.

4. The fact that the sheep were attached and sold by a creditor of one of defendants, and that plaintiffs replevied them, but afterwards dismissed the suit, constitutes no defense to plaintiffs' suit for the value of those not returned.

5. For the sheep thus attached and sold, defendants must pay $1.50 apiece, as their loss in this manner is not "accident," within the terms of the contract.

6. Where the contract provides that "the said property [sheep] is to be considered the same as money received," a right of action for its value arises immediately upon the breach, and plaintiffs cannot recover rent also for the time after such breach.

Appeal from district court, Bernalillo county.

William B. Childers, for appellants. Neill B. Field, for appellees.

SEEDS, J. The abstract of the record in this case was filed in the supreme court upon January —, 1889, being only — days before the first day of the January term of that year. The appellants failed to deliver to the attorney of the appellees two copies of the transcript 10 days before the first day of the term, as required by rule 23 of the rules of the supreme court. The first day of the 1889 term fell upon January 7th. Upon the 5th day of January, 1889, the appellees gave notice to the appellants that they would upon January 8th, being the second day of the term, move the court to strike the case from the docket, and affirm the judgment of the district court. They filed their affidavit and motion, in accordance with that notice, upon January 8, 1889. The motion of the appellees was predicated upon two grounds, viz.: (1) "Because you did not, at least ten days before the first day of the January term, 1889, of said supreme court, file in the office of the clerk of said court a complete transcript of the record and proceedings in said cause." (2) "Because you did not, a least ten days before the first day of the said term of said supreme court, deliver to Neill B. Field, the attorney for the appellees, two printed copies of the transcript of the record in said cause." Counsel for appellees strenuously contends for the rights of his clients under this motion; and as the questions therein raised, if now decided, may definitely settle a matter of procedure, the motion will be considered with some thoroughness.

The two grounds of the motion involve the construction of a section of the Compiled Laws of New Mexico of 1884, (section 2189,) and also of a rule of the supreme court, (No. 23.) Section 2189 provides substantially as follows: The appellant shall file in the supreme court, at least 10 days before the first day of such court to which the appeal is returnable, a perfect transcript of the record and proceedings in the case. If he fail to do so, the appellee may produce in court such transcript; and, if it appears thereby that an appeal has been allowed in the cause, the court shall affirm the judgment, unless good cause shall be shown to the contrary. The facts show that the record was not filed as herein contemplated, but it was filed some — days before the first day of the term, and before the appellee filed his motion to affirm the judgment. Is the motion, upon this ground, well taken?

1. The object of the statute is, undoubtedly, to assure promptness in obtaining the decision of the appellate court, in order that the successful litigant in the nisi prius court, if rightfully entitled to his judgment or decree, may not, by negligence or willful dereliction on the part of the appellant, be deprived of his rights. However, it is evident that the enforcement of the appellee's rights under this statute, in the first instance, depends upon his own action. The appellant is prima facie negligent, and loses his right to prosecute his appeal, when less than 10 days remain before the first day of the term, and the transcript is not filed. Then is the time for the appellee to move; for immediately, in contemplation of law, his rights are infringed. He then has a duty to perform,—a duty just as imperative as the previous duty of the appellant,—and that is to produce in court the transcript, and move to affirm the judgment. If he fails to do so, but allows the appellant to file the transcript, the presumption certainly arises that, as he has not moved before, he does not consider his rights interfered with. The appellee contends that it would be a useless and vain thing for him, after the appellant had filed the transcript, to also file a transcript, and then move to affirm the judgment; that the appellant's is sufficient. True, it would be useless and vain; but the error of the learned counsel is in assuming that, immediately upon the closing of the 10 days without appellant's filing the record, he has an absolute right to have the judgment affirmed. If he fails to act with promptness, he may in effect extend the day of grace to his adversary, who may take advantage of it, as in this case. While such statutes should not be so interpreted as to render them easy of evasion, and of no practical value, at the same time they should have some flexibility, so that they may not be oppressive. This holding is not without the support of respectable authorities. Rule 9 of the supreme court of the United States is essentially the same as the statute under consideration; and that court has held that it does not consider the rule as applying where the transcript has been filed by the appellant before the motion to dismiss. Bingham v. Morris, 7 Cranch, 99; Owings v. Tiernan, 10 Pet. 24; Sparrow v. Strong, 3 Wall. 103; Evans v. Bank, 134 U. S. 330, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493.

2. The second ground of the appellee's motion is based upon a portion of rule 23 of the rules of the supreme court, which reads as follows: "And he [the appellant] shall also deliver to the attorney of the adverse party, at least ten days before the first day of the term, two printed copies of said transcript of record." * * * In case the appellant or plaintiff in error neglects to furnish to the adverse party the said number of copies of the transcript of record, the latter shall be entitled to move, on affidavit and twenty-four hours' notice of motion, on the second day of the term, that the cause be stricken from the docket, and the judgment appealed from be affirmed, or the appeal dismissed." It will be noticed that, as to this rule, the day upon which the motion can be filed is fixed,—the second; that it is based upon affidavit and notice of the motion to the appellant 24 hours before its being filed. While the rule contemplates that these copies should be delivered 10 days before the first day, yet it would seem that the delay would not be fatal, if delivered before the filing of the motion; for the rule says, "in case the appellant neglects to furnish," etc., not "neglects to furnish ten days before," etc. But in this case the appellants have neglected to furnish the copies in accordance with the rule, and the appellees have in every particular complied with the requirements as to filing their motion for dismissal. While there is no direct adjudication in the reported cases of the territory upon this rule, yet there are negative expressions in a number of cases which plainly indicate the opinion of the supreme court upon it. In Evans v. Baggs, 4 N. M. 147, 13 Pac. Rep. 207, the court says: "When it is desired to strike out records under this rule, all the requirements of the rule must be complied with. The motion must be filed upon the second day of the term, supported by affidavit; and notice must be served upon appellant or his counsel, twenty-four hours previous to the filing of the motion, that it will be filed, and upon what ground it is based." See, also, Mora v. Schlick, 4 N. M. 158, 13 Pac. Rep. 341. The motion under consideration, as to its second ground, fully complied with the rule as interpreted by this court in the above citation. It would seem, therefore, that the motion as to the second ground was well taken, and should be sustained. However, there is another phase of this motion which requires attention. The statute (section 2189) says, among other things, that "the court shall affirm the judgment unless good cause shall be shown to the contrary." The appellant's counsel filed an affidavit in this court alleging that his client was a poor man, and was not able to obtain the money with which to procure a transcript of record of the case until after the time for filing it in the clerk's office had expired. Was this such good cause shown as to take the case out of the statutes? It is not the duty of the attorney to furnish the means for his client. The fact that a man is poor is not, as a general rule, a reason why he should be shown any more leniency than a prosperous person. At the same time, where a man is poor, and makes a laudable effort to protect his rights, and is temporarily embarrassed, he should not be denied the merciful provisions of the law, when by granting it the adversary is in no worse position than he would have been if the unfortunate litigant had been able to do certain acts a few days earlier. It is true that the affiant has not said that his client used due diligence, commensurate with his circumstances, to procure the needed money; but, as the record shows that the transcript was filed five days before the first of the term, the presumption here would certainly be that he had made diligent effort. Of course, as his transcript was in time any way, under the construction heretofore given to the statute, the question is only material upon the second ground. Are we justified in making any exceptions to rule 23? It is conceivable that, if we are not, the righteousness of the statute in its desire to save the rights of those who have failed to file the transcript, but could not do so, in time, though for "a good cause," would be nullified. Suppose a transcript was procured, but before it was filed, through no fault whatever of the appellant, it was burned or stolen; that with all possible celerity it would be impracticable to obtain a new one and file it before the third day of the term. Now, clearly, this would be "a good cause," under the statute, to interfere in behalf of the appellant; but, if the court has no power to relax the rigor of rule 23, all the appellee would have to do would be to file his notice, affidavit, and motion on the second day, and absolutely deprive the court of its undoubted right under the statute. It does not seem to us that the rule contemplates any such suicidal procedure; but, rather, that while rule 23 is to be sustained in its rigor in all cases where the transcript is in existence in time for a proper filing, yet when the failure to file copies with the adverse attorney in accordance with the rule is because of a failure to file the transcript with the clerk in time, and for that failure there is "a good cause" under the statute, then the same cause will apply to the failure under the rule, and justify this court in refusing to enforce its provisions. It will be borne in mind, however, that we lay down no general rule by which rule 23 can be dispensed with. Each case depends solely upon its own peculiar facts. The affidavit filed in this case, "showing a good cause to the contrary," why the penalties of the statute should not be enforced, and it being evident that the failure in this particular case, under rule 23, is dependent upon the failure under the statute, we believe that the motion of the appellee should be overruled.

This is a case in covenant, upon a contract under seal. The declaration substantially alleges that the plaintiffs' testator rented to the defendants 4,087 ewes for a time determinable at the pleasure of either party; that the defendants were to pay a rental of 25 cents per ewe each year, in advance, upon the 25th of August; that if, by reason of accident, the defendants could not redeliver any of said ewes, then they were to be paid for at the rate of $1.25 each, but, if they were disposed of by said defendants "in any other manner," then they were to be paid for at the rate of $1.50 each; that the rental was not paid, and, though often requested, the defendants refused to deliver said ewes. To this declaration the defendants filed sundry pleas, alleging (1) a partial delivery; (2) that there was a new agreement between the plaintiffs and one of these defendants which was a "complete satisfaction of the contract" sued upon; and (3) that the ewes were taken from the defendant Abeytia's possession by the sheriff of Santa Fe county on a writ of attachment upon the suit of one Barela against the said defendant Abeytia; that the plaintiffs herein replevied said property, and returned it to the defendant Abeytia, but afterwards dismissed his suit, whereupon the ewes were returned to the sheriff, who sold them upon the attachment and judgment against the said Abeytia; and that such disposal of the ewes constituted "inevitable accident," whereby it was impossible for the defendants to return said ewes. The plaintiffs demurred to the second and third pleas upon the following grounds: As to the second plea, because (1) it attempts to set up a substituted, unexecuted parol agreement in discharge of the covenant sued on; (2) attempts to set up by way of defense an accord without satisfaction; (3) there was no consideration for the agreement set up in discharge thereof. As to the third plea, because the institution and commencement of the action of replevin, and the dismissal thereof, was and is, in law, no defense to defendants' breach of covenant set forth in the declaration. The demurrers to these pleas were sustained, to which ruling the defendants excepted. The case was then tried by the court on the issues joined, and judgment given for the plaintiffs. The court found that there had been a partial performance by delivering 1,367 ewes, and the payment of rental up to June 5, 1885, except the sum of $244.80; that the balance of the contract was unperformed; and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the value of 2,720 ewes at $1.50 a head, with rent for 2,720 sheep from June 5, 1885, to the date of the commencement of this action, on August 17, 1886. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, whereupon he took an appeal, and makes 14 assignments of error. These assignments are interdependent, and in our view of the case a consideration of 3 or 4 disposes of all.

The first, and most material, one is that there was error in sustaining plaintiffs' demurrer to defendants' second plea. It will be necessary to set out the material portions of that plea in order that it may fully appear whether or no there was error. After pleading full payment of rent, a partial delivery of the sheep, and a meeting for the purpose of delivering and receiving the balance of the sheep, the plea continues: "And the defendants further aver that then and there the said defendant Lorenzo A. Abeytia entered into a new contract and agreement with the said plaintiffs, by which he (the said Lorenzo A. Abeytia) agreed to hold the balance of said ewes * * * under a new contract between the said L. A. Abeytia alone and the said plaintiffs, and in accordance with the terms of which he (the said L. A. Abeytia) was to pay twenty cents per head annual rental for the said ewes, and that the said new contract was then and there executed by the said defendant continuing to hold the said ewes thereunder; and that it was then and there agreed by and between the said defendant L. A. Abeytia and the said plaintiffs, in consideration of the said defendant L. A. Abeytia agreeing to hold and continuing to hold the said ewes under said new contract, that the said new contract and agreement should be substituted for the old contract; and the said plaintiffs then and there entered into the said new contract, and agreed that in consideration of the making of said new contract by the said defendant L. A. Abeytia, and the holding of the ewes thereunder as aforesaid, that the same should be a full and complete satisfaction of the contract mentioned in plaintiffs' declaration upon which this suit is brought." It will be noticed that there is no allegation that the balance of the sheep were ever delivered or tendered according to the terms of the original contract. The inference, therefore, is that the defendants failed so to do, and that there was a breach of the contract. This inference is corroborated by the allegations of the plea, which says that the new contract was "a full and complete satisfaction" of the original contract. If there had been a delivery, there would have been no need of a satisfaction; the delivery would have been a satisfaction. If there was no delivery, then there certainly was a breach. As, then, this new agreement is pleaded as a satisfaction for the original contract, it is certain that it is done so as an accord and satisfaction. Has it set out a good accord and satisfaction?

The appellant argues that the facts alleged in the plea make out a case of performance and satisfaction, or, rather, an abandonment or rescission, not a modification, of the original contract. That it was not a modification seems plain, for the contract pleaded had as one of the parties only one of the defendants, and there is nothing said as to terms except as to holding the sheep, and paying 20 cents per head instead of 25 cents, and there is nothing showing an intention to modify the original contract. Neither is it an abandonment or rescission, as held in the cited case of Green v. Wells, 2 Cal. 584. In that case the plaintiffs informed the defendant that they were unable to fulfill their contract, and that they would forfeit the money due them if the defendants would consent to the abandonment of the contract. This the defendants agreed to do. In the case before us a different state of facts exists. The defendants here could have fulfilled their contract. There was nothing due from plaintiffs to these defendants upon which to predicate a consideration for abandoning the original contract. It seems to have been entirely one-sided, and that entirely for this defendant. That the plea makes out a performance and satisfaction is true, if by that is meant an accord and satisfaction. The early cases upon accord and satisfaction held to the doctrine that a contract made under seal could not be satisfied by a parol contract. This has, in a measure, been modified by the later cases where the new agreement was executed. In Smith's Leading Cases, in the valuable notes to the case of Cumber v. Wane, 1 Strange, 426, upon page 647 of volume 1, (8th Ed.,) it is laid down "that a parol accord and satisfaction cannot discharge the instrument or obligation, but may discharge the money due upon it." If this had been a suit for the rental simply, the plea may have been good; but it would seem that it could not be good in attempting to discharge the instrument itself. There is another serious objection to this plea, and that is that it attempts to discharge a larger obligation by a smaller, without in any way placing the plaintiffs in a better position. The relation would seem to be the same as to the plaintiffs, except that they were to have only 20 cents per head for the sheep instead of 25 cents, and only one bound to pay it instead of three, and with no other terms as to the contract except the agreement to hold the sheep and pay for their use, but when, where, or how is not stated. Upon page 648, vol. 1, Smith, Lead. Cas., we have the result of the cases summarized in the following language: "It seems to be reasonably well settled by the American cases that the giving and accepting of a smaller sum of money in payment or satisfaction of a larger one due is not a valid discharge, and cannot be pleaded either as payment or as accord and satisfaction." See cases there cited. We think that this new contract was not executed. The defendants plead it as executed by the defendant Abeytia "continuing to hold the said ewes thereunder;" but there is no allegation that the plaintiffs have ever received anything for said sheep under the new contract, nor that the plaintiffs ever had the sheep in their hands, and passed them into the control of the defendants under the new contract. In order to make a good satisfaction for a contract to be set aside, the new contract should have in it an executed consideration of value to the obligee. There is none whatever in this plea shown. There is only a promise to pay 20 cents per head. The obligor has done nothing new; has not changed his position at all; he still holds the sheep. While the manner in which the plea is drawn might at first blush seem to set forth a good defense, yet upon a careful analysis it is apparent that it is fatally defective, and that the ruling sustaining the demurrer was correct.

The second error assigned was that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defendants' plea that the sheep were taken from the defendant Abeytia upon an attachment against him; and that after the plaintiffs had replevied them, and returned them to the defendants, he afterwards dismissed the replevin suit, and allowed them to be sold by the sheriff. We are unable to see any error herein. Possibly, the plaintiffs may have at first thought that he would save his property in the sheep by asserting his prior right to them, and afterwards concluded that, as the defendants held them under a contract, they might protect his right, and that he would look to them for satisfaction, as he had a perfect right to do. It cannot be urged that the contract was at an end by the taking under the replevin, for the plaintiffs immediately passed them into the hands of the defendants, and there was never any agreement that the contract should be terminated by such delivery as contemplated by the contract. Then, too, the evidence conclusively shows that the said replevin suit was instituted for and at the request of the defendants. The sheriff sold said ewes under the attachment and judgment against the defendant Abeytia. The court therefore found that the value of the sheep, under the contract, was $1.50 per head. To this finding the defendants except, and urge that this is "accident," under the terms of the contract, and their value should be $1.25 per head. It seems to us that "accident" is any casualty which could not be prevented by ordinary care and diligence. It cannot be presumed that parties will enter into contracts, and place property in another's possession, with a price thereon varying as to contingency, and intend that the lesser sum is to cover the obligor's own fault. The smaller sum was to protect him against accidents over which he practically had no control; as, for instance, disease. The larger sum was to protect the plaintiffs against the carelessness or fraud of the defendant. He could have saved the sheep by paying his debts. Instead, he saw fit to pay his debts with another person's property. This was clearly disposing of them in "any other manner" than by accident. The court's finding was correct.

The last error which we think material to consider is the eleventh, in which the court refused to declare, as a matter of law, that if a breach of the contract occurred on September 25, 1885, thereafter plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the rent contracted for, but only 6 per cent. interest upon the money due at that time. That the rule here contended for is correct under certain circumstances is undoubtedly true, but whether or no it is applicable here depends upon the terms of the contract, if there are any, governing it. It appears that a value was placed upon the sheep, and the contract specifies that "the said property is to be considered the same as money received." When, then, a breach of the contract occurred, immediately a cause of action arose, and then plaintiffs could have sued thereon, and recovered either the ewes or their value in money. At the time of the breach the plaintiffs could have had the ewes, for they were in the possession of the defendants; or, if they failed to deliver them, then their value, at $1.50 per head. It rested entirely with the plaintiffs as to when they should begin their suit. Can it be contended that the plaintiffs may speculate upon their right of action? And yet, if the contention of the counsel is correct, they may refuse to institute suit for years, and then recover the value of the sheep, and the rent agreed upon for those years; while, if suit was instituted at once, the damages would be the value of the sheep. The contract was at an end at its breach; the value of the contract then was a moneyed value; the damages for the use of money would be the legal rate of interest. We think, therefore, that the court erred in refusing to declare the law in this respect as asked by the defendant. There was an error of $502.35 in the judgment. Judgment will therefore be given for $5,229.42, with interest at 6 per cent. from October 5, 1885.

CHILDERS v. LEE.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—TENANT AT WILL—LEASES.

1. Where one verbally agrees to lease a room for a year provided he himself obtains a renewal of his ground lease, and under this agreement the tenant takes possession, but the lease is never executed nor tendered to him, he is a tenant at will only, not a tenant from year to year, and may abandon the possession without giving six months' notice of his intention to vacate.

2. The statute of frauds, (29 Chas. II. c. 3, § 2,) declaring oral leases to be valid if for a term not exceeding three years where the rent reserved "shall amount to two-thirds part at least of the thing demised," means that the rent reserved shall be two-thirds of the rental value, not two-thirds of the value of the fee.

Appeal from district court, Bernalillo county.

SEEDS, J. This is the second time that this case has been in this court. It is reported in 4 N. M. 168, 16 Pac. Rep. 275, as Childers v. Talbott. The defendant, Talbott, having died since the first hearing, his executor, John A. Lee, was substituted in his place upon the record. There was a retrial before a jury, and, upon motion of the defendant, the court instructed the jury to find for him. It is an action in assumpsit against the executor, Lee, for an alleged balance due upon a parol lease. The appellee contends (1) that the lease was void, as being within the statute of frauds, in that it was not to be performed within a year from its agreement; (2) that it did not come under the exception mentioned in section 2 of said statute, which provides, "except, nevertheless, all leases not exceeding the term of three years from the making thereof, whereupon the rent reserved to the landlord during such term shall amount to two-thirds part at the least of the thing demised," because the amount in value reserved as rent herein means two-thirds of the value of the fee, not the rental value; and (3) that the contract testified to was a mere executory agreement for a lease in writing upon certain conditions, which were never fulfilled, and that, notwithstanding the entry and payment of rent, it was never anything more than an agreement for a future lease, and the occupancy was simply a tenancy at will. The appellant contends, upon the other hand, (1) that the oral lease is good under the second section of the statute of frauds; (2) that, even if it were not, when a party enters under an agreement for a lease for years he becomes, by the payment of rent, a tenant from year to year; (3) an agreement for a lease, under which the lessee goes into possession and pays rent, will be construed to be a present demise; (4) a failure of the lessor to tender a written lease will not justify the lessee in repudiating the contract,—he should demand the lease; (5) though a parol lease, or an agreement for a lease, be void under the statute of frauds, yet if the lessee enters under it the contract will be enforced. He assigns as error therefor (1) the directing of a verdict for the defendant; (2) in overruling the plaintiff's motion for a new trial; (3) in giving judgment for the defendant.

As to the first two contentions of the defendant there is not now room for argument, for while the contract was not to be performed within a year, yet it was a lease for less than three years, upon which the rent reserved was at least two-thirds part of the thing demised; and it is now held in this territory, and is the general holding of the courts of the country, that this means two-thirds part of the rental value of the demised premises. Childers v. Talbott, 4 N. M. 168, 16 Pac. Rep. 275. Whether or no the contention of the appellant is correct depends entirely upon the nature of the holding by Talbott. Was he holding under the oral lease which was to be afterwards simply put into writing? All the testimony was introduced by the plaintiff. The testimony of the defendant, Talbott, taken upon the previous hearing, was introduced by the plaintiff. The evidence was practically unanimous that Mr. Talbott was to have the lease of the room for one year at a monthly rental of $60 from April 1, 1883, provided that the plaintiff could secure a renewal of the ground lease, which terminated about June 1, 1883; that Talbott went into possession April 1, 1883; that no lease in writing was ever tendered the defendant; that he objected to the closing of a certain door between his room and an adjoining one used as an opera-house; that upon the failure of the plaintiff to open said door he returned the keys to the plaintiff's cestui que trust, and tendered the balance of rent up to time of leaving, which was declined, though the keys were retained. Whether or not this oral agreement between Childers and Talbott was a lease, or only an agreement for a lease, depends upon the terms thereof, and the action of the parties under it. If there is a condition attached to the granting of the lease, and it is to be subsequently executed, it operates only as an agreement for a lease. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. (8th Ed.) § 39. "Whenever, therefore, the instrument makes the demise dependent on a condition or stipulation yet to be performed, it operates as an agreement only." Id. § 40. It is quite certain, then, that the agreement testified to was an agreement for a lease; and until Talbott obtained a written lease, or was entitled to one under this contract, that his holding, whatever its character and consequences, depended entirely upon the oral agreement for a lease. He entered under that. It is contended, therefore, that, as the agreement was for a year, the law contemplates the taking possession and paying the rent as a present demise, and that the tenancy is one from year to year. To this proposition the appellant cites an array of authorities which, if in point, would be absolutely decisive of the question. The cases of Kerr v. Clark, 19 Mo. 132; Laughran v. Smith, 75 N. Y. 205; and Koplit v. Gustavus, 48 Wis. 48, 3 N. W. Rep. 754,—are typical of the doctrine contended for, yet in each case the contract was an oral agreement for a term of years, upon which term the tenant had entered and occupied over one year. It was held in these cases that the terms of the agreement and the acts of the parties conclusively showed that it was an agreement for a lease from year to year. In all these cases where there was an agreement for a lease, and an entry under that agreement, and the courts have held the tenancy to be in accordance with the oral contract, it was possible for the tenant at any time to demand the written lease, and for the landlord to give it. In the case at bar that rule would not hold. At any time before the renewal of the ground lease by the plaintiff it would have been impossible for the landlord to have given a written lease which would have then and there invested the tenant with a term for a year. Yet the contention is that what the landlord could not do the law by implication will do; for the argument is that, when the tenant entered under the oral agreement, he at once entered upon a tenancy from year to year; not when the ground lease was obtained, but upon April 1st. All the rights of such a tenancy then attached as against the tenant, and, as the rights of the landlord and tenant are reciprocal, against the landlord. Put the position to the test. If, now, the plaintiff had failed to obtain the ground lease, could Talbott have sued Childers for damage for a failure to protect him in his yearly tenancy? Clearly not, under the lease agreed for, for that was a conditional lease; but if, in spite of that condition, he was in for a year under the oral agreement, then the landlord could have been held for damages for a failure to make the term good. This was not contemplated by either the terms of the agreement or acts of the parties. It is quite evident that, under the facts in this case, the tenancy here was not from year to year, but at most at will.

If the tenant had taken the written lease which had been agreed upon, when the plaintiff was in a position to give it, or if it had been tendered him, and without a legal reason he had refused it, there would then have been no question but that the term would have been changed into one from year to year. But there is no evidence whatever that a written lease was ever tendered him; such lease was to be given when the plaintiff obtained a renewal of the ground lease. The presentation of such a lease may reasonably have been considered notice that the plaintiff had received the renewal lease. The fact that the plaintiff did receive the renewal lease did not raise any obligation upon the part of Talbott to demand that the plaintiff should do what he agreed to do. If the plaintiff sought to hold Talbott upon a contract which was to be in writing, and he was to place it in that form, it was his duty to do so, not Talbott's. The cases cited by the plaintiff, being Fuller v. Hubbard, 6 Cow. 1, and Goodfellow v. Noble, 25 Mo. 60, do not sustain the principle contended for. The fatal error upon which the plaintiff bases his whole case is in assuming that the agreement for a written lease upon conditions, and an entry thereunder, is the creation of a tenancy from year to year absolute in its character, which binds the defendant to pay a year's rent, unless six months' notice of intention to vacate is given. The acts of Talbott in objecting to the closing of the door, and leaving because of the failure upon the part of the plaintiff to remedy it, must be considered in reference to the tenancy which he then had,—that at will. It was that tenancy which he terminated because of the alleged wrong of the plaintiff. If he had been tendered the lease agreed upon, and accepted it, or without legal reason had refused it, then possibly the reason given for abandoning the tenancy would have been fruitless. The plaintiff declared upon a contract which was only an executory agreement, and, failing to prove himself entitled to rent thereunder, the rulings of the court were proper, and the judgment is affirmed.

BACHELDER et al. v. CHAVES, Sheriff.

SHERIFFS—FAILURE TO ENFORCE EXECUTION—INDEMNIFYING BOND.

1. A misrecital in an execution as to the amount of the judgment is an irregularity merely, and does not render the execution void; and, in an action against the sheriff for his failure to enforce the execution, it may be amended so as to conform to the judgment.

2. A mere disclaimer by the judgment debtor of the ownership of personal property in its possession, with an allegation that the title thereto is in a foreign corporation, does not excuse the sheriff's failure to make a levy thereon, as possession of personal property is prima facie evidence of title; and it is the sheriff's duty to make the levy unless he knows that the apparent title is different from the real title.

3. A sheriff who has wrongfully levied an execution on the cars, locomotives, road-bed, etc., of a railroad company, greatly exceeding in value the amount of the judgment against it, has no right to demand of plaintiffs an indemnifying bond for the value of the property so wrongfully levied on; and plaintiffs' failure to comply with his demand will not excuse him from selling sufficient of the property to satisfy the judgment, where plaintiffs tendered him an indemnifying bond in double the amount of the judgment.

Error to district court, Santa Fe county.

Thomas Smith, for defendant in error.

FREEMAN, J. This was an action on the case instituted by plaintiffs in error against the defendant in error in the district court of the county of Santa Fe. The plaintiffs in error filed their declaration against the defendant in error at the August term, 1887, alleging that at the July term, 1884, of said court, they obtained a decree against the Texas, Santa Fe & Northern Railroad Company for $1,346.37, with $100 attorney's fees, and $89.75 costs; and that afterwards, to-wit, at the February term, 1887, of said court, "by the consideration of said court, the decree entered at the July term, 1884, was duly docketed, as provided by law, for the sum of sixteen hundred and forty-six dollars and sixty cents, and costs, eighty-nine dollars and seventy-five cents." That afterwards, on the 14th day of March, 1887, an execution was issued on said judgment, directed to the defendant in error as sheriff of Santa Fe county. That defendant in error levied said execution on property of the defendant company, amounting in value to $3,000. That said defendant in error, disregarding his duty as such sheriff, failed to sell the property so levied upon, and returned said writ, after it had expired, unsatisfied. That afterwards, to-wit on the 6th of June, 1887, the plaintiffs in error caused the venditioni exponas to be issued to the defendant in error, commanding him to sell said property so levied upon; and that said defendant in error refused to execute this writ, to their damage, etc. The defendant filed two pleas to this declaration, the first, a general plea of not guilty; in a second plea, he undertakes to justify his refusal to obey the mandate of the court. It is, in effect, a plea of confession and avoidance, and sets out substantially the following defense: He admits that he was, at the time charged, sheriff of Santa Fe county. That he received in his hands the execution set out in the declaration. That he levied the same upon certain goods and chattels, which he was informed and believed belonged to the defendant company, but was notified by said company that it did not own, claim, or have any interest in said property; and for that reason the property was not sold. That said execution was returned, and thereupon a venditioni exponas was issued by the clerk, and the property which had been formerly levied upon advertised to be sold. That upon the day appointed for the sale he was notified by the president of the defendant company that said goods were not the property of the said company, and was also notified by the Southern Trust Company of New York that said goods belonged to the said trust company, which forbade the sale thereof. That thereupon he gave notice to the attorney of the plaintiff that, unless an indemnifying bond "in double the value of the property was executed to this defendant, that such property would not be sold." That the plaintiffs in error refused to execute such bond, and thereupon he adjourned the sale. To this plea plaintiffs filed their replication denying that the property levied upon belonged to the trust company, and averring that the property belonged to the railroad company; and, further, that they, the plaintiffs in error, tendered to the defendant in error a good and sufficient indemnifying bond in double the amount of the judgment. On this state of the pleadings the parties went to trial. On the trial of the cause the plaintiffs in error offered to read as evidence to the jury the execution issued upon the original judgment. To this the defendant in error objected, on the ground that the execution offered in evidence did not agree in amount with the original judgment. This objection being sustained by the court, they moved for leave to correct the execution, so as to make it conform in amount to the judgment. This motion was also denied. They also offered in evidence the original and last or "docketed" decree of the court, the judgment docket, etc., all of which, except the original judgment, was, on the objection of the defendant, excluded. The court thereupon instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, which was accordingly done.

was issued. It is insisted by the defendant in error that this variance rendered the process void, and some authorities are cited which seem to support this view. We think, however, that the weight of authorities is to the contrary. In Herman on Executions, § 65, under the head of "Void Executions," the author mentions, among other defects that render the process void, "a misrecital as to date and amount;" citing Albee v. Ward, 8 Mass. 79. The same author, however, in section 66, declares: "Whenever an execution varies from the judgment on which it issued, it may be amended by the judgment so as to conform to it; and, where there is an error as to the amount to be collected, it may be amended at any time, even on the return-day, or after its return." It is claimed, however, by the defendant in error, that while such a writ, as between the judgment creditor and debtor, may be amended, yet it cannot be so amended as to charge the officer refusing to execute it in its defective form. In our opinion, however, the officer's liability depends, not so much upon the regularity, as upon the validity, of the process. The true rule is stated as follows: "When a writ from a court of competent jurisdiction is placed in an officer's hands, he is bound to execute it according to the exigency of the writ, without inquiry into the regularity of the proceedings upon which it was grounded. Nor can he refuse because in his opinion it is irregular, or that the sum varies from the amount for which the judgment was rendered." Id. § 146; Parmelee v. Hitchcock, 12 Wend. 96. "The cases recognize and affirm a distinction between process which is void, and that which is merely voidable, and it is repeatedly stated that, when a process is void, the sheriff is not bound to execute it, nor liable for any neglect, partial or total. But otherwise, if the process is voidable only; because, if the defendant in the execution does seek to avoid the process, and where the court might, if applied to, allow an amendment, the sheriff cannot avail himself of the defect in the process." Freem. Ex'ns, § 103.

Having determined that the process, though irregular, was not void, and that it was the duty of the sheriff to have executed it, we proceed next to inquire if the justification set out in his second plea is sufficient to protect the defendant in error. Omitting the details, the substance of this defense is that the defendant corporation disclaimed the ownership of the property, and that the same was claimed by a foreign corporation. This was not sufficient. The property levied on was in the possession of the defendant corporation; the defendant recites in his return of the original writ that he believed it to belong to the defendant company. "When an officer sees a defendant against whom he holds an execution in possession of property, it is his duty to make a levy, unless he knows that the apparent is different from the real ownership." Id. § 252. "Possession of personal property being prima facie evidence of ownership, whenever it is shown that the sheriff had knowledge that the defendant in execution was possessed of personal property, and he fails to levy upon it, the burden of proof is upon him to show that the property was not subject to execution." Taylor v. Wimer, 30 Mo. 129.

The plaintiffs in error, however, tendered the officer a good and sufficient indemnifying bond in a sum equal to double the amount of their judgment. This the officer declined to accept, because it was not in amount sufficient to cover the value of the property levied upon. In this we think the officer was in error. The law authorized him to levy upon only so much property as would be sufficient to satisfy the execution. If he had made an excessive levy, his demand upon the plaintiffs in error was, in effect, that they should not only indemnify him against the consequences of a mistaken ownership of the property, but against his own wrong in having made an excessive levy. A case might occur in which an officer finding but one item of property, and that largely in excess in value of the process to be satisfied, would be entitled to indemnity commensurate with the value of the property levied upon. The extraordinary schedule of property levied on in this case, however, shows that the demand of the defendant in error was unreasonable. The following schedule shows the character and items of property levied upon to satisfy the execution, amounting to $1,733.97, to-wit: "Two locomotives, one designated as 'No. 5,' the other by name as 'General Melly'; one baggage and express car numbered 15; two passenger coaches, numbered, respectively, 10 and 12; eight freight covered cars, numbered * * *; nine flat-cars, numbered * * *; three coal-cars, numbered * * *; 40,000 feet of manufactured lumber and bridge timber; eighty-five large piles; 7,000 ties; 2,300 splices; one barrel of bolts for splices; forty-seven kegs r/r/spikes; 301 long Trails and 58 common rails; also all the road-bed and right of way from the southern end of the track of said company's road at Santa Fe to the northern line of Santa Fe county; also the ties and rails in place in said road-bed within the county of Santa Fe." The judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded to the lower court, with directions to permit the plaintiffs in error to make such amendments to the execution as will make it conform to the judgment upon which it was issued.

HARMLESS ERROR—TRIAL—RECALLING WITNESS—MINING LOCATION.

1. In ejectment for a mine, an error by the court in permitting plaintiff to state his opinion as to the damage he suffered in consequence of its detention by defendant is cured by a subsequent ruling that the only damage plaintiff was entitled to was the value of the rents and profits from the commencement of the action to the time of the trial, as provided by the New Mexico statute.

2. It is discretionary with the trial court to permit a witness for plaintiff to be recalled, even after the close of defendant's case, and asked a question which had been overlooked on the direct examination.

3. The fact that a mining locator has failed for one year to perform the annual labor required by Act Cong. May 10, 1872, does not work a forfeiture of the claim, where he in good faith resumes the work before a new location is made by others.

4. Where there is a substantial conflict in evidence, the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed, unless error of law occurred on the trial.

Appeal from district court, Sierra county.

Elliott & Pickett, for appellants. John J. Bell, for appellee.

LEE, J. This is an action of ejectment, brought originally by plaintiff against the defendants in the district court of Grant county, to recover the possession of the "Star of the West" mine, and damages for the unlawful detention of the same. The venue was afterwards changed to the district court of Sierra county, where, at the November term, 1889, a jury trial was had, which resulted in a verdict of guilty against defendants, and plaintiff's damages were assessed at $500. A motion for a new trial, made by the defendants, was overruled by the court, and judgment entered in accordance with the verdict, from which judgment the defendants took an appeal to this court.

The first error assigned, and perhaps the principal one in the case, arises upon the following question, asked plaintiff by his counsel, he having been introduced as a witness in his own behalf: "State, Mr. Lacey, to the jury, what you regard as the damages you have suffered in consequence of these defendants taking from you the possession of that mine on the 5th day of November, 1888." The question was objected to for the reason that it called for the opinion of the witness as to the damages he might have sustained. The question was clearly open to the objection made, as well as to others that might be suggested. But whether the ruling of the court in admitting it constitutes error in the case must be taken into consideration with other rulings of the court upon the same question. In answering it the witness said: "Five thousand dollars. I base it on the fact of having a contract of at least two car-loads per day, with the understanding that it could be increased right along to three or four car-loads. In a short time after, I commenced shipping iron, and putting it down at the lowest figure, at fifty cents a ton, for the royalty, you, gentlemen, can figure the thing for yourselves for eleven months, even at two car-loads per day." The counsel for the defendants asked that this testimony be stricken out, as being entirely too remote. The court ruled upon this motion as follows: "I will have to instruct this jury upon the measure of damages. I will not pass finally upon this question now. I will reserve my opinion until a future stage of the case." This witness was recalled later in the case, and was asked practically the same question, as follows: "Mr. Lacey, state to the jury whether or not you have sustained any damages in consequence of the defendants taking possession of this mining property, and, if so, state the nature of the damages, in what manner you were damaged or injured, and the extent of the injury, commencing from the time of the commencement of this suit, up to the present month." This question was objected to for the reason that the rule, as fixed by statute, reads, "rents and profits of such premises," etc. At this time the court ruled as follows: "I think our statute controls on the subject, and it seems to direct what can be recovered. The question of what is embraced in the name of 'rents and profits' is a matter upon which you may give testimony, but I think we have to be governed by the statute in regard to assessing damages." The question was finally asked by the counsel for plaintiff in the following form: "Mr. Lacey, state to the jury what would be the reasonable value of the rents and profits, if any, of the 'Star of the West' mine now in controversy, from the time you commenced this action to the present time." To this question there was no objection, and, the ruling having finally been in favor of the appellants, and correct in point of law, it leaves the defendant nothing to complain of in this assignment of error.

The fourth error assigned is as follows: "John F. Lacey, the plaintiff, called in rebuttal after the defendants had introduced all their testimony, and closed their case in chief, was asked: 'Mr. Lacey, are you a citizen of the United States, and, if so, how long have you been a citizen?'"—to the admission of which defendants excepted. The record shows that the plaintiff, on motion and by leave of the court, asked the question as a question that had been overlooked on direct examination. The permission was a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court, and, as such, cannot be assigned as error. The rule is thus laid down by the supreme court of the United States in Railroad Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. 448: "The mode of conducting trials, the order of introducing evidence, and the times when it is to be introduced, are matters properly belonging to the practice of circuit courts, with which the supreme court ought not to interfere." The district courts possess this discretion as fully as other judicial tribunals.

Exception was taken to the ruling of the court in refusing an instruction asked by the defendants on the trial, which was as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff did not perform one hundred dollars' worth of work on the 'Star of the West' mining claim, located by him in the year 1883, in the year 1887, and that, if he resumed work on the said claim in 1888, and did not perform work thereon to the value of one hundred dollars before the defendants made their location in November of that year, you will find for the defendants, and return your verdict accordingly." If the law was correctly presented to the jury by the court in an instruction which was given on his motion, and which was also excepted to by the defendants, then the above instruction was erroneous, and properly refused. The instruction given was as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff made a valid location of the 'Star of the West' mining claim on the 1st day of January, 1883, and that he had performed the necessary labor upon said claim, or that if the assessment work was not done for one year, but work upon said claim was resumed in good faith by the plaintiff prior to the making of a valid location of part or all of said claim by the defendants or other parties up to and including the 5th day of November, 1888; and if you further believe that the defendants, or some of them, unlawfully took possession of said mining claim, or a part thereof, and unlawfully withheld from the plaintiff all or a part of said mining claim,—you should find for the plaintiff." We think the law correctly stated in this instruction. It is fully sustained by the supreme court of the United States. In Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 282, in an opinion rendered by Chief Justice WAITE, that court says: "For all purposes of this case the law stands as it would have stood had the original act of 1872 provided that the first annual expenditure on claims then in existence might be made at any time before January 1, 1875, and annually thereafter until a patent issued. If it was not made by that time, the claim would be open for relocation, provided work was not resumed upon it by the original locator, or those claiming under him, before a new location was made. Such being the law, it seems to us clear that, if work is resumed upon a claim after it has once been open to relocation, but before a relocation has been made, the rights of the original owners stand as they would if there had been no failure to comply with the conditions of the act. The argument on the part of the plaintiff in error is that if no work is done before January 1, 1875, all rights under the original claim are gone, but that is not, in our opinion, the fair meaning of the language that congress has employed to express its will as we think the exclusive possessory rights of the original locator and his assigns were continued without any work at all until January 1, 1875, and afterwards, if before another entered on his possession and relocated the claim, he resumed work to the extent required by law. His rights after resumption were precisely what they would have been if no default had occurred." In this case the evidence tends to show that the plaintiff located this mine January 1, 1883. He performed his annual labor for the years 1884 and 1885. In 1886 he did not perform the labor required. In 1887 he resumed work on the mine, and did the assessment work for that year, continuing in possession, and working from November, 1887, to and through February, 1888, performing his annual work for that year. He was ousted by the defendants in the fall of that year. This statement of the facts clearly brings the plaintiff within the provision as laid down by the supreme court of the United States, which is in full accord with the instruction given by the court.

It is argued by the appellants that this court ought to review the evidence, and find that a preponderance was other than as found by the jury. This would be contrary to the whole policy of our government. The law-making power regards juries as better able to determine questions of fact correctly than judges, or it would do away with the system altogether, and submit all questions of fact, as well as of law, to the courts. Under the law as it exists this court has decided time and again that where there is a substantial conflict in evidence the verdict of a jury will not be disturbed, unless errors of law occurred upon the trial. Corkins v. Prichard, 3 N. M. 184, 3 Pac. Rep. 746. The judgment of the lower court will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

TOWN OF ALBUQUERQUE v. ZEIGER.

WRIT OF ERROR—PARTIES—FILING RECORD.

1. The failure of a sheriff to join in a writ of error sued out by a city from a decree in favor of a tax-payer, enjoining both the city and the sheriff from collecting a tax, is no ground for dismissing the writ, as the sheriff is not a party to any substantial interest involved, but is simply a part of the machinery invoked by the city to enforce the collection of the tax.

2. Under the New Mexico statute requiring the record on a writ of error to be filed in the supreme court at least 10 days before the first day of the term, either the day of filing or the first day of the term may be included in the computation of the 10 days.

Error to district court, Bernalillo county.

H. C. Collier, for plaintiff in error. Neill B. Field, for defendant in error.

FREEMAN, J. The defendant in error filed his bill in the court below against the plaintiff in error and one Jose L. Perea, sheriff of Bernalillo county, to enjoin the collection of certain taxes assessed against him for the improvement of a street in said town of Albuquerque. The defendants below demurred, and the demurrer was overruled. Electing to stand on their demurrer, the injunction was made perpetual, to which ruling of the court they prayed and obtained an appeal. The appeal, however, was not prosecuted, and the case was afterwards brought to this court by writ of error sued out by the town of Albuquerque only; its co-defendant, the sheriff, declining to prosecute the writ. The defendant in error now moves to dismiss the writ of error for the reason, among others, that both of the defendants in the lower court do not join in the writ.

It is apparent that there are but two parties who have any substantial interest in the present litigation, viz., the town of Albuquerque, the plaintiff in error, and Zeiger, the defendant in error. To the sheriff, the other defendant below, it is a matter of trifling concern. Beyond the matter of commission on the tax enjoined, he has no interest whatever in the result. He was a necessary party defendant, because, as sheriff, he was proceeding, or was about to proceed, to enforce the collection of the supposed illegal assessment. It is insisted by the defendant in error that he is also a necessary party to this proceeding, for the reason that as he stands enjoined by a decree of the court, which he does not seek to disturb, a dissolution of the injunction as to his co-defendant below will not have the effect of dissolving the injunction as to him, and that therefore the town would take nothing by such judgment here; that a judgment dissolving the injunction as to the town, and leaving it in force as to the officer, would be barren of any practical result. We do not so regard the law. If it should appear to this court that the injunction was improvidently granted, and that the plaintiff in error is entitled to collect the tax, it would seem to be a hardship to deprive it of the power to enforce the collection on account of the indifference of the officer. "Where the officers of a corporation are joined with it as co-defendants in a bill for discovery, and for an injunction against an action brought by the corporation, the injunction may be dissolved upon the coming in of the answer of the corporation, although its officers have not answered. So, when an injunction is obtained against several defendants, restraining them from prosecuting a joint action at law, some of whom answer and obtain a dissolution as to themselves, and the others afterwards file their answer, but neglect to move to dissolve, those who have already procured the dissolution as to themselves may have the injunction dissolved as to their co-defendants." High, Inj. § 1534. A similar doctrine is laid down in the case of Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 608, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415, where it is said "that the omitted parties have no legal interest either in maintaining or reversing the decree, and consequently are not necessary parties to the appeal." The case of Germain v. Mason, 12 Wall. 259, was an action brought by Mason against Germain to enforce a mechanic's lien. Twenty other parties were made defendants to the petition on the ground that they had or pretended to have liens against the same building. A decree was had affirming the right of the petitioner to priority of satisfaction of his lien, and a judgment in personam rendered against Germain. From this judgment, Germain alone sued out a writ of error. A motion to dismiss for non-joinder of the other defendants was overruled. The supreme court, speaking by Justice MILLER, said: "The lien creditors, co-defendants with Germain, have not sought to reverse the judgment; but Germain, who has a separate, distinct, personal judgment against him for money, in which the other defendants have no interest, has a right, we think, to prosecute a writ of error in his own name without joining them." A motion similar to that we are considering was made in the case of Cox v. U. S., 6 Pet. 172. The argument made in the case which was sustained by the court is as follows: "It must be obvious that in many cases all the parties will join in the appeal. Sometimes they are satisfied with the judgment. Often they have no interest in reversing it. * * * The party in-interested in reversing the judgment only will sue out a writ of error. The court cannot compel the other party to join, and justice could not be done if either party could defeat the other of their legal rights. The aggrieved party must be allowed to bring up the case, and, if necessary to comply with obsolete forms, the court must decree a severance." The motion to dismiss was therefore overruled by the court. The sheriff is not a party to any substantial interest involved. He is merely a part of the official machinery invoked by the corporation to enforce the collection of the tax. His functions are suspended by the writ; and if, upon the hearing, the court should be of the opinion that the injunction ought to be dissolved, it will remand the cause to the court below, with directions to that court to dissolve it as to all the parties to the suit; and this view of the case, we think, disposes of the question as to whether the sheriff is a necessary party to the appeal or writ of error.

Another reason assigned in support of the motion to dismiss is that the record was not filed "at least ten days before the 1st day of the January term, A. D. 1889, of said supreme court." The record was filed on the 27th day of December, 1889, and the court convened on the 6th day of January, 1890. We think this is a substantial compliance with the rule. If we include either the day of filing or the day on which the court convened, we have the period of 10 days, which meets the requirement of the statute. Let the motion be denied.

MANDAMUS—APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS.

An appeal by the territorial auditor from a peremptory writ of mandamus erroneously issued against him commanding him to audit and allow the claims of a sheriff against the territory does not operate as a supersedeas; and where the auditor, in obedience to the mandate of the court, has audited and allowed the claims, his appeal will be dismissed, at the costs of the sheriff, without ascertaining and pointing out the particular items which were improperly allowed as charges against the territory.

Error to district court, San Miguel county.

E. L. Bartlett, for plaintiff in error. G. W. Prichard, for defendant in error.

FREEMAN, J. This was an action of mandamus instituted by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error. The alternative writ of mandamus allowed by the lower court was as follows:

"The Territory of New Mexico, to Trinidad Alarid, auditor of public accounts of the territory of New Mexico: Whereas, Eugenio Romero, sheriff of San Miguel county, in said territory, has this day presented to the judge of the fourth judicial district court of said territory, at chambers, his petition, in which it is recited that, as such sheriff, he holds certain certificates of allowance made by this court against the territory, and by the court of the first judicial district of said territory, for fees and money laid out and expended in and about his office as such sheriff in said county as required by law, said certificates bearing upon their face the following numbers and amounts, to-wit: No. —, Santa Fe county, $76.25; No. 25, San Miguel county, $12; No. 22, San Miguel county, $81; No. 20, San Miguel county, $576; No. 8, Lincoln county, $83; No. 2, Lincoln county, $400.75,—and that you, as the auditor of public accounts for said territory, have refused at divers times, and still refuse, to audit said allowances, as shown by said certificates and issue warrants therefor, in the name of the territory and against the treasurer thereof, as required by law, and for further information as to the recitals of said petition, reference is had to a copy of the same, attached thereto, and made a part hereof: Now, therefore, we, being willing that speedy justice be done in this behalf to him, the said Eugenio Romero, sheriff as aforesaid, do command and enjoin you that, immediately after the receipt of this writ, to receive each and every of said certificates bearing the numbers and amounts as aforesaid, held by the said Eugenio Romero, sheriff as aforesaid, and that you do take up said certificates of allowance, and that you do issue therefor the territory's warrant as auditor of public accounts against the treasurer of said territory for the full amount thereof of each and every of the same, or to show cause to the contrary before the court on the 14th day of May, A. D. 1888, at the court-house in the said county of San Miguel, and how you shall have executed this, our writ, make known at the time and place aforesaid, and have you also then and there this writ. Witness the Hon. ELISHA V. LONG, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico, and Judge of the Fourth Judicial District Court thereof. [Seal.] R. M. JOHNSON, Clerk."

"Territory of New Mexico, county of San Miguel. In the district court for the fourth judicial district of the territory of New Mexico, sitting in and for the county of San Miguel, for the trial of causes arising under the laws of said territory. To the Honorable Elisha V. Long, chief justice of the supreme court of the territory of New Mexico, and judge of the fourth judicial district thereof: Your petitioner, Eugenio Romero, the duly commissioned and acting sheriff, and a resident of the county of San Miguel, in said territory, complaining of Trinidad Alarid, the auditor of public account of said territory, and a resident of the county of Santa Fe, therein, humbly shows unto your honor that your petitioner, as such sheriff for said county, in and about the business of the district court in and for the same, has been compelled by virtue of his office to lay out and expend large sums of money, and has performed the hereinafter mentioned services, for which your petitioner at divers times made the following charges against the said territory, to-wit:

For fees and expenses in taking one William Green, a prisoner, from Las Vegas to Santa Fe, New Mexico, and return, by order of the court in the month of August, A. D. 1887, the amount allowed by law, and duly approved by the court, being seventy-six dollars and twenty-five cents; for fees and allowances for opening jury-lists at the September, October, and November terms of the Colfax, Mora, and San Miguel district courts for the year 1887, the amount allowed by law, and approved by the court, being twelve dollars; for amount paid to janitor at Las Vegas as a necessary court expense for services in and about the court in the year of 1887, the amount allowed by law, and approved by the court, eighty-one dollars; for horse hire and pay of extra deputy during the November term, 1887, of the San Miguel county district court as extra and necessary court expenses, the amount allowed by law, and approved by the court, being five hundred and seventy-six dollars; for furniture and painting furnished by your petitioner for the fourth judicial district court for said last-named county, the same being necessary and by order of the court, the amount allowed and approved by the court in the year 1887, being four hundred and eighty dollars and twenty-five cents. Your petitioner hereto attaches a true copy of the foregoing orders of allowances by the court of the said charges. Your petitioner shows that each and every of the above charges were for money laid out and expended for services rendered by your petitioner and his deputies, as required by law; and that thereafter each and every of said charges were duly presented in open court for allowance, and approved; and that, after the same were carefully inquired into and investigated by the court, the same were duly approved and ordered to be paid; and that the clerk of the said district court in and for the county of San Miguel and territory aforesaid was ordered to make a certificate or certificates to your petitioner bearing the following numbers and amounts: Certificate No. 25, $12; certificate No. 22, $81; certificate No. 20, $576; certificate Nos. 8, 9, $83.50 and $400.07; certificate No. —, from Santa Fe county, $76.25, showing upon the face thereof that each of said charges had been allowed as aforesaid. And your petitioner further shows that the defendant herein named is the auditor of public accounts in and for said territory, and as such the law of said territory enjoins upon him the duty of auditing the charges allowed as aforesaid, and, in the name of the territory, to issue his warrants therein against the treasurer of said territory. That your petitioner, after the allowances of his said claims by the court aforesaid, to-wit, on the — day of January, A. D. 1888, and on divers days thereafter, presented, and caused to be presented, to the said auditor at his office said certificates of allowance, and demanded, and caused to be demanded, of said auditor the issuance of the proper warrants for the same. That it has now been something over four (4) months since he first made said demand. That he has frequently appeared in person before said auditor with said certificates; has sent his agent; and has also written and otherwise requested the issuance of the warrants due him as aforesaid as the law requires; yet the said Trinidad Alarid then and there wholly refused, and still refuses, to receive said certificates of allowances, or any of them, or to issue to your petitioner warrants therefor, or to otherwise perform the official duty enjoined upon him as the auditor of public accounts, by means whereof your petitioner has been prevented, and is still prevented, from receiving the warrants due him, and from receiving the money due for money laid out and expended for services rendered as aforesaid, to all of which he is justly and lawfully entitled. Wherefore your petitioner prays a writ of mandamus directed to the said Trinidad Alarid, as auditor of public accounts for said territory, commanding him to forthwith receive each and every of said certificates so held by your petitioner, and to audit the same, and to issue thereon the territory's warrants against the treasurer of said territory for the full amounts thereof as required by law, and that said defendant be required to make due return to the writ of mandamus that may issue out of this court at such time and place as the court may order, and that, upon the final hearing hereof, said writ be made peremptory, and that your petitioner be granted such other and further relief as he is entitled to, and as justice may require. G. W. PRICHARD, L. C. FORT, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

"Eugenio Romero, Sheriff of the County of San Miguel, vs. Trinidad Alarid, Auditor of Public Accounts of the Territory of New Mexico. Now comes the said defendant by the attorney general of the territory of New Mexico, and for answer to the said writ, and to the petition and exhibits thereto attached, says that he admits that said plaintiff holds certain certificates of allowances made by the court of the first judicial district against said territory, and that such certificates bear upon their faces the number and amounts stated in said writ, but he denies that he has ever refused to audit said allowances, and states the fact to be that he has audited the claims of said plaintiff, and, with one exception, has disallowed the claims referred to in said writ, and has refused, and still refuses, to issue warrants therefor against the treasurer of said territory. He further says that the exception referred to above is as to the item of $12.00, which in said petition is stated to be for fee allowances for opening jury-lists, while in the copy of the certificate of allowance attached to said petition it appears to be for summoning extra talesmen for petit jury and commissioners for selecting juries. Defendant is therefore unable to know which of these allowances is brought in question, but states that he has allowed both of them, and has issued, or is ready to issue, warrants therefor. Defendant further says that he has disallowed the claim of said plaintiff for fees and expenses in taking one William Green, a prisoner, from Las Vegas to Santa Fe, New Mexico, and return, by order of the court, in the month of August, 1887, because it is not a proper charge against said territory, but, by express statutory provision, is a charge to be paid by the county whence said prisoner was sent. Defendant further states that he has disallowed the claim of the plaintiff for the amount allowed by the court to one Cristobal Beltran for janitor, because it appears from the certificate of allowance that said person was employed in and about offices situate in the court-house (being a county building) for the county of San Miguel, the expense of caring for which is properly chargeable to said county of San Miguel only, and not to the territory of New Mexico. Defendant further says that he has disallowed the claim of plaintiff for the sum of five hundred and seventy-six dollars for bailiffs and horse hire at the November term of 1887 of this court, because he has already audited and allowed the claims of four bailiffs for services at said term of court, and drawn warrants therefor on the territorial treasurer, the statute of the territory prohibiting the appointment of more than four such officers, and also because the horses whose hiring and use are implied were used only for the purpose of enabling the sheriff, by himself or by his deputies, to serve process of this court in different parts of the county, for which service said sheriff is allowed and authorized by law to charge the usual amounts for fees and mileage, and to pay him for his horse hire would allow him to receive double for such services. Defendant further says that he has disallowed the claim of said plaintiff for four hundred and eighty-four dollars and twenty-five cents for furniture and painting, because it appeared from the itemized bill presented to the defendant for four hundred dollars and seventy-five cents of said amount, and from the certificate for the remainder thereof, that said claim was for expenses which should have been made, if proper at all, either by the clerk of this court and by the statute of the territory, paid by the counties of this judicial district, or should have been made and paid by the county of San Miguel, and because said claim, if proper at all, should have been made by the court for the county of San Miguel, whereas said amount is claimed to have been originated, and not by the court for Lincoln county; and defendant further says that said claim is extraordinarily extravagant. Defendant denies that the said charges so by him disallowed, or any thereof, were for money laid out or expended, or for services rendered, as required by law; and he denies that the same, or any thereof, were carefully inquired into and investigated by the court; and he avers that said claims and all of them were passed without investigation by the court, and as a matter of course, and that the attention of the court was in no manner called or directed to the impropriety and illegality of the same. Wherefore defendant prays for judgment of the court that the said claims of the said plaintiff set out in said writ, petition, and exhibits, with the exception of the said item of $12.00, are not proper legal charges against the said territory of New Mexico, and ought not to be allowed by the defendant as auditor of public accounts, and that he may be hence dismissed, with his costs. M. A. BREEDEN, A. A. G. for Auditor."

"Eugenio Romero vs. Trinidad Alarid, Auditor. Mandamus. No. 3,116. On reading and filing the answer of the defendant in this cause to the alternative writ of mandamus heretofore issued in this cause, and also the motion of the plaintiff herein to quash and strike out said answer, and for the issue of a peremptory writ of mandamus in this cause, for the purposes and in the manner as prayed in the petition of the said plaintiff, and the counsel for the said plaintiff, as well as for the said defendant, having been heard, and the court, being now sufficiently advised in the premises, doth grant said motion as to the quashing of the said answer, and the issuing of the said peremptory writ of mandamus concerning the following items, to-wit: No. 4, county of Santa Fe, $76.25; No. 25, San Miguel county, $12.00; No. 22, San Miguel county, $81.00; No. 20, San Miguel county, $288.00; No. 8, Lincoln county, $83.50; No. 2, Lincoln county, $400.75,—and as to the issuing of said mandamus concerning the said item of horse hire embraced in No. 20, San Miguel county, amounting to $288.00, is disallowed, and doth deny said motion. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the said answer be, and the same hereby is, declared quashed and stricken out, and that a peremptory writ of mandamus be allowed in this cause, and that the same issue forthwith against the said defendant, commanding him forthwith, as auditor of public accounts of the territory of New Mexico, to receive each and every certificate of allowance in said alternative writ of mandamus mentioned and held by said plaintiff, except the sum of $288.00 out of certificate No. 20, San Miguel county, being the allowance for horse hire to said plaintiff, and to take up said certificates of allowance, and issue therefor, as said auditor of public accounts of said territory, the said territory's warrants against the treasurer of said territory for the full amount of each and every one of said certificates of allowance except the sum of $288.00 out of certificate No. 20, San Miguel county, as aforesaid. It is further ordered and adjudged that service of said peremptory writ of mandamus be made forthwith by A. D. Clarke, of the county of San Miguel, by delivering a true copy thereof to said defendant in person, or, if said defendant shall not be found in said county of Santa Fe, then by delivering a true copy of said writ to some person over the age of fifteen years at the usual place of business or abode of said defendant in the county of Santa Fe, territory of New Mexico. It is further ordered and adjudged that the said defendant make return of this writ, and due obedience to its commands, before this court on the 30th day of July, 1888, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day at the court-house at Las Vegas, New Mexico, for the district court of the county of San Miguel, territory aforesaid. ELISHA V. LONG, Chief Justice."

In this, we think, there was error. In view of the fact, however, that the appeal did not operate as a supersedeas, and that therefore the mandate of the court was obeyed, and the several certificates audited and allowed. It is immaterial now to inquire minutely into the several matters of controversy, in order to ascertain and point out the particular items which were improperly allowed as charges against the territory. The judgment must be reversed, and the writ dismissed at the cost of the defendant in error, and it is so ordered.

PUBLIC LAND—CUTTING TIMBER—WHO MAY MAINTAIN ACTION—EVIDENCE.

1. In trover for timber alleged to have been cut on the public land, where the receiver of the United States land-office testifies that a pre-emptor has paid for the land as required by law, the presumption is that final proof has been made by the pre-emptor, and that the final certificate has been issued to him, vesting him with the equitable title to the land, and leaving only the naked legal title in the United States; and hence the latter cannot maintain the action, as Comp. Laws N. M. § 1882, requires every action to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.

2. The fact that a contest for the land was heard in the land-office in the year preceding the cutting of the timber does not enable the United States to maintain the action, in the absence of any showing as to how or when the contest was instituted, as, under rule 5 of practice in contest cases in the local land-offices, a contest may be instituted after the final certificate issues, as well as before.

3. The action of a pre-emptor in entering land at the land-office as agricultural does not preclude an inquiry into its character in an action against third persons for unlawfully cutting timber thereon; and it is error to exclude defendant's evidence as to the mineral character of the land, since Act Cong. June 8, 1878, permits the cutting of timber on mineral lands.

Appeal from district court, third district.

Elliott & Pickett, for appellants. Eugene A. Fiske, for the United States.

MCFIE, J. In this action the United States sued Frank and John Saucier in the district court of the third judicial district, in an action of trover. The declaration was filed March 7, 1888, and contains two counts, the first charging that on the — day of — A. D. 1887, the defendants cut and appropriated to their own use 500 trees of the value of $500; the second charging the appropriation of 10,000 feet of lumber of the value of $250 from the public lands of the United States. October 1, 1888, defendants filed a demurrer to the declaration, assigning the following causes of demurrer: (1) That the first count joins two separate causes of action, —trespass and trover,—and does not allege the date when committed; (2) the second count does not allege the date of the wrong or injury complained of; (3) that the declaration does not allege that the lands were non-mineral from which timber was taken. The cause was continued by consent until March term, 1889, and on the 11th day of March, 1889, the court overruled the demurrer. The defendants filed two pleas: (1) not guilty; and (2) that if any timber was converted by defendants it was taken from mineral lands; that they were bona fide residents of the territory of New Mexico; that no trees were cut more than eight inches in diameter, and that the lumber was sold to bona fide residents, for building, agricultural, mining, and other domestic purposes. Plaintiff joined issue on first plea, and filed two replications to second plea denying that the land was mineral in character. Trial was had upon issues thus formed, by jury, and resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for $375. Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were overruled, and judgment was entered on the verdict. The defendants, to review this judgment, brought the case to this court by appeal.

The declaration alleges, and the proof shows, that the land from which the timber is alleged to have been taken, was sections 21 and 22, in township 11 S., of range 9 W., and situated in Sierra county, and in the third judicial district of New Mexico. All of this land, with the exception of one forty-acre tract, (the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of sec. 21,) is included in two pre-emption claims made at the Las Cruces land-office by Mr. Austin Crawford and Mr. W. H. James. In fact the only attempt to locate the land from which the timber was alleged to have been taken was by witnesses testifying that the timber cut was upon their claims. There is no proof that there was any timber cut on the 40-acre tract in section 21, not embraced in these pre-emption claims. A large number of errors are assigned, chiefly as to the admissibility of evidence, but there are two important questions presented by this record: (1) Did the court err in giving to the jury its seventh instruction? (2) Did the court err in excluding evidence offered by defendants as to the mineral character of the land? During the progress of the trial Mr. E. G. Shields, at that time register of the United States land-office for the Las Cruces, N. M., district, and custodian of the records of said office, was called as a witness for the plaintiff. The records of the office were identified by him, and were competent evidence in the case. Bly v. U. S., 4 Dill. 465. Mr. Shields was recalled by the plaintiff, and testified as follows, as to whether the pre-emptors Crawford and James had paid the United States for the lands embraced in their pre-emption claims: Question. "State whether Mr. James and Crawford have paid for this land in pursuance of the requirements of law. Answer. Yes, sir." The record is silent as to final proof or the issuance of final receipt. In 1884 the commissioner of the general land-office, in his instructions to registers and receivers, said: "There is no authority for receiving proofs in advance of action in allowing or rejecting an entry, and you have no authority to act upon entry applications until the party is prepared to consummate entry by making proof and payment. In other words, proof and payment must be made at the same time." 3 Dec. Dep. Int. p. 188. We must presume, therefore, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the officers of the government did their duty, and that final proof, showing full compliance with the law by the settlers, was made when payment was made. In fact, the register was asked, and answered "that payment was made in pursuance of the requirements of law." If that be true, then the settlers had done all that the law required of them, and the further presumption must then be indulged that final receipt was issued to these settlers for the land from which the timber, if any, was taken. Mr. Shields was asked, on page 56 of the record, when payment was made, and answered: "I have forgotten the date now. I think it was in June, 1886, I said yesterday." The declaration alleges that the timber was appropriated "on the \_\_\_\_\_ day of \_\_\_\_\_, 1887." No date being fixed, it is limited to the year 1887. The pre-emptors had purchased and paid for the land prior to the alleged injury. The settlers having done all they could, and paid the government for the land, they, and not the United States, were the real parties in interest, and had a right to the damage if the injury complained of had been done. If they had paid the government for the land, and received their final certificate, they had a right to sell the land, or mortgage the land; and it follows that they have the right to punish a trespasser upon their possessions. If the law has been fully complied with by the pre-emptor, and he has paid for the land, and received his final certificate, the certificate is as good as a patent; and until the patent issues, while the government had the naked legal title, it holds in trust for the settler, who is the real owner for all beneficial purposes. After compliance with the law, payment, and the issue of final certificate of entry, the land becomes segregated from the public domain. The secretary of the interior, on the 19th day of February, A. D. 1885, in case of timber trespass upon a homestead entry, which also segregates the land from the public domain, says: "But if it be conceded that Landrum has entered, and is holding the land in good faith, the tract covered by the entry is to be considered as being to all intents and purposes Landrum's land; and, if the McCombs have removed the timber therefrom without warrant, the question is one between them and Landrum. The local courts have jurisdiction in such cases, and Landrum can apply to them for protection, or for reparation of any injury that may have been done him." 3 Dec. Dep. Int. p. 421; 4 Dec. Dep. Int. p. 467. Same as to pre-emption. While these decisions may not bind this court, they are very persuasive, coming as they do from the head of the land department of the government. In Carroll v. Safford 3 How. 460, Mr. Justice McLEAN said: "When the land was purchased and paid for, it was no longer the property of the United States, but of the purchaser. He held for it a final certificate, which could no more be canceled by the United States than a patent. It is true, if the land had been previously sold by the United States, or reserved from sale, the certificate might be recalled by the United States, as having been issued through mistake. In this respect there is no difference between the certificate holder and the patentee." Myers v. Croft, 13 Wall. 291; Smith v. Ewing, 23 Fed. Rep. 745. The court below erred, therefore, in giving to the jury the following instruction: "(7) I charge you that the title to these lands, for the purposes of this suit, is in the United States." The fact that contests have been heard in the land-office in August, 1886, does not alter the situation, for the reason that it is not shown when and how the contests were instituted; and, under rule 5 of practice in contest cases in the local land-office, a contest may be instituted after the final certificate issues, as well as before; the only difference being that in that case the affidavit in contest must be forwarded to the commissioner of the general land-office, who directs a hearing. From what has been said it follows that the lands from which the timber is alleged to have been taken were not public lands, and the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, as required by section 1882, Comp. Laws, which is as follows: "Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest."

If it was conceded that the lands belonged to the United States, there is still a reversible error disclosed by this record, in that the court refused to permit the defendants to prove that the lands were mineral lands, and compliance with the act of congress of June 3, 1878, under defendants' second plea. While it may be objected that the plea did not state all of the facts necessary to a complete defense, there was no demurrer to the plea, but issue was joined as to whether or not the lands in question were mineral lands. The court, in excluding the testimony as to the mineral character of the lands, practically excluded all of the defense, for, if the plea had been technically correct, it would have been unavailing for the defendants to have proven compliance with every other requirement of the law of June 3, 1878. The court permitted evidence to go to the jury as to the mineral character of lands outside the entries of Crawford and James, but not of the lands within the entries, holding, as the court is informed, that the fact of their being entered at the land-office as agricultural lands precluded inquiry as to their mineral character. The entries at the land-office were ex parte, and could not affect the defendants in this case. Whether the lands were mineral in character or not was a material issue, and a question for the jury. The court erred, therefore, in excluding the testimony. In view of the fact that we have indulged some presumptions that plaintiff may be able to rebut with testimony on another hearing in the lower court, the judgment of the lower court will be reversed, and cause remanded, with instruction to the lower court to sustain the motion for a new trial, and such further proceedings as may be deemed proper.

NOTICE FOR NEW TRIAL—LOCATION OF MINING CLAIM.

1. Under St. Ariz. 1879, p. 71, requiring the statement, on notice for new trial, to specify the errors on which the party will rely, and providing that, if no specifications are made, the statement shall be disregarded, a statement the correctness of which has been agreed to cannot be disregarded.

2. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2320, providing that "no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of the vein or lode within the limits of the claim located," one so locating a claim prior to the discovery of the lode can hold possession of the surface as against one possessing or claiming no better right.

Appeal from district court, Cochise county.

Morgan & Price, for appellants. Stanford, Earl & Smith, for respondents.

FRENCH, C. J. This action is ejectment to recover possession of certain mining ground. The complaint is in the usual form for ejectment. The denials of the averments of the complaint contained in defendant's answer, except the denial as to damages, are defective. But plaintiffs having proceeded to trial on the answer without objection in these respects, we shall consider the answer as a denial of the plaintiff's allegations. But the defendants show no right, and do not even claim any right, to the premises in controversy or to the possession of the same in their answer, but simply traverse plaintiffs' right to the same. The plaintiffs had judgment, and defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and the appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

The statutory provision as to new trials in this territory provides: "When the notice designates as the ground upon which the motion will be made the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, the statement shall specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient. When the notice designates as the ground of the motion errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the moving party, the statement shall specify the particular errors upon which the party will rely. If no specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded." St. 1879, p. 71. Plaintiffs object to the assignments under the statute. But their objection cannot be justly sustained to all the assignments of error. Besides, plaintiffs have expressly agreed to the correctness of the statement on motion for new trial. The statement therefore cannot be entirely disregarded, under the provision of the statute: "If no specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded."

The premises were located by plaintiffs' grantors as a mining claim on the 19th day of December, 1879. At that time the premises were entirely vacant, open, unclaimed public land, without any adverse claim, occupancy, possession, or right whatever adverse to plaintiffs' grantors, and so continued till after said grantors, on the 1st day of July, 1879, conveyed the same by deed to plaintiffs herein, who then entered under said deed. The evidence is clear, complete, and entirely unquestioned on the foregoing points. There is clear prior possession decisively established, if the location by plaintiff's grantors had any validity. The act of May 10, 1872, (Rev. St. U. S. § 2320,) among other provisions, contains the following: "But no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of the vein or lode within the limits of the claim located." This broad and sweeping provision is earnestly invoked by the appellants in this case as fatal to plaintiffs' claim in this action on the statement and record therein. It would be sufficient answer to this to say that, for the purpose of this appeal, there is a substantial conflict of testimony on this point,—testimony of Field and others on croppings, etc. Another and more decisive answer to defendants' position is that defendants are not in a position to invoke this provision of the statute against the plaintiffs in this action, for the reason that defendants claim no right to the premises whatever. But as the above provision of the statute is so decisive in its terms, a brief and summary discussion of the same may not be out of place here, though not demanded in the decision of the present case. It is well known that in many portions of the mineral regions of the United States blind veins or lodes exist, that is, veins or lodes entirely below the surface of the ground, and often a great distance below the surface, and that in many instances these blind veins or lodes are the only kind found. Where such a state of things exists, the miner must seek the vein or ledge without attempting a location of claim till the vein or ledge is discovered, or he must attempt a location of the surface at least before such discovery; and this brings us to the consideration of the question, what right, if any, does the miner acquire as to the surface, not ledge, by such location, before the discovery of the vein or ledge? If this exact question has been authoritatively passed upon or settled by judicial decision, my attention has not been called to such decision by counsel or otherwise, except as mentioned and discussed in this opinion. The doctrine of prior possession or actual occupancy, without legal claim, except so far as such possession per se confers it, has been of late fully recognized by the supreme court of the United States as to public lands not mineral.

The question whether public lands inclosed and occupied by parties not claiming them under the laws of the United States are subject to pre-emption or homestead entry under such laws of the United States has been settled in the negative. In the case of Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513, and later in the cases of Hosmer v. Wallace, 97 U. S. 575, and Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 251, the supreme court of the United States held that no pre-emption right can be established by a settlement and improvements on a tract of public land which was already in the possession of another. The state and territorial courts have necessarily followed these decisions,—those of California in the cases of Hosmer v. Duggan, 56 Cal. 257; Davis v. Scott, Id. 165; and in the still later case of McBrown v. Morris, 59 Cal. 64. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Gould, 21 Cal. 254, the same court sustained naked prior occupancy against a congressional grant of right of way, as to claim of damages. This is the settled doctrine as to public lands not mineral, and, by analogy, should be recognized where applicable to rights upon the mineral lands. A person making a location of a mining claim fully in accordance with law and usage acquires a right of possession to the same equivalent to an actual or possessio pedis possession. But what right does he acquire by making such location before the discovery of the vein or ledge? Mr. Justice MILLER in his circuit has encountered this question more or less directly, and especially in the state of Colorado, where these blind ledges are understood to be of frequent occurrence. But his conclusions have not reached us in an authoritative form. In the case of Crossman v. Pendery, 2 McCrary, 139, 8 Fed. Rep. 693, the Orion had been first located. The Pendery was located subsequently, on the same ground, and discovered mineral in place, before the prior locators had made such discovery. In this case, which was heard in the circuit court of the district of Colorado, the defendants had judgment in their favor. Mr. Justice MILLER, of the supreme court of the United States, in his (the eighth) circuit, rendered the decision, in which he is reported as saying: "This cause is submitted on an agreed state of facts, to the effect that the ground in controversy is covered by the surface lines of the Orion claim, located by the plaintiff, and also of the Pendery claim, located by defendant; that both locations are regular as to form; that the Orion was first located and surveyed; that the locators have steadily prosecuted work in the development thereof, and have discovered mineral in place; that the discoverers of the Pendery, located subsequently to the Orion, and while the locators of the latter were in possession thereof, also prosecuted work, and discovered mineral in place before the discoverers of the Orion. The question submitted to the court is this: Can prospectors on public mineral domain acquire any right in which the law will protect them prior to the discovery of mineral in rock in place? If so, can the plaintiffs, being prior locators, recover against defendants, who first discovered mineral on the ground in controversy? It is the opinion of the court that, inasmuch as the plaintiff allowed the defendant to enter upon their claim, and within their boundaries, and there sink a shaft, in which they discovered mineral in rock in place before a discovery by plaintiffs, and make location thereof without protest, the defendants now have the better right. But the plaintiffs might have protected their actual possession of their entire claim by proper legal proceedings prior to the discovery of mineral by the defendants or either party. A prospector on the public mineral domain may protect himself in the possession of his pedis possessionis while he is searching for mineral." The instructions to juries on this statute in the local federal courts have been various, generally giving the substance of the statute that no location could be made prior to the discovery of the vein or lode therein. In the case of Mining Co. v. Evans, 2 McCrary, 39, 5 Fed. Rep. 172, (October term, 1880,) Mr. Justice HALLETT, in the same district of Colorado, is reported as instructing the jury as follows: "On the public domain of the United States, a miner may hold the place in which he may be working against all others having no better right; but, when he asserts title to a full claim of one thousand five hundred feet in length, and three hundred feet in width, he must prove a lode extending throughout the claim." This is indefinite as to extent of ground and in conflict with the doctrines of the decision above quoted. If a party on the public lands not mineral can, by bow and spear, hold his possession to a tract of such land, however large, against a party seeking to enter under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, shall not the miner hold the comparatively small tract embraced in his mining claim, while continuously and industriously seeking the vein or lode believed to exist therein? I speak of the surface only, not the vein or lode. I am of the opinion that he can so hold the surface of the claim against all parties having no better right, and eject them therefrom, if any so intrude, and such I understand to be the doctrine of Mr. Justice MILLER's decision above quoted. Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Arizona. Jan., 1883.)

NEW TRIAL—APPEAL—ADJOINING MINING CLAIMS —VEINS AND DIPS.

1. Though the trial judge retires from the bench pending a motion for a new trial in a case tried by the court, and his successor overrules the motion pro forma, refusing to hear it on the merits, the findings of fact will not be disturbed on appeal if there is substantial evidence to sustain them.

2. Rev. St. U. S. § 2322, provides that locators of mining claims shall have the right to possess and enjoy all veins, lodes, and ledges, the top or apex of which is inside of the surface lines extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes, or ledges may so far depart from the perpendicular in their course downward as to extend outside of the vertical side lines of the surface location. Held, that the owner can follow his claim on its dip only when it dips substantially at right angles with the strike of the vein, and he cannot follow the vein outside of his lode, on the course or strike of the vein, in any case; if it crosses the side lines on its strike the side lines become the end lines and terminate the right to follow the vein in that direction.

3. The end line of the "Way Up" mining claim abutted against the side line of the "Good Enough," which was the older location. In the Way Up, there was a fissure vein which passed from the Way Up, entered the Good Enough, and crossed it. The ore bodies in the Good Enough were connected with this fissure vein and flowed from it, and constituted flat ore bodies lying in strata of limestone some distance from the fissure. Held, that the ore bodies in the Good Enough did not form a separate vein, and its owners could not follow into the Way Up, and were not entitled to the ore at the intersection under Rev. St. U. S. § 2336.

Appeal from district court, Cochise county.

John Haynes and Thomas Mitchell, for appellant. Lewis & Dibble and J. D. Rouse, for respondent.

PINNEY, J. This case comes up on appeal from judgment and order overruling a motion for a new trial. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the trial judge filed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and a judgment was entered in accordance therewith in favor of defendant. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, but, before the motion was disposed of, the trial judge retired from the bench, and another judge was appointed in his stead. When the motion for a new trial came up for hearing, it was overruled pro forma. The court declining to hear the motion on its merits, not having heard the evidence at the trial of the cause, appellant's counsel now insist this court should, under the circumstances, not be governed in its decision on this point by the general rule that an appellate court will not disturb the verdict of a jury or findings of fact by the trial court where there is a conflict of evidence. They insist that the case should be now heard on appeal, as if it were on motion for a new trial in the district court. In the consideration of the case, we have borne in mind the peculiar circumstances surrounding it. Still, it must also be borne in mind that every presumption is in favor of the correctness of the judgment, and that neither appellate nor trial court will disturb the verdict of a jury, or the findings of fact by the court, where there is substantial evidence to sustain such verdict or findings, unless errors of law have occurred requiring a reversal. Covington v. Becker, 5 Nev. 281; Kile v. Tubbs, 32 Cal. 332; Miller v. Balthasser, 78 Ill. 302. One of the main reasons for upholding the verdicts of juries, and the findings of fact of a court, where there is no indication of improper motives influencing them in coming to a conclusion, and where no errors of law occur, is that they have heard the testimony, have had an opportunity of observing the conduct and bias of the witnesses, their intelligence, etc., and are therefore better enabled to arrive at the true facts of the case than an appellate court possibly can be. Having in mind the rule, upon an examination of the entire record, if it shall be found that there is no substantial evidence to sustain the findings of fact, or if there be found a material error in the conclusions of law of the court below, it is the duty of this tribunal to reverse or modify the judgment appealed from; otherwise, the judgment must be affirmed. The questions, then, for our consideration, are: (1) Should the case be reversed on questions of fact, or findings of the trial court? (2) Is there error of law in his conclusion and judgment?

The complaint alleges the incorporation of plaintiff and defendant; that plaintiff company was the owner and in possession of the Good Enough mining claim and lode in Tombstone mining district, Cochise county, Ariz., which is therein described; that within said claim there is a valuable vein, lode, lead, or ledge, and mineral deposit of rock in place, bearing silver and other valuable metals, having its top or apex within the exterior boundaries of said claim, and dipping in a north-easterly direction at an angle of 20 to 24 degrees from the horizontal, passing beyond the said line of the Good Enough claim in that direction, and entering the adjoining land; that on or about March 1, 1881, defendant ousted the plaintiff from that portion of its vein or lode which had been opened and developed by defendant beyond the north-east side line of the Good Enough claim, and beneath the surface of the Way Up mining claim, which at that point adjoins the Good Enough claim. Then follows allegations of value of ore and occupation. The other causes of action are substantially the same, with variations as to value of ore mined, etc., followed by a prayer for an injunction, and for recovery of said land and premises, and for damages. The claim for damages was dismissed without prejudice, and the question of right of possession alone tried. The defendant's answer specifically denied the material issuable facts stated in the complaint, and for defense alleges that the Way Up Company is the owner of, and was in the possession of, and entitled to the possession of, the Way Up mining claim, and of all veins, mineral deposits, etc., the apexes of which were embraced in its exterior limits; alleges that the ore body developed within the Way Up claim; and prays that defendant may go hence, and for costs. It is not a cross-bill, but set up as matter of defense, and not as a counter-claim, which seems necessary under this practice. Brannan v. Paty, 58 Cal. 330. An injunction was granted at the commencement of the action, which was dissolved on the rendition of the judgment. On the issue thus formed, the case was tried in the court below; the judge filed his findings of fact and conclusions of law; and judgment was entered accordingly. The findings are, in substance, that plaintiff and defendant were each incorporated, and the respective owners, and in possession of the Good Enough and Way Up mining claims; that there is no vein or ledge running through the Good Enough claim parallel with its side lines, but that the only vein, lode, etc., shown by the evidence runs across the said Good Enough claim, and crosses its side lines, and enters the Way Up claim on its strike, and the ore raised and taken out by defendant company was from said vein, lode, etc., extending on its strike or course, as aforesaid, across said Good Enough claim in a north-easterly direction, beyond its side lines, and into defendant's Way Up claim; that plaintiff had not, within the boundaries of its said claim, any mineralized lead, lode, belt, zone, etc., of rock, dipping beyond its side lines into the Way Up claim, as alleged and described by plaintiff; that all ore shown by the evidence to have been found within said Good Enough claim, and the extended side lines of the Way Up claim, came from, was connected with, and was a part of, said vein, lode, or ledge, which, upon its strike in a north-easterly direction, entered the Way Up claim; that there is no vein, ledge, lode, or mineralized deposit, having its apex within the exterior boundaries of plaintiff's claim, except that which crosses its side lines and enters the Way Up claim. The sixth and last finding is that there is no vein, lode, ledge, or mineralized deposit, having its apex within the exterior boundaries of plaintiff's claim, dipping beyond the side lines of plaintiff's said claim into the Way Up claim. And as conclusions of law the trial judge found that the defendant was the owner of the Way Up mining claim, with all its veins, etc., and was entitled to recover and work the same, and that plaintiff is entitled to take nothing by the action, and that the injunction and restraining order heretofore granted should be dissolved, and for costs. Upon these findings judgment was entered, which is, in substance, a repetition of the findings and conclusions of law.

The assignments of error on the part of appellant are full and elaborate. They cover every point in the findings, conclusions of law, and in the judgment. The argument is ingenious and exceptionally able. Under our view of the case, only one finding of fact was necessary, and that is embraced in the sixth finding. The material fact, at last, is, did plaintiff's claim have a vein, lead, lode, or mineral deposit, whose apex was located within the exterior boundaries of the Good Enough mining claim, and which dipped into the Way Up claim? This is the ultimate fact to be found, and the one upon which the judgment must stand or fall. The sixth finding is a complete answer. That plaintiff should take nothing by this action, and the injunction and restraining order granted should be dissolved, was all that was necessary, and disposes of the case. As shown above, the answer does not contain a cross-bill, and it follows that the only proper judgment that could be rendered is that plaintiff take nothing by its action; that the injunction be dissolved, and costs awarded to defendant. But plaintiff contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of fact, and that the court erred in the conclusions of law, and that the judgment is unsupported by the findings; in other words, that the judgment is contrary to the law and the evidence. An examination of the evidence shows that the Good Enough claim was located in a north-westerly and south-easterly direction adjoining this claim. On its north-easterly side line lies the Way Up. The latter extends lengthwise in a north-easterly and south-westerly direction, so that the south-west end

Plaintiff claims that the Good Enough is located along a vein or ledge of mineral-bearing rock in place, which extends through it, substantially parallel with its side lines, and that this vein or ledge dips in a north-easterly direction, passing its side lines into the Way Up; that defendant sunk a shaft near the line dividing the two claims, encountering plaintiff's vein on its dip, and were extracting the ore therefrom. Defendant, on the other hand, insists that the Way Up claim is located along a fissure vein extending in a north-easterly and south-westerly direction, and substantially parallel with its side lines; that its shaft is sunk on this vein, and that the ore being taken out by it is from this vein; that this vein extends through the Good Enough claim in a direction substantially at right angles to the side line to the Good Enough; and that the ore bodies which the plaintiff claims to be on its vein, and which he has a right to follow on its dip into the Way Up, form part of the Way Up vein or lode. Section 2322 of the Revised Statutes of the United States gives the owner of a mining claim the right to follow his vein or lode on its dip only when such vein or lode dips—that is, departs from a perpendicular position—substantially at right angles with the strike of the vein or lode, and does not allow him to follow the vein outside of his claim on the course or strike of the vein in any case. If the vein crosses the side lines on its strike, such side lines become the end lines and terminate the owner's right to follow the vein in that direction. Mining Co. v. Tarrbett, 98 U. S. 463. A large number of witnesses for defendant testify to existence of a fissure vein in the Way Up claim. They swear that they examined, saw, and traced it, and found ore in it; that it passes from the Way Up claim, enters into the Good Enough, and crosses it. The judge who tried the case believed that, and it is not for this court to say that his findings are incorrect. The rule is too well established on this point for us to disturb it now. But plaintiff's counsel contend that, conceding that the Way Up fissure vein exists as testified by defendant's witnesses, still the evidence establishes the existence of the Good Enough vein, lode, ledge, or deposit; that this Good Enough claim lode is parallel to its side lines, and dips into the Way Up; that it has an average width of some 60 feet; and that plaintiff has the right, under section 2336 of the United States Revised Statutes, to take all ore at the intersection of the two veins, the Good Enough being the older location. If, however, the sixth finding of fact is sustained by substantial evidence, (and we think it is,) then this point is not well taken. There is much evidence in the record which goes to show that the various ore bodies in the Good Enough claim, opposite the Way Up claim, are connected with the Way Up fissure vein, and flow from it, and, although constituting flat ore bodies lying in strata of limestone, and at considerable distance from the fissure, yet are attached to and form a part of the Way Up vein. Ore bodies thus formed off from and connected with a fissure vein do not form a separate vein, lode, ledge, or mineral deposit. This evidence sustains the sixth finding of fact. It notes the ultimate fact at issue, and it was not necessary to find the probative facts which establish this ultimate fact. Mining Co. v. Taylor, 100 U. S. 37.

The second conclusion of law, to the effect that plaintiff is entitled to take nothing by this action, and that the injunction and restraining order be dissolved, properly follows.

The point made by plaintiff's counsel, that the findings are insufficient in form, and are mere conclusions of law, we think not well taken. The true test of the sufficiency of the findings is this: would they answer if presented by a jury in the form of a special verdict? Tested by this rule, we think them sufficient to sustain the judgment. Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 402. From the fact, however, that defendant's answer does not contain a cross-bill entitling it to affirmative relief, the judgment will be modified to the extent that plaintiff take nothing by its action, and that defendant go hence without day, and recover of plaintiff all costs and disbursements in this behalf incurred. In other respects, the judgment and orders appealed from will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

FRENCH, C. J. I concur in the foregoing decision of Mr. Justice PINNEY that the judgment, as modified, and the order appealed from, be affirmed.

MANDAMUS—TO TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

Where a claim is presented to a territorial auditor, who acts on it, and allows and issues his warrant for a part thereof, mandamus will not issue commanding him to draw his warrant for the balance of the claim. PORTER, J., dissenting.

Appeal from district court, Maricopa county.

John Haynes and Baker, Alsap, Lemon & McCabe, for appellant. Fitch & Churchill, for respondent.

FRENCH, C. J. This is an application for a writ of mandamus commanding and enjoining the said auditor to draw his warrant on the territorial treasurer for the sum of $180, under an act of the legislature of Arizona. No facts are stated in applicant's petition, but an affidavit of the applicant is annexed to the petition, from which it appears that petitioner was an officer of the legislative council of the session of 1881, as assistant clerk of said council, and that his claim is for compensation for services in that capacity. It further appears from the affidavit that the auditor has acted on the claim of applicant, which was $540, auditing and allowing thereon the sum of $360, and has issued a warrant for the sum allowed, which has been accepted by petitioner. This action of the auditor is fatal to petitioner's application for mandamus. If the auditor has erred in auditing petitioner's claim, such error cannot be reviewed by mandamus. If it could be reached by writ at all, it must be by certiorari, not mandamus. The writ of mandate lies to compel an inferior court, board, tribunal, or officer to act, but never to command how to act, unless the act be purely ministerial. If the act sought for be judicial or discretionary in its character, no court, by its writ of mandate, can command what this action shall be, much less can it command how and what the said action shall be after he or it has already fully acted upon the matter, no matter how erroneously. The writ of mandate is in no case a process for the review or correction of errors.

But it is clear that the auditor committed no error as against petitioner. The error of the auditor, if any, was in favor of petitioner, as fully appears by the direct, positive, and express provision of section 1855 of the United States Statutes, as follows: "Sec. 1855. No law of any territorial legislature shall be made or enforced by which the governor or secretary of a territory or the members or officers of any territorial legislature are paid any compensation other than that provided by the laws of the United States." Wherefore it has been ordered that petitioner's application for a writ of mandamus be denied, and his application be dismissed.

APPEAL—FROM INFERIOR COURTS.

Under the Arizona statutes providing for an appeal from the probate court to the district court with a review of the proceedings of the district court in the supreme court, an appeal does not lie from the probate court direct to the supreme court.

Ben Morgan, for appellant. Farley & Pomroy, for respondent.

FRENCH, C. J. The appeal in this case is from an order of the probate court of the county of Pima, wherein the claim of Guadalupe Roddick for family allowance was denied. The appeal should have been to the district court of the first district. No appeal lies from a probate court to the supreme court. All appeals from the probate court must be to the district court. The action of the district court on such appeal may be reviewed here. Appeal is the creation of the statute, and the whole matter of appeals is expressly provided for in the statutes of the territory. Appeal dismissed.

DIVORCE—PLEADING—CROSS-COMPLAINT—FINDINGS.

1. Under Laws Ariz. 1871, c. 31, § 3, subd. 4, providing that a divorce may be granted for extreme cruelty, inflicting grievous mental or bodily suffering, a complaint setting out what the acts of cruelty consist of states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

2. The fact that there are no express findings by the court on the issue raised by defendant's cross-complaint is no ground for reversing the judgment, when it does not appear by the record that any evidence was adduced in support of the cross-complaint.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

W. S. McPheeters and J. M. & J. W. Robinson, for appellant. Charles B. Rush, for respondent.

PINNEY, J. In this case a complaint was filed by respondent, charging defendant with extreme cruelty. And, in the answer of appellant, a cross-complaint is filed charging complainant with extreme cruelty. Both complainant and defendant ask for a divorce. Decree was granted by the court below in favor of respondent, and the case is brought to this court on appeal. And among the points urged in the brief of counsel for appellant as grounds for a reversal are: (1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) What acts constitute grounds sufficient for a divorce under the laws of this territory, and is this a case of that character? (3) That the court failed to find upon the issue raised by cross-complaint. Chapter 31, Laws 1871. Section 3 of the statutes contains seven subdivisions or causes for which a divorce may be granted. The fourth subdivision provides: "For extreme cruelty in either party by inflicting upon the other grievous mental or bodily suffering, and other causes." The seventh subdivision provides: "And whereas, in the developments of future events, cases may be presented before the courts falling substantially within the meaning of the law as herein stated, yet not within its terms, it is enacted whenever the judge who hears a case for divorce deems the case to be within the reason of the law, within the general mischief the law is intended to remedy, or within what it may be presumed would have been provided against by the legislature establishing the foregoing causes of divorce had it foreseen the specific case, and found language to meet it without including cases not within the same, he shall grant a divorce." The authorities cited from the decisions of Pennsylvania and other states, as to what acts are sufficient to constitute grounds for a divorce, cannot apply under our statute. The seventh subdivision is certainly very broad and liberal indeed. Arizona may well boast of supporting the most liberal divorce law of any state or territory on the continent. But outside of this provision the bill of complaint states what the acts of cruelty consist of, and states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action under the fourth subdivision. Counsel insist that the court below did not find upon all the issues raised by the pleading. Even if that were necessary, the evidence not being in the record, it is impossible for this court to determine whether the findings are in accordance with the proofs or not. For aught that appears in the record, no proofs whatever were introduced in support of the cross-complaint. Error will not be presumed, but must be affirmatively shown. Where a case is tried and an appeal taken from the judgment roll, the mere non-appearance of findings of facts does not necessarily establish that error was committed. Mulcahy v. Glazier, 51 Cal. 626. It is also claimed by counsel that, under the decisions in California, findings must be made on the issue raised by cross-complaint, and Speegle v. Leese, Id. 415, also People v. Forbes, Id. 628, are cited in support thereof. In the Speegle v. Leese case, the court say that it is the duty of the court below to find on all the material issues made by the pleadings, whether evidence be introduced or not, and, in People v. Forbes, the court say that as the answer set up new matter, and the court below only found all the facts as stated in the complaint, that was not a disposition of the issues of fact involved in the case. The doctrine thus held is under the present Code of Civil Procedure of that state, and cannot be held to apply to cases arising under our statutes. The earlier decisions of the California courts were to the effect that implied findings would be presumed. It is so held in Buckout v. Swift, 27 Cal. 433. And the same doctrine has been held in this territory in case of Federico v. Hancock, ante, 650. It would be a little less than absurd to hold to the rule that, whether evidence was introduced or not in behalf of defendant's allegations, the court should find upon those allegations, and, in default thereof, the judgment should, for that reason, be reversed. Possibly that might be well enough as a matter of practice, but we have no statute requiring it to be done, and, in the absence of such statutes, the doctrine of implied findings will be adhered to. The judgment and order must be affirmed.

CERTIORARI—WHEN LIES.

Under the provisions of Proceedings in Civil Cases Ariz. §§ 458, 464, that certiorari may be granted when an inferior tribunal exercising judicial functions has exceeded its jurisdiction, and appeal will not lie, and that the review on the writ shall be limited to the determination of whether such tribunal has regularly pursued its authority, the writ will not issue except when excess of jurisdiction has occurred, and appeal will not lie. <sup>2</sup>This case, filed January, 1878, is now published by request with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in the Arizona Reports from volume 1, p. 1.

Comp. Laws Ariz. "Proceedings in Civil Cases," provides in regard to the writ of certiorari: "Sec. 458. This writ may be granted on application by the supreme and district courts of this territory. The writ shall be granted in all cases when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer; and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy." "Sec. 464. The review upon this writ shall not be extended further than to determine whether the inferior tribunal, board, or officer has regularly pursued the authority of such tribunal, board, or officer."

FRENCH, C. J. The order in this case was erroneously made, and the writ thereon improperly issued. Proceedings in Civil Cases, §§ 458, 464. No grounds whatever existed for the order or writ. This writ issues only when excess of jurisdiction has occurred, and then only when there is no appeal. Every point and proposition raised by appellant in this case is well taken, and uniformly supported by reason and authority. It has accordingly been ordered that the said order be reversed, and proceedings under the same dismissed.

APPEAL—FROM JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

1. Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 440, §§ 361, 362, provide that, on appeal from a justice of the peace, the district court may render judgment on the justice's return, or order a new trial, as justice may require. Held that, where the only error disclosed by the justice's return is a defect in the issuance and service of the summons, which is cured by a stipulation that the summons was properly served, and there is no special assignment of errors, as permitted by section 626, the district court properly affirmed the justice's judgment on the return, without trying the case de novo.

2. A defendant in an action on a note, who permits it to be given in evidence on the trial before a justice of the peace without objection, cannot for the first time on appeal in the district court raise the question of the admissibility of the note, because it was not properly stamped, as required by the United States revenue laws.

Appeal from district court, Maricopa county.

G. H. Oury, for appellant. John A. Rush, for respondent

TWEED, J. This cause comes before us on appeal from the district court of Maricopa county. The action was commenced in the court of a justice of the peace, and judgment by default was rendered in favor of the respondent for the sum of $250, and costs. On the appeal in the district court the appellant moved the court for a trial de novo, which motion was denied, and judgment rendered in favor of the respondent upon the returns, for such sums of $250, and costs amounting to $7.50.

Two points are made by the counsel for the appellant: (1) That the court erred in refusing a new trial; (2) that the note sued on was insufficiently stamped, and ought not to have been received in evidence. Section 361, p. 440, Comp. Laws, provides that in all appeals from justices' courts to the district court, after the returns are filed, the court shall proceed to examine such returns and render judgment thereon, as the right of the case may appear, without regard to technicalities or imperfections in pleadings, if they do not tend to the prejudice of the rights of any party. Section 362, Id., provides that "such judgment may be rendered upon the returns, or the court may order the same to be tried anew in the district court, as substantial justice may require." Section 626, p. 476, Id., provides that "the party appealing may, in his discretion, file with his notice of appeal an affidavit as to any special matters in the proceedings appealed from; and the justice shall return specially as to all matters contained in such affidavits, and file such affidavits with his return." Section 628 provides that papers shall be transmitted to the district court. The section reads as follows: "Upon receiving the notice of appeal and the undertaking, as required in the next section, and on the payment of the costs of the action, the justice shall transmit to the clerk of the district court a copy of his docket in the case, and the undertaking filed, and the notice of appeal." We think the provisions of section 347, p. 437, Id., under the head of "Appeals in General," are also applicable to proceedings on appeals from justices' courts. See section 535, p. 463, Id. What the justice's docket shall contain is prescribed by section 606, p. 474, Id. It may be added that justices of the peace are forbidden to grant new trials or to arrest judgments. See section 624, p. 476, Id. From the foregoing statutory provisions, it appears to us to be very clear in what cases new trials should be granted in the appellate court. If the transcript be obscure and unintelligible, or if upon its face positive error appears prejudicial to the rights of a party, or if such error appear by an assignment of errors by way of affidavit, sustained by the special return relating thereto from the justice, the appellate court will grant relief by modifying the judgment, if the error be one which can be corrected in this manner, upon inspecting the returns, and by ordering a new trial when the error complained of cannot otherwise be reached. Where no such error appears, either by reference to the transcript or by assignment of errors by way of affidavit, the appellate court can only confirm the judgment, or rather render such judgment as was had in the justice's court, with costs of the appeal. In the case before us there was no assignment of errors, by way of affidavit in the justice's court. The transcript from the justice's court is more complete and perfect than such transcripts are usually found to be. If there is in it any defect, it is in relation to the issuance and service of the summons, and such defect, if there be any, is cured by the stipulation that due service of the summons was had in the case.

As to the second point made by the appellant, we are of opinion that it is not well made; conceding that the note sent with the papers to the district court was the note sued on, and that, under the revenue laws of the United States, it was insufficiently stamped, it was too late to raise this objection for the first time in the appellate court, even if the objection would have been good had it been taken in the justice's court,—a point we are not called on now to decide. From a careful consideration of the case under the statutory provisions referred to, we think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CONTRACT TO MAKE WILLS—ENFORCEMENT IN EQUITY.

An agreement between two persons that the survivor of them shall have all the property left by the other, provided he assumes all of his indebtedness, though not having the requisites of a valid will, constitutes a valid claim on which the survivor may bring suit in equity against the administrator to obtain possession of the property in specie. DUNNE, C. J., dissenting.

McCarty & Clark and C. W. C. Rowell, for appellant. J. E. McCaffry, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An appeal from a judgment in the first judicial district, county of Pima, and territory of Arizona, wherein said Rufus E. Eldred was plaintiff, and the said Solomon Warner, administrator of the estate of George M. Newsome, deceased, was defendant. The appeal is from the judgment entered in this cause on the 14th day of October, A. D. 1874, that the demurrer filed in said cause be sustained. It is now, on motion of McCarty & Clark, for the appellant, after hearing James E. McCaffry for the respondent, adjudged that the said judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded to the said district court for further proceedings.

DUNNE, C. J. (dissenting.) I am unable to concur with my learned associates in the disposition made of this case. The record is as follows:

"On the 14th of May, 1874, the following bill in equity was filed in the district court of the first judicial district:

'Territory of Arizona, county of Pima. In district court, first judicial district.

Rufus E. Eldred, Plaintiff, v. Solomon Warner, Administrator of the Estate of George M. Newsome, Deceased, Defendant. Now, by attorney, comes the above-named plaintiff, and, complaining of the defendant herein, for cause of action avers and shows that heretofore, to-wit, on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1874, at the village of Tucson, county of Pima, and territory of Arizona, one George M. Newsome, then and there being a resident, died, intestate, and leaving property and estate within the said county; that thereafter, on, to-wit, the 27th day of February, A. D. 1874, the said defendant, as public administrator in and for the said county of Pima, territory aforesaid, duly petitioned the probate court in and for the said county of Pima for letters of administration upon the estate of the said George M. Newsome, deceased; that thereafter, on, to-wit, the 24th day of March, A. D. 1874, the said probate court, by an order duly entered and filed in the said court, granted the petition of the said defendant, and issued to him letters of administration upon the said above-named estate. Plaintiff further avers that thereafter, on, to-wit, the 28th day of March, A. D. 1874, notice to creditors of the said George M. Newsome, deceased, requiring them to present to the said defendant, within ten months from the said last above named date, with the necessary vouchers, all claims against the said estate, was duly printed and published in a weekly newspaper, known and designated as the "Arizona Citizen," and published at the village of Tucson, county and territory aforesaid. Plaintiff further avers that on, to-wit, the 18th day of December, A. D. 1873, at the town and county of Yuma, and territory of Arizona, he, the said plaintiff, and the said George M. Newsome, in his life-time, entered into a certain compact and agreement, said compact and agreement being hereto annexed, marked "Exhibit A," and made a part of this complaint, wherein the said George M. Newsome, of the one part, and the said plaintiff, of the other part, covenanted and agreed, one with the other, that upon the decease and death of either of the said parties to the said compact and agreement, then that all goods, chattels, and property, both individual and partnership, of whatever character, of which either of the said parties was seised at the time of his death should fall to and vest exclusively in the survivor, upon the said survivor paying all of the debts of the deceased party. The plaintiff further avers that the said George M. Newsome died on or about the 21st day of February, A. D. 1874, and that the said plaintiff is now the survivor, as mentioned in said compact and agreement, and legally entitled to the possession and ownership of all the property of which the said George M. Newsome died seised. Said property consists of and is described as follows, viz.: Two diamond rings, one plain gold ring, one large diamond breastpin, and one pair of diamond sleeve-buttons, (plaintiff avers that the above-described property is of great value;) also the interest of the said George M. Newsome in the unsettled business of the partnership formerly existing between the deceased and the said plaintiff, which is of the value of fifteen hundred dollars. That all of the above mentioned and described property, with the exception of the said partnership interest, above named, is now in the hands of the said defendant, as administrator of the estate of the said George M. Newsome, deceased. Plaintiff further avers that upon the said above last named day the said defendant, as such administrator, rejected the said compact and agreement by his written indorsement of rejection on the back of the same, as will more fully appear by reference to the Exhibit A. hereunto annexed. And plaintiff further avers, and shows as a ground for the equitable interposition of this court, that the real and intrinsic value of the said property in question and above described, with the exception of the said partnership interest, is unknown to the said plaintiff, nor can such real and intrinsic value be ascertained except by and through the most experienced lapidaries, and that the said plaintiff is informed and verily believes that there are no such experienced lapidaries within the jurisdiction of this court; that, if this court should refuse to equitably interfere between the said plaintiff and the said defendant, the said plaintiff could not be compensated in damages, for the reason such damages could not with any certainty be ascertained. And, as a further ground for the equitable relief sought for in the complaint, plaintiff avers that the property in question and above described, with the exception of said partnership interest, is to him of a value altogether beyond their price, or actual money worth,—a pretium affectionis on account of the bonds of friendship which united him to the said George M. Newsome; that if the said property were sold or departed from the possession and ownership of the said plaintiff, money or damages could not compensate him for the loss of said property. Plaintiff further avers that he has at all times been ready and willing and is now ready and willing to perform all of the conditions imposed upon him by the terms of the said compact and agreement hereunto annexed, to-wit, the payment of all of the debts of said partnership heretofore mentioned, and the individual debts of the said George M. Newsome, and that he has at divers times notified and informed the said defendant, as administrator of the said estate, of such readiness and willingness on his part to perform the said condition. And now the said plaintiff comes into court and says that he is now ready and willing to perform the said condition in any manner or form as this court shall deem fit and proper in the premises."

"EXHIBIT A.

"This agreement, made the eighteenth day of December, A. D. 1873, between George M. Newsome and Rufus E. Eldred, [sic,] witnesseth: That the parties hereto have been and are now full partners in all their business, of whatsoever kind, that has been contracted by them or either of them; that it is agreed now that, in the case of death of either partner, the surviving partner shall settle the business of the partnership, and that, after paying all the just debts of said partnership and the debts of the deceased partner, all the property, of every kind, money or stocks, remaining, shall belong to the surviving partner, for his sole use and benefit, without any process of law whatsoever, accounting only to the creditors of the firm, and the creditors of the deceased partner, and to no one else, without exception. This agreement has always been fully understood between the parties hereto, and after careful consideration is now fully understood, and we now bind ourselves, and all persons connected to or with us, firmly by this agreement. G. M. NEWSOME. [Seal.] R. E. ELDRED. [Seal.] Signed in presence of H. N. ALEXANDER."

Then next appears the following affidavit: "Territory of Arizona, county of Pima—ss.: Rufus E. Eldred, [sic,] being first duly sworn, deposes and says the within claim is justly due; that no payments have been made thereon; and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of the said affiant, the claimant. R. E. ELDRED. Subscribed and sworn to," etc.

Then comes the following indorsement of rejection: "Rufus E. Eldred having submitted to me this article of agreement as a claim against the estate of George M. Newsome, deceased, the same is hereby disallowed, this fifth day of May, A. D. 1874. SOLOMON WARNER, Administrator of the Estate of George M. Newsome, Deceased."

Then follows a copy of the summons; next, a demurrer that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action by McCaffry for defendant. Upon the hearing in the court below, the demurrer was sustained. Plaintiff appealed.

Appellant's counsel, claiming the instrument to be a contract, cited Logan v. Wienholt, 7 Bligh, (N. S.) 53; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 786; De Bell v. Thomson, 43 Eng. Ch. 468; Beckley v. Newland, 2 P. Wms. 182, as referred to in 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 343.

Respondent's counsel claimed it is not a will, (4 Kent, Comm. 633; Schumaker v. Schmidt, 4 Amer. Rep. 135; Brewer v. Baxter, 5 Amer. Rep. 530; Redf. Wills, c. 2, § 2; Martindale v. Warner, 15 Pa. St. 479;) it is not a claim against the estate, (Prob. Laws Ariz. T.; Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 31;) plaintiff should have gone to probate court first, (Prob. Laws Ariz. T.; Pond v. Pond, 10 Cal. 500; Comp. Laws, p. 376, §§ 13, 14;) it is not a valid will, (St. Wills, Comp. Laws, 250; Alter's Appeal, 5 Amer. Rep. 434.)

On the hearing in this court it was adjudged by the majority of the court that the judgment below sustaining the demurrer be reversed. I cannot concur, and I submit the following reasons for my dissent:

I will first, as a preliminary matter, consider whether the question of jurisdiction has been raised. Section 144 of the New York Code prescribes the first and sixth grounds for demurrer as follows: "(1) That the court has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, or of the subject of the action." "(6) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." New York Code, § 144. Section 40 of our civil practice act is the same, and is of course taken subject to such judicial construction as was had in New York prior to our adoption of it. Therefore, whatever objection could have been taken in New York under a demurrer for the sixth cause at the time our statute was adopted must also be allowed here. In New York it was held, under that statute, before our adoption of it, that although the usual form of excepting to the jurisdiction of the court is by special demurrer, under the first head, nevertheless this is not necessarily the form for the case of an objection to what is called the "equitable jurisdiction," which depends on remedy at law. Thus, the objection that the facts stated in the complaint do not present a proper case for the exercise of the equitable power of the court to remove a cloud from plaintiff's title is not an objection to the jurisdiction of the court, which must be taken specifically, under section 144, subd. 1, of the Code, but it may be taken by demurrer, under subdivision 6 of that section, on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Hotchkiss v. Elting, 36 Barb. 38, as quoted in 2 Abb. Pr. & Pl. p. 5, note x. The complaint in this case prayed for equitable relief alone, and showed that no other relief was possible, and expressly alleged that there was no adequate remedy at law. Under that showing in the complaint, the demurrer in this case raised the question of jurisdiction. Hotchkiss v. Elting, 36 Barb. 38. Besides this, section 45 of our civil practice act, following the sections assigning objections which may be taken by demurrer or answer, says: "If no such objections be taken either by demurrer or answer, the defendant shall be deemed to have waived the same, excepting only the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

The question of jurisdiction is never waived. It can be raised at any time, and there is nothing in our statute limiting a party to any particular way of raising such an objection, or any particular time when he shall do it. It would appear, then, that at any time such an objection is brought to the notice of the court in any way it must be entertained, and, if found good, it must be sustained. At least, I think there can be no doubt that such is the case, where there is an inherent, insuperable, incurable bar to the jurisdiction. I will not say, if there was a potential jurisdiction, but that, by a technical omission of the service of some notice or something of that sort, it had not been perfected, some formal motion might not be necessary in order to give the party in default a chance to explain or possibly remedy the defect; but where it is found that it is not within the power of the court, by any means known to the law, to acquire jurisdiction, then I do not consider that it is necessary even for counsel in the case to suggest the objection. It would be the duty of the court, I think, on suggestion of an amicus curiæ, or of its own motion, to dismiss the case, because, if objection of counsel was necessary to raise the point, then jurisdiction could be forced upon the court by consent of counsel or of parties, and this, it is well settled, cannot be done,—jurisdiction cannot be conferred by consent. Therefore I think the doctrine in Hotchkiss v. Elting, 36 Barb. 38, eminently sound, that a formal demurrer that the complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action very well raises the question whether it is a case of which the court can by any possibility have jurisdiction.

The complaint in this case was a bill in equity for specific performance, but it contains a certain statement of facts. If those facts, as stated, would give the plaintiff a standing in court on any other basis than the one he supposed he occupied, it may be urged that he would have been entitled to the proper relief, although such relief might have been at law, instead of in equity. I shall therefore consider this complaint in every way in which it seems possible to me that it might be made the ground for relief of any kind, either at law or in equity. I shall consider whether the demand made can be regarded as upon a "claim against the estate," in the sense of the probate act, or as upon a "contract" and, if it seems the instrument has reference to neither of these things, I shall endeavor to see what kind of a document it is, judged by the accepted canons of judicial construction, and, if found to be anything at all, whether in such case the court could grant any relief upon it.

Is this a "claim against the estate," in the sense of the probate act? To determine whether the claim made by plaintiff is such a claim as the statute contemplated, we must examine, first, what kind of a claim it is which plaintiff puts forward, and then see whether it falls within the class described in the statute. The plaintiff claims that by virtue of a certain instrument in writing, which he calls a "contract" between him and the deceased, he has practically become the sole and exclusive devisee of the deceased, with the right to take the whole estate and administer upon it himself, paying all just claims against the estate, and retaining the residue thereof to his own exclusive use and benefit. The demand he made upon the administrator was that the whole estate of the deceased, then in the hands of the administrator, be delivered to him. This the administrator refused to do. Whereupon plaintiff brought this action, praying that the court order the administrator to comply with his demand. Such was the claim which the plaintiff presented to the administrator.

Now let us see what kind of claims the statute says may be presented to the administrator, and which, upon his rejection thereof, the district court may examine and order to be paid in due course of administration, and let us consider, as we go along, whether in these sections the word "claim" does or does not mean a "money demand," and what a creditor may present. Section 128 of our probate act says that "every executor or administrator shall, immediately after his appointment, cause to be published in some newspaper published in the county," etc., "a notice to the creditors of the deceased requiring all persons having claims against the deceased to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers," etc. Section 130: "If a claim be not presented within ten months after the first publication of the notice, it shall be barred forever: provided, if it be not then due, or if it be contingent, it may be presented within ten months after it shall become due or absolute," etc. Section 131: "Every claim presented to the executor or administrator shall be supported by the affidavit of the claimant that the amount is justly due; that no payments have been made thereon; and that there are no offsets to the same, to the knowledge of the claimant, or other affiant. The amount of interest shall be computed and included in the statement of the claim, and the rate of interest determined," etc. Section 133: "Every claim which has been allowed by the executor or administrator, and approved by the probate judge, shall, within thirty days thereafter, be filed in the probate court, and be ranked among the acknowledged debts of the estate, to be paid in due course of administration," etc. Section 134: "When a claim is rejected, either by the executor or administrator or the probate judge, the holder shall bring suit in the proper court against the executor or administrator, within three months after the date of its rejection, if it be then due, or within three months after it becomes due; otherwise, the claim shall be forever barred." Section 140: "The effect of any judgment rendered against any executor or administrator upon any claim for money against the estate of his testator or intestate shall be only to establish the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator, and the probate judge, and the judgment shall be that the executor or administrator pay in due course of administration the amount ascertained to be due. A certified transcript of the judgment shall be filed in the probate court. No execution shall issue upon such judgment, nor shall it create any lien upon the property of the estate, or give to the judgment creditor any priority of payment." Section 147: "At the same term at which he is required to return his inventory, the executor or administrator shall also return a statement of all claims against the estate which shall have been presented to him. * * * In all such statements he shall designate the names of the creditors, the nature of each claim, when it became due, or will become due, and whether it was allowed or rejected by him." These sections speak of creditors, of amounts being due, payments thereon, offsets to the same, computations of interest, the rate of interest, and the payment of such claims in due course of administration. To my mind, it seems beyond question that in all these sections the legislature had in view one class of claims only, namely, money demands,—demands of a certain sum of money, or a sum which by examination could be made certain, a claim which would be fully met by a money judgment, or by an order to procure and pay a certain sum of money,—and not prayers for equitable relief, demands for specific performance, or claims for an entire estate. There seems to be no necessity for trying to give the preceding sections a wider range than was manifestly intended by their wording, namely, to provide for the adjustment of money demands, because the act makes full provision by means of other sections for the adjustment of every other kind of demand which can possibly arise in the settlement of an estate. There is no trouble in discovering what shall be done with different demands under the probate act. In its 306 sections, copied mainly from the California law, and profiting by all the experience had in that and other states, all is provided for, in a clear, orderly, and comprehensive manner. Every possible claim or demand or right connected with the settlement of an estate receives full consideration, and its appropriate section or sections prescribe how it shall be presented, and when it shall be determined. Some it sends to the administrator, some to the justice's court, some to the probate court, and some to the district court, each in its separate course, but all in harmony with established principles of jurisprudence. If these sections as to claims against the estate mean other claims than for money demands, then why such care in providing other sections for so many other kinds of demands, on which the proceeding is entirely different from that of going to the administrator with the demand? In the broad, unlimited sense of the word "claim," a person has a claim against the estate when the testator or intestate has wasted, destroyed, taken or carried away, or converted to his own use the goods or chattels of such person; so if he has committed trespass upon the real estate of such person; so where the deceased was bound by contract, in writing, to convey real estate to another; so where he had made any contract with another, on which he was liable during his life; so where a person is entitled to the recovery or possession of real or personal property. Yet all these claims are provided for in special sections, in a portion of the probate act entirely distinct and apart from the portion concerning what are technically called "claims against the estate," which are to be presented to the administrator, which special sections give a right of action, in the proper court, to a claimant of that class; but all of this would be useless and senseless if the term "claim against the estate to be presented to the administrator" covered all claims, even those other than money demands. Suppose a man claimed a pair of horses or 20 cows in the possession of the administrator, the administrator can take no action upon such a claim. The power to reject implies the power to judge and allow. When the administrator allows a claim, the effect is merely that it is set down as one of the just debts of the estate, to be paid in due course of administration, and the time for payment can hardly be less than one year, and may be several years, and how can he pay horses or cows or diamonds? But the owner is entitled to his horses or his cows or his diamonds immediately if he can show title, and so he is given a right of action for them at once, but that right of action is not as upon a "claim against the estate," in the technical sense of the probate act. The foregoing sections are substantially a copy of the California probate law. In that state, the question as to what is meant by the word "claim," in sections similar to those above quoted, has frequently arisen.

In Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 24, the subject received careful consideration. Mr. Justice FIELD, who delivered the opinion, stating that titles to property amounting in value to millions of dollars hung upon the meaning given to the word "claim" in the probate act. After a full review of sections similar to those above quoted, the judgment of the court was that, "whatever signification there may be attached to the term 'claim' standing by itself, it is evident that in the probate act it only has reference to such debts or demands against the decedent as might have been enforced against him, in his life-time, by personal actions for the recovery of money, and upon which only a money judgment could have been rendered." Under this view of the meaning of the term "claim" in the probate act, the court went so far as to declare in that case that even a mortgage lien was not a "claim against the estate," in the sense that it should be presented to the administrator for his action thereon, overruling two former decisions of the court on that point.

The same question has arisen in New York, under a law similar to ours, and thereupon the language of the court was: "The statutes contemplate an ordinary debt for which the deceased was liable in his life-time, upon a promise, express or implied; a debt which may be supported by the oath of the creditor, which is justly due, which may be the subject of an offset, and which was cognizable in the common-law courts." Sands v. Craft, 10 Abb. Pr. 216, 18 How. Pr. 438, as quoted in McClellan's Probate Practice, 234.

But the demand in this case could never have been enforced against the deceased in his life-time, and not even now could a judgment ordering a payment of any certain sum of money be rendered thereon, wherefore I consider it clear that this demand is not a claim against the estate which should have been presented to the administrator, and that therefore the plaintiff was not benefited in any way because he did so present the claim, and the case must be considered as if no such presentation was ever had, except in so far as the recitals in the complaint as to presentation show that plaintiff had notice of all the proceedings in the probate court connected with this estate. It would have been utterly impossible for the court below to have proceeded on this demand as upon a "claim against the estate," in the sense of the probate act, because in such cause the judgment is compelled, by section 140 of the probate law, to take a certain specific form, viz.: "And the judgment shall be that the executor or administrator pay, in due course of administration, the amount ascertained to be due." This matter being on demurrer, the statements in the complaint are to be taken as true, and the complaint states it is impossible to ascertain the amount in money which will be a satisfaction of plaintiff's demand; that money cannot compensate him; that he is praying for certain mementos of a deceased friend, which have for him a pretium affectionis, far beyond their money value, even if that value could be ascertained. So it is clear that no judgment, as upon a "claim against the estate," could have been rendered in this case, and therefore the complaint failed to make a case as on that ground.

Is this instrument a contract on which specific performance will lie? Specific performance will not lie on this instrument, as a contract, because (1) as a contract, the right of action is barred thereon by the probate law; (2) as a contract, the instrument is a violation of the statute of wills; (3) as a contract, it is against public policy, and therefore void.

1. As a contract, the right of action on this instrument is barred by the following section of our probate law: "Sec. 195. Actions for the recovery of any property, real or personal, or for the possession thereof, and all actions founded upon contracts, may be maintained by and against executors and administrators in all cases in which the same might have been maintained by or against their respective testators or intestates." Laws 1873, p. 143. Could any action have been maintained upon this instrument as upon a contract during the life of the deceased? Clearly not, for by the terms of the instrument itself no right accrued or could accrue to the plaintiff, until the death of the other party. The legislature has expressly declared that no action can be had upon it as a contract after his death.

2. As a contract, the instrument is in violation of the statute of wills. Section 4 of our statute of wills reads as follows: "Sec. 4. Every person of full age and sound mind may, by his last will and testament, in writing, bequeath and dispose of all his personal estate remaining at his decease, and all his rights thereto and interest therein, and all such estate not disposed of by the will 'shall be administered as intestate estate.'" Comp. Laws 1871, p. 250. There is a similar section as to real estate; and the instrument in this case undertakes to dispose of all property of every kind remaining at the death of either party after payment of debts. Here is a permission to dispose of personal property by will, coupled with the positive declaration that, if not disposed of by will, it must be administered upon as intestate estate; thus cutting off the right to dispose of it by contract. Counsel for plaintiff urge in their brief, filed in this case, the following proposition: "A person may dispose of his property in any way or manner he desires. He may, if not laboring under any legal disability, enter into any contract for the disposal of his property, either before or after his death, as he wishes. The law does not and cannot restrain him in this particular, unless it be done in subversion or in fraud of the right of others. A person desirous of disposing of his property after death may make a will, but most certainly the law does not limit him to that particular form or method of procedure." I think it is quite clear from the reading of section 4 of our statute of wills that the law does limit him to the particular form or method of procedure known as "making a will," and debars him from disposing of his property by a contract. That our legislature has the power to make such a statute I will consider in another part of this opinion. The supreme court of Iowa says: "A contract made in violation of a statute * * * is void, and cannot be enforced by action. This principle is sustained by a great number of authorities. Besides those just cited, we refer to a few others: Pennington v. Townsend, 7 Wend. 276; Robeson v. French, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 25; Lyon v. Strong, 6 Vt. 219; Gregg v. Wyman, 4 Cush. 322; Davis v. Bronson, 6 Iowa, 410; Wheeler v. Russell, 17 Mass. 258. This last is a leading case upon this subject, in which PARKER, C. J., says: 'No principle of law is better settled than that no action will be maintained upon a contract made in violation of the statute.'" Pike v. King, 16 Iowa, 52. And see post, in this opinion, the language of the court in Habergham v. Vincent, that a man is bound to follow the forms prescribed by law.

3. As a contract, the instrument is in violation of our public policy. It is the policy of our government, as well as of all civilized governments, to foster and uphold the family relation, the basis of all society. The family is fostered and protected by having the right to succeed to the estate of the ancestor. The right of succession is a part of our public policy. The statute of wills, so far as it allows an ancestor to name his heirs to the exclusion of his natural heirs, is in derogation of that right. The privilege which it gives is a privilege to disinherit the heir. It is a privilege very carefully guarded by the checks and limitations in the statute itself, requiring the act to be done in writing, by a person of full age, of sound mind, and in the presence of two witnesses, who shall attest the instrument at the time. The act of disinheritance in this case is against the public policy of the territory, and would be void independent of the statute of wills, because not sanctioned by any law. The territory is a possible heir itself to all estates. It comes next in succession after the failure of all natural heirs, and takes the property of an intestate as an escheated estate. It has a right to say that a stranger in blood shall not succeed to an estate to the exclusion of the natural and legal heirs, except in accordance with express provisions of law. It has named the conditions under which alone he may succeed. There is no provision of law allowing him to succeed under a simple contract, and such a contract is therefore void as against the public policy of this territory.

Plaintiff has cited only three authorities in support of his view that the instrument herein is a contract on which a decree for specific performance should be given, viz.: Logan v. Wienholt, De Beil v. Thomson, and Beckley v. Newland, but neither of them seems to me to have any bearing on the case at bar.

Logan v. Wienholt, 7 Bligh, (N. S.) 53, cited in 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 786, was a covenant by which a person bound himself to give, by his will, as much to A. as he gave to B., and it seems that it was held he was bound to do so. The case is expressly stated by Story to be cited to show how far courts of equity will go to enforce specific performance against parties and privies in estate. The case itself is not accessible to me. So many of the English cases of this nature seem to turn on contracts in marriage settlements which are held to pass an absolute present right, and to constitute an irrevocable charge on the estate, that the circumstances of the case may be important. B. may have been privy to the contract, consenting to it for a good consideration, but, however that may be, it seems that in England that case is not considered as governing a contract like the one at bar, for in the recent case of Ryan v. Daniel, hereinafter cited, specific performance upon an instrument similar to this was refused.

De Beil v. Thomson, 43 Eng. Ch. 468, was as follows: It is an English case. Mr. Thomson was a person possessed of considerable wealth, and had a marriageable daughter. De Beil was a single gentleman, having the title of "baron." Mr. Thomson entered into written agreement with the baron that if the latter would marry his daughter, thus making her a baroness, he would pay down the sum of £10,000 sterling, and would also leave a further sum of £10,000 in his will to be settled on his daughter and her children. The baron, in addition to marrying the young lady, was also bound to settle £500 a year upon her during her life. The baron performed his part of the agreement. He took Miss Thomson to wife, and settled £500 a year on her for life, secured out of his Mecklenburg estate. Mr. Thomson performed a part of his agreement. He paid down the £10,000, but he omitted to charge his estate in his will with the other £10,000, as he bound himself to do. De Beil, the plaintiff, son of the baron, his father and mother being dead, filed a bill praying that the executor of Mr. Thomson's estate should be compelled to pay the remaining £10,000, according to the agreement, and it was so ordered, and that is all there is in the case. I fail to see any material analogy between that case and the one at bar.

Beckley v. Newland, 2 P. Wins. 182, cited in 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 785, the only other authority adduced by plaintiff, is also irrelevant. Fry on Specific Performance (page 496) gives the gist of this case as follows: "In Beckley v. Newland, the plaintiff and defendant had married two sisters, who were the presumptive heiresses of Mr. Tur-gls, a very rich man, who had made and revoked several wills, and ultimately made one leaving a great estate to defendant, and only a small one to the plaintiff. Previously to the execution of the will, the plaintiff and the defendant had entered into an agreement for the equal division between them of what should be left to each of them, and this agreement was upheld and specifically enforced by Lord MACCLESFIELD, who said that the agreement was 'not disappointing the intent of the testator, for he did not design to put it out of the devisee's power to dispose of the estate after it should come to him; but, on the contrary, when the testator gave to either of them, he, by implication, gave to that person a power to dispose of the said estate when it should come to him.' Beckley v. Newland was, then, a contract between two persons to share equally an estate if it came to them or either of them. The contract in that case was one which could be, and was, enforced during the life of the parties making it, and, it might be argued, would not be obnoxious to the section of our probate act before cited, which bars all actions on contracts against an executor or administrator except such as could have been enforced against the deceased during his life-time, although even then, if the plaintiff waited until the decease of the other party, he might be met by the case of Morse v. Faulkner, 3 Swanst. Ch. 433, note, to the effect that a liability on such a contract is purely personal, and dies with the person. See Fry, Spec. Perf. (2d Amer. Ed.) 499. But such a contract has been held illegal in this country, even during the life-time of both parties.

In Mercier v. Mercier, 50 Ga. 546, "plaintiff agreed with defendant, her brother, (who proposed to contract a marriage of which their father disapproved, threatening if it was contracted to leave all his property to plaintiff,) that she would divide the property, if left to her, equally with defendant, who agreed to do the same if the property should be left to him. Defendant was married accordingly, and his father afterwards died and left him all his property. Held, that the agreement between plaintiff and defendant was against public policy, and that a bill would not lie for specific performance of it,"—as quoted in 10 Amer. Law Rev. (Oct., 1875,) p. 137.

I do not consider either of these cases in point. I have cited Mercier v. Mercier merely to place it side by side with Beckley v. Newland. I will now cite a case the analogy of which to the one at bar will, I think, be evident. I refer to the recent case of Ryan v. Daniel, I Young, & C. Ch. 60. Fry, in his Specific Performance, states the case of Ryan v. Daniel as follows: "In the latter case, each of two young officers in the army signed and gave to the other a document by which each charged his estate with £1,000 in favor of the other, in case the other should survive him, the consideration of each of these documents being the other of them. Many years subsequently a correspondence passed between these officers with a view to a rescission of the transaction, but that intention was never carried into effect. The court held that, looking at the circumstances of the transaction, the age and condition of the parties, and their subsequent correspondence, there was no equitable claim which the court could enforce; but it retained the bill for 12 months, with liberty to bring an action to establish, if they could, a legal debt." Fry, Spec. Perf. (2d Amer. Ed.) 499. In this last case the claim was for a certain fixed sum of money, which possibly might have been established as a money demand against the estate, to be paid in due course of administration, and the court, while denying the plaintiff equitable relief on the contract, held the case open for a year to give him a chance to establish it as a legal debt, or what we would call a "claim" or money demand against the estate, so that, if he did succeed in establishing it, the court might make the requisite order, (I suppose in case the executor refused to pay it.) Our system, as I have shown, is different. A claim in that sense does not, with us, come into the equity court at all, and this action is based on the assumption that the demand herein is not a claim of that kind. The probate law and statute of wills of this territory are public acts, of which, together with the public policy of the country, courts must take judicial notice. The instrument set forth as the whole foundation of the action being void on its face as a contract, I think it appeared on the face of the complaint that there were not sufficient facts stated to constitute a cause of action, as upon a claim, or as upon a contract. It remains to be seen whether there was any force in the instrument viewed in any other light upon which the court might have acted, and this brings me to the consideration of the question, what kind of an instrument is this which was executed by plaintiff and deceased?

In law, instruments are classed according to their legal effect, notwithstanding the parties may have considered they had a different effect, or may have given them a different name, at the time of their execution. Parties may sign an instrument and call it a "deed," but the courts will sometimes tell them that it is in fact a bond or a mortgage or a contract, or probably, to their surprise, they may be informed that it is not a deed at all, but a will. The courts have certain legal tests for determining the character of instruments submitted to them. The test to discover whether a document is a will or not is to inquire whether it passes a present interest, or whether it passes no interest until after the death of the maker. In the first case, it is not a will; in the second case, it is a will, no matter what may be its form.

Let us look at some English authorities on the point. Habergam v. Vincent, 2 Ves. Jr. 205, 4 Brown, Ch. 353, was argued before the high court of chancery in England, in 1793, Lord LUTHERBOROUGH, chancellor. In this case a person made a will disposing of all of his estate, prescribing the line of succession through a great number of possible contingencies. At a certain point in these limitations he stopped, weary, possibly, with following the line of possible succession, and declared that he reserved to himself the right to dispose by deed of the way his estate should go if the last contemplated contingency should fail. The next day, fresh for the work, he took up the tangled thread of remainders, and by a deed-poll directed how the estate should go in the event of the failure of the last contingency provided for in the will; and soon after he died. Then, in a surprisingly short space of time, every one of the dispositions in the will failed by the death of all the heirs under the will. Then the latent power of this deed-poll came into play, and the question was, should it operate as a deed or as a will? If it fully operated as a will, it would disinherit the heir at law and pass the estate to a stranger in blood. The case was argued first before Lord THURLOW, and he, the report says, "having taken a long time to consider," sent it to the king's bench in 1792. In consequence of too brief a statement of the case as sent, the court of king's bench held the deed-poll to be a deed, and incompetent to vest any estate in the parties claiming under it. The case was reargued in the high court of chancery, before Lord LOUGHBOROUGH, and he declared that he thought the deed-poll was in fact a testamentary document, but, having been decided differently in the king's bench, he did not like to decree it alone, therefore would give another hearing, and call in two judges from that bench that they may enlighten him in the matter. He called Justices BULLER and WILSON. The case was then reargued before the lord chancellor and those two judges, three counsel being heard on each side, one of whom was the attorney general. The lord chancellor complimented the counsel on their efforts, declaring that the question had been argued with "great industry and ability." I mention all this to show what thorough consideration was given to the question as to how a document may be testamentary in its nature, though it be not in the form of a will, nor intended as a will, but really intended as a deed. It was on this final hearing in the high court of chancery unanimously decided that the instrument was not a deed, but a will; that it would not pass any of the freehold estates, because for that purpose it was defective as a will, it not having sufficient witnesses, but that it was sufficiently attested to pass the copy-hold estate of the testator, one witness being sufficient for that purpose; that therefore the freehold estate should go to the heir at law of the testator, as not having been otherwise devised, but that the copy-hold should go to the heir of the surviving trustee. Mr. Justice BULLER, in delivering his opinion, said: "The first point I shall consider is whether the last instrument is testamentary, or not. * * * It was argued for plaintiff that the testator did not intend to make a will when he executed the deed, and therefore it cannot operate as a will. Whether the testator would have called this a 'will' or a 'deed' is one question; whether it shall operate in law as a deed or a will is a distinct question, and that is now to be considered. That is to be governed by the provisions in the instrument. A deed must take effect upon its execution or not at all. It is not necessary to convey an immediate interest in possession, but it must take effect as passing that interest executed, but a will is quite the reverse. It can only operate after death, and upon this instrument it is clear the testator had no idea that this paper would have any effect until a distant period long after his death. * * * When this case was argued there, [in the king's bench,] no one of the cases quoted here by the attorney general was mentioned or alluded to. I freely confess they did not occur to me. But those cases have established that an instrument in any form, whether a deed-poll or an indenture, if the obvious purpose is not to take effect till after the death of the person making it, shall operate as a will. The cases for that are both in law and equity, and in one of them there were express words of immediate grant, and a consideration to support it as a grant; but as, upon the whole, the intention was that it should have a future operation after death, it was considered as a will. Therefore, this last instrument must be considered as a codicil, and I shall call it so in what I shall say upon it. The next question is what effect this codicil has upon the freehold. Upon that point I agree with my Brother WILSON that it is void for want of three witnesses;" but as to the copy-hold. BULLER, J., says, the others concurring, that one witness was sufficient.] The Lord Chancellor, in giving his opinion, concurred in the view that the deed-poll was, in law, a testamentary document, and said: "Thirdly. There is no difference between law and equity in determining upon the effect of a testamentary act, and this instrument cannot pass the freehold estate, contrary to the provisions of a public law making that act void, [that is, the law for wills requiring three witnesses for such a will.]" * * * The observation made by Justice WILSON is unanswerable, that it is not a personal privilege; that no man can reserve a power to act against the forms the law has imposed. Therefore, if it is to pass by a testamentary act, that must have all the requisite solemnities the law has directed." Mr. Justice WILSON declared: "By the common law a man could not devise land. Then came the statute permitting him to do so by an instrument properly signed. Then, lest testators should be imposed upon, these guards were created by the statute of frauds, and that insists that a will of land shall either be executed in the manner pointed out or be void. [In this territory wills as to realty and personalty are on the same footing.] This does not leave it at the option of the testator, but is a positive provision that a will shall be void if not executed according to the statute, and the testator cannot say he will make a will without the requisites prescribed, either not thinking he will be imposed upon or not caring about it. The law will not suffer that, but requires, in all cases, that these ceremonies, which might be considered as circumstances only if the act had not said otherwise, shall be essential and be observed in making every will." Habergham v. Vincent, 2 Ves. Jr. 205, 4 Brown, Ch. 353. I have quoted language from the above case on points other than construction of instruments, namely, as to the binding force of the statute of wills, as cutting off equitable relief in cases not within the statute, to which I will refer in a subsequent portion of this opinion.

To continue with the English authorities, Jarman states: "The law has not made it requisite to the validity of a will that it should assume any particular form, or be couched in language technically appropriate to its testamentary character. It is sufficient that the instrument, however irregular in form or inartificial in expression, disclose the intention of the maker respecting the posthumous destination of his property, and, if this appears to be the nature of its contents, any contrary title or designation which he may have given to it will be disregarded. Thus a deed-poll, or even an agreement or other instrument between parties, has repeatedly been held to have a testamentary operation. * * * The ecclesiastical judges (before whom, of course, questions of this kind are most frequently agitated) act fully up to the principle which regards as testamentary any instrument that is designed not to take effect until the maker's decease, though assuming the form of a disposition inter vivos, and more especially if it be incapable of operation in the intended form; and accordingly in repeated instances the prerogative court has granted probate of such irregular documents as the assignment of a bond by indorsement, receipts for stock, and bills indorsed, a letter, marriage articles, and promissory notes, and notes payable by executors, in order to avoid the legacy duty." 1 Jarm. Wills, 13-20, (my italics.) Also unsigned drafts of bonds. (Id. 20;) also a deed conveying real estate, which contained a clause that, on the death of the survivor of two cestuis que trustent, trustees should "pay over all the property to different persons," (Id. 20;) and many other cases similar in principle there cited.

Of course, our statute of wills would prevent probate here of such instruments; that is, it would determine that as wills, or testamentary documents, they would be bad, not that they would be good for some other purpose. To make them available for other purposes, it would be necessary to show that they were not testamentary in their nature, for it does not follow that any given instrument must be of some force for some purpose; it may easily be of no force for any purpose. Dufour v. Pereira, 1 Dick. 419, cited in Walpole v. Orford, 3 Ves. 416, was a case where two persons signed an agreement before a notary public, providing for the disposition of their property after the death of either, and also after the death of the survivor. The parties were man and wife, but they were foreigners, and in their own country some of the property was the separate property of the wife, but the property, consisting of personalty, and being in their possession in England, was, by law there, the property of the husband.

To save their rights, they signed an agreement declaring with great minuteness what should be done after the death of either and of both. The husband died first, but the instrument was not treated, as to him, as a contract. It was probated as his will. By the terms of the instrument, the wife was to have the enjoyment during life, and, limited to that, of all the specific interests. She had a limited power of disposing of part of that property, but all she had was upon condition that she should dispose of it together with such other property as she might acquire after death upon the "dispositions of that will." Such is the language of the opinion. By "dispositions of that will" is evidently meant the terms of the agreement, which agreement was held to be the will of the party who first died. The wife on her death undertook to dispose of the property received by her under this will, and other property she had afterwards acquired, in a manner different from the terms imposed by the agreement or will; and then came a bill for specific performance, and Lord CAMDEN held that, by signing that instrument and taking the benefit of it, she had entered into an agreement to take the property devised to her, subject to the conditions of the instrument under which she took, one of which was that if she took that property she should stand by her agreement that on her death it should go as directed in the agreement, together with whatever property she might acquire after her husband's death. That, I take it, is the extent to which the instrument in Dufour v. Pereira was held to be a contract. It was construed to be the will of the party dying first, but the terms of it were binding as a contract upon the survivor who had chosen to accept its conditions.

In the case at bar, the survivor is named as "legatee," conditioned, however, that he will pay the debts of the estate. He may rightfully claim these diamonds, which he alleges are of such great value, and which he declares have a pretium affectionis for him, which cannot be estimated in money, if he can get the instrument probated as a will, and will comply with the conditions. The instrument is a contract, as to this plaintiff, to this extent: that he has agreed that he shall have no right to the diamonds unless he pays all the debts of the deceased.

In the case of Walpole v. Orford, 3 Ves. 402, from which the above is cited, an attempt was made to prove an agreement for a mutual will. The agreement was not proved, but the chancellor declared that even if it were proved, unless it were shown to be revocable, it would not be enforced. It follows from that, that, if an instrument setting forth such an agreement be not revocable, it cannot be enforced. If it be revocable, then, being a direction for the disposition of property after death, not to take effect until after death, it is ambulatory in its nature, and is a testamentary document.

Let us now look at the American authorities: "A will may be defined to be a legal, revocable disposition of one's property, to take effect from his death."

Langdon v. Astor, 16 N. Y. 49, as quoted in O'Hara on construction of Wills, 4. "Such an instrument may be couched in any form or language, provided that its whole operation is postponed to the death of the grantor. In one case there were both a consideration for the grant and words of immediate transfer, yet the instrument was held to be testamentary." Allison v. Allison, 4 Hawks, 141, cited by O'Hara, p. 4. "In the United States, as well as in England, the testamentary character of a document depends on its substance, and not on its form, except so far as that depends on the statute." Id., referring to Carle v. Underhill, 3 Bradf. 101, and In re Easton's Will, 6 Paige, 186. "A last will and testament may be defined as the disposition of one's property, to take effect after death." 1 Redf. Wills, c. 2, sec. 1; Turner v. Scott, 51 Pa. St. 126; Frederick's Appeal, 52 Pa. St. 338. "Where the payee of a promissory note made special indorsement to the effect that, if he were not living at the time of its payment, he ordered the contents paid to a person named, and died before the note was paid, the indorsement was held to be of a testamentary character, and entitled to probate as a will." 1 Redfield on Wills, 169, referring to Hunt v. Hunt, 4 N. H. 434, 17 Amer. Dec. 438. "A deed which, in terms, was not to operate until after the decease of the grantor has been held testamentary, and as such admitted to probate." Id. referring to Gage v. Gage, 12 N. H. 371; Ingram v. Porter, 4 McCord, 198; Milledge v. Lamar, 4 Desaus. Eq. 617. "Although an instrument is in form a deed, if it appears on its face that it was only intended to have effect after the death of the maker, it will be regarded as testamentary." Sartor v. Sartor, 39 Miss. 760, as cited in 1 Redfield on Wills, 174, note 27. "We are not aware that any essential difference exists in regard to the construction of wills between courts of law and courts of equity." 1 Redf. Wills, 500.

The question as to whether an instrument in the form of an agreement was testamentary in its nature or not was considered in the supreme court of Iowa, and it was held that the instrument was testamentary. The opinion states that the rule of construction by which to determine whether the instrument is a will or a contract is: "If the instrument passes a present interest, although the right to its possession or enjoyment may not accrue until some future time, it is a deed or a contract; but, if the instrument does not pass an interest or right till the death of the maker, it is a will or testamentary paper." The italics are as in the opinion. University v. Barrett, 22 Iowa, 60. Certainly the deceased in the case at bar did not intend to pass any interest in his property until after his death, for he did not covenant to stand seised of any property at all, but simply declared that whatever he might have at his death should go to the plaintiff.

In construing instruments, courts look at the intention of the maker, but in the matter of disposing of property the intention which they inquire into is not what kind of an instrument he intended to execute, but what kind of an estate he intended to create. The subject-matter in the mind of the maker is not what the instrument may be called in law, but what he is doing with the property. A man may very well know whether, in giving away a portion or the whole of his property, he wants to give it out and out, at the time, or whether he intends the gift shall not take effect until after his death, though he may not know or care what legal terms courts would use to designate the instrument he executes. The intention as to the property is the vital thing, and that is the intention the courts try to get at, for an instrument is not the will of the maker unless it is correctly interpreted. His real will is not the paper itself, nor the writing which is upon it. The writing is merely intended as the expression of his will, intention, or desire. It may not correctly express that desire or thought. In fact, correctly expressing it, if properly understood, the language may be misunderstood, and then his real will is not executed at all. Therefore the question the courts try to solve is, what did the maker really wish to do with his property? This distinction was clear in the mind of the supreme court of Georgia when it declared: "In determining whether an instrument be a deed or a will, the court will not consider what the maker believed it to be, but what, in point of law, it is. The intention of the maker as to the character of the estate conveyed is the criterion by which the court will determine whether a given paper is a deed or a will, and, if the intention gathered from the whole paper is that the estate is not to pass until his death it is a will, and not a deed." Brewer v. Baxter, 41 Ga. 212, referring also to Hester v. Young, 2 Ga. 31.

I think I have cited enough to show that, under both the English and American authorities, any instrument, no matter what may be its form, which undertakes to dispose of property, the disposition not to take effect till after the death of the maker, no interest of any kind passing until after his death, is a testamentary document, to be treated entirely as such, so far as it relates to such property, and that the rules for construing such an instrument are the same in equity as in law; that, the character of the instrument once established as a will, it must then be treated throughout, so far as it relates to such property, as a will, to have force as a will so far as the disposition of that property is concerned, or else have no force at all in that respect. In University v. Barrett, 22 Iowa, 72, the court said that counsel, contending that the instrument was a contract, cited 12 cases in support of that proposition. None of these cases cited are accessible to me, but I find, in looking at the brief of counsel citing them, that five of them are cited in support of the proposition that "an instrument conveying personal property absolutely, but retaining possession and control thereof during the life of the grantor, is valid." In reply to those cases, it may be answered (1) that the instrument in this case does not pretend to convey any personal property absolutely; (2) that, even if it did, such mode of disposing of personal property after death is forbidden in this territory by statute, which declares it can be done only by will, executed with the same formalities as a will for realty. Of the remaining seven cases, three of them are cited in support of the proposition that "an obligation to be performed or to pay money after the death of the obligor is a valid contract, and not a testamentary writing." In the instrument at bar, there is no obligation to pay money after death, and if it be claimed that it imposes an obligation to be performed after death, and is thereby a contract in the sense of those cases, it may be answered that, if the obligation was not to be performed until after death, no action could have been had on such a contract during the life of the party; and, however it may be elsewhere, in this territory the legislature has declared that no action can be maintained against an executor or administrator on such a contract as a contract. The policy and letter of our law practically make all contracts of that nature void as contracts, by taking away all right of action on them as contracts. The wisdom of the law is evident. When the man is dead, the fight for the estate begins. Secret contracts are easily fabricated. The man is dead and cannot contradict or explain them. The estate may be plundered, to the prejudice of lawful heirs. Therefore, to protect the heirs, the law declares that there shall be no incumbrance on the estate except such as might have been enforced during the life of the testator, or such as he imposed upon it by will, in the presence of witnesses, as prescribed by law. But, whether wise or not, such is our law, and we are bound by it. Of the remaining four cases so cited they are in support of the following propositions, respectively: (1) An agreement to devise land in consideration of the payment of an annual sum vests an equitable title in the obligee. Johnson v. McCue, 34 Pa. St. 180. (2) A deed referring to and incorporating a will is good, and, taking the two papers together, shall be considered a deed, even if the disposition of the property is to take effect in the future. Dawson v. Dawson, Rice, Eq. 260. (3) Where a deed conveys lands for such uses as are not set out in a will already made, neither deed nor will is revocable, if no power of revocation is in the deed. Mayor, etc., v. Williams, 6 Md. 262. I do not think there is anything in these three cases to break the force of the long line of authorities cited to show what constitutes a will. And such was the opinion of the supreme court where those cases were cited, for the instrument in question there was held to be a will, although in the form of an obligation to pay a certain sum of money after death.

The last of the 12 cases cited to establish the instrument in the Iowa case as a contract is directly in harmony with those I have cited as establishing the instrument here as a will. It is cited as follows: "A test for determining whether an instrument is a deed or a will is: If the instrument was effective and operative at its execution, it is a deed. If it was only to be effective and operative in the future, it is a will." Cumming v. Cumming, 3 Ga. 479.

Judge SAFFOLD, who delivered the able opinion in Schumaker v. Schmidt, 44 Ala. 454, says that in Golding v. Golding, 24 Ala. 122, "an instrument conveying a posthumous interest was regarded a deed, because it could not operate as a will for want of the requisite number of witnesses." Golding v. Golding is not accessible to me, but, if the court really did adopt that rule for determining whether an instrument was a deed or a will, I can only state that I consider, in so doing, it not only departed from the established authorities, but broke new and dangerous ground. I understand the character of the instrument is determined by the character of the estate conveyed, and not by the argument ab inconvenienti. By the rule in Golding v. Golding, as stated, every defective will would, if possible, be enforced in some other form, often to the exclusion of a prior perfect will, and the door would thus be opened to endless fraud; for, if the requisite number of witnesses to a will may be dispensed with, all witnesses may be omitted, and the forger require no confederate in wresting any estate from the lawful heirs. The statute of wills would become a nullity, and no estate would be safe. Golding v. Golding is in direct conflict with Habergham v. Vincent, herein cited, where the instrument was executed for a deed, which could not fully operate as a will, for want of the requisite number of witnesses, and yet was still held a will and not a deed.

In the case at bar, the instrument could not be effective to pass any interest to either party until the death of the other. All of the property prayed for by this bill was the individual property of the deceased, outside of the partnership funds, consisting of jewelry and diamonds, which he might at any time have disposed of as he saw fit. It was only in the event of his death with that property in his possession and ownership that plaintiff could acquire any interest in it. Therefore it seems clear to me that, if plaintiff has any claim at all on this estate, it is a claim as heir under a testamentary document, and not as a creditor of the deceased, nor as one taken under a contract. The instrument at bar is therefore a will.

This brings me to the question, can our district courts establish a will? The instrument in this case is in law a will, but it has not yet been probated so as to have legal force as a will. Could the district court have proceeded to hear proof of the execution of this instrument, and establish it as the will of deceased? Or could it grant any relief to the plaintiff on his bill until the legal proof of the character of this instrument had been regularly made? Or could it even then give relief on original bill? Plaintiff did not pray for the allowance of a money demand against the estate. He expressly declared that no money judgment was possible. He prayed for the estate itself, alleging that he was the person properly entitled to receive it, and asked for an order removing the whole estate from the control of the administrator, and placing it in his own hands for settlement. He asked the court below to set aside all proceedings had in the probate court, and to take upon itself the task of ordering the administration and settlement of the estate. He assigns no reason why he did not seek relief in the probate court first. He did not allege any irregularity or fraud in the proceeding of the probate court connected with this estate, and did not show that he could not at the time of commencing his action in the district court have obtained relief even then in the probate court, but, on the contrary, as will be seen hereafter, he showed that the probate court at that time still had jurisdiction of this estate, and that his demand could have been heard and determined there. Nevertheless, he presented the demand in the first instance to the district court, the presentation he made to the administrator being no presentation at all. Under our system, have our district courts the power, even as courts of equity, to take original jurisdiction of such a demand? To answer this question, we must inquire a little into the constitution of our judicial system. If we go back to the source of our judicial power, and note how this power has been ordered, arranged, and distributed, then, if there has been any express disposition made of the particular power required in this case, we can easily find where it has been lodged. The act creating the territory, in force long before the execution of the instrument which is the foundation of this action, and ever since and now in force, declares as follows: "The judicial power of said territory shall be vested in a supreme court, district court, probate court, and in justices of the peace." Section 10, Organic Act N. M., made applicable to Arizona, February 24, 1863. By the same act the following decree was made concerning the jurisdiction of the said courts: "The jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and that of probate courts and of justices of the peace, shall be as limited by law." Id. By the same act the power to limit this jurisdiction was given to the legislature of Arizona in these words: "The legislative power [of Arizona] shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the constitution of the United States," etc. Id. § 7. The supreme court of the United States has passed upon this question as to what this grant of power means, and has defined it in the following language: "Whenever congress has proceeded to organize a government for any of the territories, it has merely instituted a general system of courts therefor, and has committed to the territorial assembly full power, subject to a few specified or implied conditions, of supplying all details of legislation necessary to put the system in operation, even to the defining of the jurisdiction of the several courts, as a general thing subject to the general scheme of local government chalked out by the organic act, and such special provisions as are contained therein. The local legislature has been intrusted with the enactment of the entire system of municipal law, subject also, however, to the right of congress to revise, alter, and revoke, at its discretion. The powers thus exercised by the territorial legislatures are nearly as extensive as those exercised by any state legislature, and the jurisdiction of the territorial courts is collectively co-extensive with and correspondent to that of the state courts, a very different jurisdiction from that exercised by the circuit and district courts of the United States. In fine, the territorial, like the state, courts, are invested with plenary municipal jurisdiction." Hornbuckle v. Toombs, 18 Wall. 655.

This disposes of the claim made by plaintiff that the legislature has no power to say that a man may not dispose of his property after death by compact or contract, instead of by will, if he desires to do so. The legislature has full power over all rightful subjects of legislation, and the matter of the disposition of estates is generally admitted to be a rightful subject of legislation. Some deny it, I know. There is a school of sociologists which claims that no man, by any human law, can rightfully have any exclusive control of any property either before or after death, but the dicta of these philosophers are not authority in this court. Our political and judicial systems recognize that these matters are proper and rightful subjects of legislation, and our legislature has full power in the premises. In the exercise of this power, the legislature enacted an elaborate probate law of 306 sections, and gave to the probate court exclusive original jurisdiction of the settlement of the estates of deceased persons. Laws 1873, p. 100. It also enacted a law concerning "wills," and gave like jurisdiction thereof to the probate court. Comp. Laws 1877, p. 250. The following is one of the sections thereof: "Sec. 5. No will made within this territory, except such nuncupative wills as are mentioned in the following section, shall be effectual to pass any estate, whether real or personal, nor to charge or in any way affect the same, unless it be in writing, and signed by the testator, or by some persons in his presence, and by his express direction, and attested and subscribed in the presence of the testator by two or more competent witnesses," etc. The remainder of the section says, merely, that, if the witnesses are competent at the time, subsequent incompetency is immaterial. Here is another section of the same law: "Sec. 13. No will shall be effectual to pass either real or personal estate unless it shall have been duly proved and allowed in the probate court as provided by law, or on appeal in the district court, or supreme court; and the probate of a will of real or personal estate, as above mentioned, shall be conclusive as to its due execution." It will be noticed by referring to the instrument that it was made in this territory, and section 5 of our statute of wills not only says that the instrument at bar, having only one witness, shall, as a will, not only not pass any estate, but shall not charge or in any way affect the same. This certainly cuts off even all equitable relief under such an instrument, or any testamentary document not fully up in all respects to the express requirements of section 5. By another act the legislature created the office of public administrator, and made it his duty to administer upon all intestate estates, under the direction of the probate court. The district court has no right to direct him in his duty except on appeal. Comp. Laws, 566. Section 294 of the probate act provides that the mode of reviewing the action of the probate court shall be by appeal to the district court. Laws 1873, p. 162. This appeal is not taken by filing of the original bill in the district court, but must be on notice in the probate court; and the proceedings as to the notice, bond, transcript, etc., are the same as on appeal from the district court to the supreme court. Prob. Act. §§ 293-299. Section 60 of the probate act provides that notice shall be publicly given of all applications for letters of administration, and of the time of hearing. Section 61 provides that any person interested may contest the application, assert his rights, etc. Section 62 provides that, on hearing, the court shall make such order concerning the issuance of letters as the case may require, and in the section concerning appeals special mention is made that an appeal to the district court may be had from such an order of the probate court. There is still another way of removing an administrator, and this one was open to the plaintiff at the time he filed his bill below. Section 98 of our probate law reads as follows: "Sec. 98. If, after granting letters of administration on the grounds of intestacy, a will of the deceased shall be duly proved and allowed by the court, the letters of administration shall be revoked, and the power of the administrator shall cease, and he shall render an account of his administration within such time as the court shall direct." Laws 1873, p. 117. The right to take the property from an administrator once appointed is thus expressly reserved to the probate court. The administrator may answer to the demand made by plaintiff in this case: "I know nothing of orders direct from the district court. I gave a bond to answer for this estate to the probate court. The law requires me to act under the direction of the probate court. I have no settlement with the district court. I must report to the probate court, and settle there before I can get my discharge. If I come back empty-handed to the only court with which I have to deal, an order from the district court direct to me will not excuse me. I can take my orders only from the probate court. The district court may speak to me only through the probate court. By section 299, Prob. Act, the only way a judgment of the district court can reach me is by having a copy sent to the probate court, and there entered as the judgment of the probate court. Then I am able to settle with my court, for I can cite its own judgment as my authority for surrendering the estate; but this can only be done in the case of an appeal, or perhaps in the different actions permitted against me, but of which, in any event, this is not one." All of the aforesaid acts were in force before the execution of the instrument which is the foundation of this action, and ever since have been, and still are, in force.

The plaintiff states, of his own knowledge, he knows that the deceased died intestate; that the public administrator of Pima county duly applied for letters of administration on the estate of the deceased; and that the probate court, by an order duly entered and filed, granted such letters; and he stated other facts going to show that the proceedings of the probate court in the premises were all in regular accordance with law, and that he had full notice of all proceedings in this matter in the probate court. The question then is, had he the right to ignore all those proceedings of the probate court, to neglect his protest, waive his appeal, and file his original bill in the district court praying that the order of the probate court be considered a nullity, and that the whole estate be removed from the control of the administrator and be given to heirs? I think it is clear that he could not. The district court has no power to entertain such a bill. Plaintiff showed, by his own bill, that the administrator was prima facie rightfully in the possession of the estate, and administering upon it, according to law. He alleged no reason why all the regular and orderly proceedings of the probate court should be set aside, ignored, made absolutely null and void, except to allege that he himself, by virtue of a certain document, was the rightful heir to the estate, and should be put in possession thereof. But the twenty-ninth section of the probate act tells him what he should do under such circumstances,—he should have exhibited his testamentary document to the probate court, and asked to have it admitted as the will of the deceased. Administration was still going on in the probate court, and there was a special provision of law for such a case as plaintiff said he had, namely, a document disposing of an estate which had been declared intestate. If the probate court admitted it as good, it would have revoked the letters of administration of the public administrator, and put the plaintiff, or some person, in possession. If the court ruled against him, then he could have gone to the district court on appeal, and he would have been entitled to a hearing; but he might just as well go to the supreme court, or the court of another territory, with his claim, as to go into the district court by original bill. The law has created a special court to consider such claims, and has given it exclusive original jurisdiction of such matter. The only grant of original probate jurisdiction found in our law is to the probate courts, and the statute fixing the jurisdiction of the district courts excludes it therefrom. The sections are as follows: "Sec. 12. In addition to the jurisdiction of the district courts as conferred by the constitution and laws of the United States, their jurisdiction shall be of two kinds,—First, original; second, appellate. Sec. 13. Their original jurisdiction shall extend to all civil cases where the amount exceeds one hundred dollars, exclusive of interest, and to all criminal cases not otherwise provided for. In cases involving the title or possession of real property, and in all issues of fact joined in the probate court and brought into this court as provided by law, their jurisdiction shall be unlimited. Sec. 14. The appellate jurisdiction of these courts shall extend to hearing on appeal. * * * (2) An order or judgment of the probate court in the cases prescribed by statute." Comp. Laws, 376. This shows that the probate court has exclusive original jurisdiction at law of all probate matters, and it is only where a matter cannot be heard and determined by the law courts that the powers of a court of equity may be invoked. If a claimant neglects or refuses to appear in the proper court, it is his own lookout, and even the power of a court of equity cannot save him. The district court could not hear the claimant in this case upon original bill, even if he had been beyond seas at the time this administration was granted, and had come back with a perfectly regular will; nay, not even though his will were good, and a forged one had been probated in his absence, the administration being still in progress. An application to a court of equity to practically set aside an order of a probate court giving an estate into the hands of a public administrator differs in no respect in principle from an application to set aside the probate of a will. It is an application, in each case, to review and reverse, upon original bill, the action of a probate court, in a matter where that court has exclusive original jurisdiction.

In the case of Broderick's Will, 21 Wall. 503, there was an application to a court of equity to annul the action of a probate court, in admitting a will to probate. As stated by Wallace, it was "a suit in equity brought by the alleged heirs at law of David C. Broderick, late United States senator from California, to set aside the probate of his will, and have the same declared a forgery, and to recover the said Broderick's estate, much of which consisted of lands now comprised in the thickly-settled portions of the city of San Francisco." It is evident from this that it was a great case. It was carried to the supreme court of the United States. The bill charged fraud in the probate, fraud in the will, fraud in the sale, fraud in the purchasers, fraud from beginning to end, and that the plaintiffs were beyond seas at the time, and knew not of the fraud until administration had closed in the probate court, wherefore they had no possible relief at law, and therefore prayed for it in equity. Could a stronger case be presented? Yet the bill was demurred to, demurrer sustained, and the judgment affirmed by the supreme court of the United States. The first ground taken was that the equity courts had no jurisdiction, the matter being vested exclusively in the probate courts. In considering this point, the court declares: "As to the first point, it is undoubtedly the general rule, established both in England and in this country, that a court of equity will not entertain jurisdiction of a bill to set aside a will or the probate thereof. The case of Kerrich v. Bransby, 7 Brown, Parl.

Cas. 437, decided by the house of lords in 1727, is considered as having definitely settled the question. * * * And one of the principal reasons assigned by the equity courts for not entertaining bills on questions of probate is that the probate courts themselves have all the powers and machinery to give full and adequate relief." The court quotes with approval the language of Lord LYNCHURST in Allen v. Macpherson, 1 Phill. Ch. 133; on appeal in the house of lords, 1 H. L. Cas. 191. In that case a bill was filed in chancery to annul the action of the probate court in admitting a codicil, charged to have been obtained through fraud. The bill was demurred to and dismissed. The judgment of the court sustaining the demurrer was affirmed. "If," says Lord LYNCHURST, in the house of lords, speaking of the action of the probate court, "an error has been committed in this or any other respect, which I am very far from supposing, that would not be a ground for coming to a court of equity. The matter should have been set right upon appeal. But the present is an attempt to review the decision of the court of probate, not by the judicial committee of the privy council, the proper tribunal for that purpose, but by the court of chancery. I think this cannot be done. It was formerly, indeed, considered that fraud in obtaining a will might be investigated and redressed in a court of equity, but that doctrine has long since been overruled." 1 H. L. Cas. 209. The court also quotes with approval the language of the supreme court of California in the case of State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 233, 268, as follows: "Upon examining the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, and of the courts of the several states, it will be found that they have uniformly held that the principles established in England apply to and govern cases arising under the probate laws of this country, and that in the United States, whenever the power to probate a will is given to a probate or surrogate's court, the decree of such court is final and conclusive, and not subject, except on appeal to a higher court, to be questioned in any other court, to be set aside or vacated by the court of chancery, on any ground." The following language is also used by the court at page 517: "The question recurs, do the facts stated in the present bill lay a sufficient ground for equitable interference with the probate of Broderick's will, or for establishing a trust as against the purchasers of his estate in favor of the complainants? On the establishment or non-establishment of the will depended the entire right of the parties, and that was a question entirely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the probate court. In such a case, a court of equity will not interfere, for it has no jurisdiction to do so. The probate court was fully competent to afford adequate relief." The last words do not mean that the probate court was open at the time the action was begun. It is admitted that it was closed at that time, as to the complainants, but that it had been opened to them the necessary time, and that it was laches on their part not to apply in time; that there was nothing in their claim that they did not really have actual notice of the proceedings in the probate court, being beyond seas at the time; that the requisite legal notice was given by publication, etc.; and that they were bound by it; otherwise, all proceedings in rem would be unsettled. The particular point decided in the foregoing case was that the action of the probate court in determining that a valid will had been made could not be reviewed in a court of equity on original bill, but on the same principle the court must have necessarily declared that it could not interfere if the decision had been that a valid will had not been made, as was the case here. The principle recognized is that the review cannot be had on original bill, but must be by appeal. In this case, the probate court having regularly acted concerning this estate, and the plaintiff not having appealed, being guilty of laches to that extent, but still having his remedy at law, under section 98, Prob. Act, he did not present a case, as upon a will, of which the court had jurisdiction, and the bill was properly dismissed.

It has been urged that this is a case for the exercise of the large, broad, general principles of equity; that there was a manifest intention here to pass the property in question to plaintiff; and that it is the duty of a court of equity to in some way carry out the intention; that, if this instrument is held to be a will, the intention of the deceased will be defeated, because the instrument cannot stand the test of the probate court, there being but one witness and the statute of wills requiring two, and therefore the court must endeavor in some way to give force to this instrument; otherwise, the plaintiff will be left without relief. There are limitations, however, even upon the jurisdiction of a court of equity. Equity courts have extraordinary powers, but they are not beyond the reach of statute law, neither are they independent bodies, careering at will through the vast domain of law with no fixed rules for their guidance. The system of jurisprudence administered so grandly by Cardinal WOLSEY, so cautiously by Sir THOMAS MORE, defended by Lord ELLESMERE, systematized by Lord BACON, exalted by genius of Lord NOTTINGHAM, the father of equity, defined by the exquisite discernment of Lord HARDWICKE, developed, perfected, and ennobled by the commanding powers of such men as MANSFIELD, CAMDEN, THURLOW, ELDEN, MARSHALL, KENT, STORY, and other worthy compeers, will not be found devoid of definite rules of procedure. If we look for rules to guide us in the present case, we shall not fail to find them. For instance, he who asks equity must do equity. He who appeals to equity must submit to equity, and to obtain relief he must show that the equities are in his favor; that his equities overbalance those on the other side. But where are the superior equities of the plaintiff in this case? Why must he be favored in any especial manner, to the prejudice of the heir he seeks to disinherit? What has the natural or legal heir done that not only his equities but his legal rights must be set aside?

The plaintiff, in form, asks equity for himself, but in fact he has appealed to a court of equity to judge in conscience between him and the heir at law; to weigh the equities in each case, and declare whether or not the conscience of the heir at law is bound by this defective and illegal instrument of the ancestor. To prevail, he must not only show as good a right to the property as that of the legal heir, but he must show a better one. The heir is in possession. The administrator is holding for him. The plaintiff seeks to oust him, and, unless he shows the better right, he must fail, for in æquali jure, melior est conditio possidentis. The heir is defending, and, in æquali jure, melior est conditio defendantis. Broom, Leg. Max. 564. The heir is first in the field, and qui prior est in tempore, potior est in jure. The plaintiff seeks to destroy the legal succession by a private compact, but fortior et potentior est dispositio legis quam hominis. He seeks to set aside the strict law of the case in favor of his equity, but "where the equity is equal, the law must prevail." He asks relief against the law, but "where the law has determined a matter, with all its circumstances, equity cannot intermeddle against the positive rules of law." Fonbl. Eq. bk. 1, c. 1, p. 83. "And equity will not interfere in such cases, notwithstanding accident or unavoidable necessity." Id. He says that, under the rules of law, he has no relief, but Lord TALBOT declares: "Where a particular remedy is given by law, and that remedy is bounded and circumscribed by particular rules, it would be very improper for this court to take it up where the law leaves it, and extend it further than the law allows." Heard v. Stanford, Cas. t. Talb. 174. He says deceased intended to name him as his heir, but, if a man leaves his will unfinished, there can be no relief. See half a dozen cases cited, 1 Story, Eq. Jur. c. 3, § 61. He says the strict letter of the statute defeats the will of the deceased, but "where a rule either of the common or the statute law is direct, and governs the case with all its circumstances, or the particular point, a court of equity is as much bound by it as a court of law, and can as little justify a departure from it." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 64, citing Kemp v. Pryor, 7 Ves. 249; 2 Bac. Abr. "Court of Chancery," C. And see Habbergham v. Vincent, supra.

Our statute says distinctly the instrument in the case at bar shall not stand as a will for lack of witnesses, nor, I think, as a contract, because the maker is dead, and it could not be enforced against him during his life; and yet it is either a contract or a will, one or the other, beyond all question, so that it is very far from being clear that the plaintiff has any equities at all under this instrument. No equity can arise under it as a contract, for our statute forbids an action on it, and "if the law prohibits a thing to be done, equity cannot enjoin the contrary." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 64. No equity can arise on the instrument as a will, for as such it is defectively executed, and Smith, in stating some of the elementary principles of equity jurisprudence, gives the following illustration: "Thus, no relief will be afforded to the legatees or devisees under a will defectively executed, for, being mere volunteers, they have as little equity as the heir or next of kin, or even less, inasmuch as fortior et aequalior est dispositio legis quam hominis, (Co. Litt. 388a,) and therefore the legal right which has vested in the latter will not be taken away, as the maxim is that 'where the equity is equal the law must prevail.' Smith, Man. Eq. (11th Lond. Ed.) 38, 39. A will is not executed until it is signed, duly attested, and declared or published, so as to be rendered complete and operative. See Burrill, Law Dict. "Execution." Bouv. Law Dict.; 4 Kent, Comm. 450, 513, and notes; 2 Bl. Comm. 376. This matter of disposing of property by will has never been recognized by any government as a natural right. It has always been looked upon as a matter of public policy, to be granted as a privilege, subject to such conditions for its exercise as the law-making power chooses to impose, or to be withheld altogether if it is considered that the interest of the state will be promoted thereby. And so we find innumerable varieties of statute law on the subject, not only denying the head of the family the privilege of making a will, but cutting off all right of natural succession. Giving not only all the property to the king, but also the wife and all unmarried children, so that to escape it the children were married in infancy, (Esprit des Loix, lib. v., c. 14,) is one extreme in legislation on this subject. This doctrine of escheats, though modified, has never been fully surrendered by any government. It exists to-day in this territory. It is the only part of the law of succession which all nations have always in some shape preserved. All improvements in the law of succession consist merely in concessions by governments of parts of this asserted right. The right of escheat is a corollary of the doctrine that every thing belonged primarily to the crown, and that the subject enjoyed even a life-estate in property only by favor. For the doctrine, see Crag, de Jur. Feud. 233, cited in Wright's Ten. 59.

The people everywhere have always pressed for an increase of rights over property. At first they asked only that it might descend to their natural heirs. Under the feudal law, when this privilege was granted, it was conditional on the lord's choosing the heir, or fine, fealty, homage, petition, proclamation,—whence heriots, relief, primer seisin, etc. Gilb. Ten. XVI. Then the people claimed the right to name the heir themselves; in other words, to devise the property to whomsoever they pleased; but this point is not even yet everywhere yielded. It does not yet exist in France or in Scotland as to realty. It is only during the reign of the present queen that it has been fully granted in England, as to realty, and even as to personality, it is only in a period comparatively recent that the privilege has been universally obtained even in England. 1 Redf. Wills, c. 1, § 5, note 10. In at least one of our states, Louisiana, the privilege is not yet fully granted, and in this territory it is only within the last few years that it has been conceded, so that the plaintiff in this case must remember that he has no natural or inherent equities in this matter. He is a stranger in blood to the ancestor. All the rights he can possibly have herein depend upon a very recent statute, and this statute being the very last and furthest advance made in granting the power, to prefer strangers in blood to the natural heir, he must show a strict compliance with all the essentials of the statute, to acquire any standing at all in court. The equities are in favor of the natural or legal heir. These heirs are in possession, and the plaintiff cannot oust them except by showing not only an equitable claim, but a legal right, to do so. This doctrine is not new. It comes down to us even from the old black-letter days, but, though born of a former age, its sound principles of right and justice keep it ever green and vigorous, and it speaks to us to-day with undiminished power from the pages of our latest and highest authorities. In the tenth edition of Story's Equity it stands in the text as follows: "Equity will not interfere to give effect to an imperfect will against an innocent heir at law, for, as heir, he is entitled to protection, whatever might have been the intent of the testator, unless his title is taken away according to the rules of law." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 106. As authority for this proposition, Story cites Com. Dig. "Chancery," 3 F, 6-8; Fonbl. Eq. bk. 1, c. 4, § 25, notes k and n; Grounds and Rudiments of the Law, M. 167, p. 128, Ed. 1751.

The rules of law governing this case are set down in our book of statutes: (1) That the plaintiff cannot acquire this estate by a contract, or in any way except by will; (2) that he cannot acquire it by will, except by a good will, duly signed, attested, and probated. Equity cannot play fast and loose with the essentials of statute law. The legislature is the law-making power, not the courts. The matter of witnesses to a will is not within the maxim, de minimis non curat lex. It is one of the primary, essential, indispensable conditions to a valid will, and a court of equity has no more power to dispense with it or avoid it than it has to dispense with or avoid the whole statute of wills, or any other statute. I do not, then, see that the plaintiff made out any case for any relief in the court below. He did not ask legal relief as upon a claim against the estate in the sense of the probate act, and, if he had, or if the court might have entertained the case for that purpose, he did not show any such claim, and, therefore, did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in that regard. He could have no relief as upon a contract, for the only contract he set up was one on which our statute says no action can be founded; therefore, the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in that regard. He could have no relief as upon a will, for he did not produce a regularly probated will, nor even a properly executed will, and the court has no jurisdiction to establish a will, nor give any relief on one, under the circumstances, even if a perfect will had been produced, for that court has no original jurisdiction of wills, and besides, administration was still proceeding in the probate court, a court which had full power to afford him legal relief, and to which he was bound to first submit his claim, and apply to the district court. If at all, only by appeal from the judgment of the probate court. While limiting the reasons to the facts in this case, I do not mean to intimate any doubt about the law going as far as in this case cited. It is sufficient for the present purposes to show that it covers this case. The doctrine in the case of Broderick's Will, 21 Wall. 503, evidently goes much further, the court being irresistibly led thereto by the controlling fact that the jurisdiction invoked is, by law, placed exclusively in another tribunal.

In looking over this opinion, I notice in some places what may be thought a little impetuosity of expression. I have not time, pressed as I am with other official duties, to recast the language, but, however it may read, it is written in a spirit of entire respect for the judgment of the majority of the court, orally rendered, their written opinion not having yet been, so far as I know, prepared. This is the only case in which I have felt obliged to dissent from their judgment, and it is because of the greatest respect I know is due and accorded to their opinion, in any case passed upon by them, that I have taken the pains to try to show the reasons which led me to a different conclusion. I am therefore of the opinion that the judgment of the court below, sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill, should be affirmed.

TRIAL — CROSS-EXAMINATIONS — SECONDARY EVIDENCE — MINING LOCATIONS — NON-RESIDENTS — FORFEITURE — EJECTMENT — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In ejectment for a mining claim, plaintiff's grantor, who has testified in chief that she located the claim, may be cross-examined as to whether or not she then knew of defendant's prior location of the premises, and whether or not she had removed their notice of location, as such cross-examination is not calling out new matters of defense, but is simply showing that the title is not in plaintiffs, but in defendants.

2. Plaintiffs, after testifying in chief as to their purchase of the claim from the second locator, may be cross-examined as to their knowledge, at the time of their purchase, of defendants' prior location, of its record, and of the fact that defendants had done work on the claim, as these facts all go to prove title in defendants, in direct denial of plaintiffs' allegation that the title is in them.

3. A general objection to the admissibility of evidence does not warrant its exclusion, unless the evidence shows on its face that it cannot be available for any purpose.

4. Secondary evidence of the contents of a letter is rendered admissible by the testimony of the recipient, a mining prospector, with no fixed abode, that it is his general custom to burn his letters; that he had made a search for the one in question, and had been unable to find it, and that he supposed it had been burnt.

5. No presumption of fraud arises from the fact that a mining location is made by a prospector for a non-resident, and that the non-resident subsequently deeded the property to the prospector, in the absence of any misrepresentations by the prospector to the non-resident, and of any miners' rules and regulations disqualifying non-residents from being locators.

6. Declarations by the locator of a mining claim, made during the time she claimed the title, that she expected to hold the premises because the prior locator was a non-resident, are admissible against her grantees, as it is an admission by her of a prior location, which may be valid, notwithstanding prior locator's non-residence.

7. Failure of a mining locator to comply with the local miners' rules, under which the location was made, does not work a forfeiture, unless the rules themselves so provide.

8. Under the miners' regulations in force before May 10, 1872, possession and occupancy, though not accompanied by a formal location, were sufficient to hold a mining claim against a subsequent would-be locator.

9. It is error to instruct that the occupancy of a mining claim must be "lawful" in order to protect the occupant against a subsequent locator, without explaining to the jury in what a "lawful occupancy" consists.

10. On the ratification by a non-resident of a mining location made in his name, the title vests in him as of the date of the location, and not of the ratification; and hence it is error to instruct that his title is defeated by a subsequent location made between the time of the first location and the ratification.

11. The law implies an authority in one person to locate a mining claim in the name of another from the fact of making such a location; and it is error to instruct that some express authority is necessary.

12. In ejectment for a mining claim, it appeared that defendants had first located the claim, and taken possession; that plaintiffs then dispossessed defendants, and likewise located the land; and that subsequently defendants regained the possession. Held, that the burden of proof was on plaintiffs to show the invalidity of defendants' first location, and that it was error to instruct that the fact of possession by plaintiffs at the time of their ouster gave them a prima facie right to recover.

13. Where the evidence shows that a mining claim was in good faith located by a prospector in the name of a non-resident, without any intention by any of the parties to use the non-resident's name as a means of evading the law limiting the number of feet which can be located by any one person, it is error to submit the question of a fraudulent evasion of the law to the jury, though the non-resident afterwards deeded part of the claim to the prospector, who had already located a claim in his own name on the same vein for the full number of feet allowed by law.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

Joseph P. Hargrave and Coles Bashford, for appellants. Rush & Davis and J. E. McCaffry, for respondents.

DUNNE, C. J. This was an appeal from the third district court, Yavapai county, the judge of the second district presiding. It was an action of ejectment to recover possession of a certain mining claim known as the "First North Extension of the Tiger Lode or Vein," in Tiger mining district, Yavapai county, Arizona territory. Tried at the June term, 1874. Judgment below for plaintiff. New trial refused. Defendants appeal from the judgment and order refusing new trial. Appeal heard, January term, 1875.

On the 10th of January, 1871, D. C. Moreland located for himself and others 1,200 feet as the original location on the Tiger vein. On the same day he located 200 feet on the same vein, and immediately adjoining the original location on the north, for the defendant Linn. This last location constitutes the premises in controversy, and was known as the "First Extension North of the Tiger Claim." One of Moreland's co-locators in the original claim was the defendant Washington French. French and Linn were very intimate friends. They had traveled and prospected together in Montana, Utah, and Arizona, as far back as in 1866. In May, 1869, they were at Fort Whipple, in Arizona, near where the premises in controversy are situated. At this time they separated, Linn going to White Pine, in Nevada, where there had arisen a great excitement about mines, French remaining in Arizona. At the time of this separation it was agreed between them that, if Linn found anything that would justify it, French was to be located with him, and that, if French found anything in Arizona that would justify it, he was to inform Linn, and Linn would return. French had furnished Moreland, the discoverer of the Tiger lode, with supplies to enable him to hunt for new mines, and he was to have an interest in all discoveries made by Moreland for so doing. After Moreland reported the discovery and location of 1,200 feet on the Tiger lode, French requested him to make a location on the same lode for Mr. Linn, which Moreland did, as before stated. On the same day that the original location of 1,200 feet and the first extension north of 200 feet for Linn were made on the Tiger lode, Moreland also made another location of 400 feet on the same claim next north of the Linn location for one Daniel Thorne and one John Cassidy, called sometimes the "Thorne and Cassidy Claim," and sometimes the "Second North Extension on the Tiger." This location was made by Moreland for Thorne and Cassidy under an agreement with Moreland alone that they would deed back to Moreland one-half of the ground for his trouble. This agreement was entered into before the location was made, but the agreement was not an agreement to deed back any particular part of the location of 400 feet, but generally to deed back one-half the ground to pay him for his trouble; and Moreland was the only party known to Thorne and Cassidy in this agreement. As a matter of fact, the deed presented by Moreland to Thorne and Cassidy for their signatures, and executed by them, was a deed to Moreland and his co-locators in the original Tiger location, and conveyed, not an undivided interest of 200 feet in the Thorne and Cassidy location, but a segregated interest of the south half of their location, to-wit, 200 feet next adjoining the Linn location. Plaintiffs attach importance to these facts, claiming that they tend to show a fraudulent intent upon the part of the original locators sufficient to vitiate the Linn location, and to allow the location of the plaintiffs' grantor to come in.

Some 30 days before the Tiger mine was discovered and located French wrote to Linn, in Nevada, informing him about the arrangement for prospecting, and stating that, if anything was found that would justify it, he would locate him. Two days after the location was made, to-wit, on the 12th day of January, 1871, French wrote Linn, informing him that he had located a claim for him on a silver lead in Bradshaw, (meaning this Tiger lode.) He told him that the lead was 12 feet wide, assayed $1,350 per ton, and that he thought that the location made for him (Linn) would be good for $10,000 in less than a year; that as soon as he (French) got the claim recorded he would send Linn the name and number, and he wanted Linn to send a deed of it back to him, and he would hold it for Linn, who should have all it would bring. Fifteen days after, to-wit, on the 27th of January, 1871, French again wrote Linn, speaking more enthusiastically than before of the value of the claim, saying that it was 12 to 20 feet wide, averaged $1,000 per ton; smelting process assayed $2,000 per ton; to have no fears that their claim would be worth $100,000 in less than one year; and inclosed a deed of Linn's location from Linn to himself, which he requested Linn to sign and forward as soon as possible, urging as a reason that the local laws were very stringent, and he was fearful of not being able to hold the claim. In due course of mail French received the deed from Linn, together with a power of attorney and a letter. The deed and power of attorney were dated the 9th of February, 1871, and were preserved, and produced at the trial. The letter accompanying them was not produced. French testified that it was his custom to burn all letters as soon as answered; that he had searched for this letter, and could not find it, and that he supposed that it was burned; but defendants were not allowed to give evidence of its contents.

It was not contended by plaintiffs that there had been any failure to do sufficient work upon the Linn location to hold it, nor that, if the Linn location was ever good, it had been forfeited by any non-compliance with the laws or customs governing the district. What plaintiffs claimed was that the Linn location was void ab initio, in this: that either there was no sufficient authority in Moreland to make it, or, if he had authority, that the location was a fraud upon the government, and therefore void. And now the foundation of plaintiffs' claim appears. One month after Moreland made the location for Linn of the first extension north of the Tiger lode, to-wit, on the 11th day of February, 1871, one Mary E. Sawyer went on the same premises and placed thereon a notice of location, claiming the same ground for herself. She recorded her notice, did some work on the claim, and on the 13th of June following conveyed her claim in said premises to the plaintiffs. A short time after this purchase plaintiffs put some men to work on the premises. Linn, one of the defendants, who had returned to Arizona about June 21, 1871, came with Moreland and another, and prevented Davis and his men from working, and the latter parties then left the premises. On the 27th of June, 1871, French, in whose name the title to the Linn location had been standing ever since the deed of Linn to him of February 9, 1841, deeded back one-half of the ground to Linn for a nominal consideration of $500, as expressed in the deed, but no consideration in fact passed. Linn testified that French retained half of the ground at his (Linn's) request as security for Linn's indebtedness to him which had been accruing at various times since 1866, and which he (Linn) believed amounted to about $1,000 at the time French deeded to him, June 27, 1871. On July 18, 1872, plaintiffs brought suit in ejectment against defendants. Jury trial. Verdict for plaintiffs. Court set aside the verdict, and ordered a new trial. Plaintiffs appealed from the order. The supreme court, on appeal, held that the verdict was properly set aside. The case went back, and the trial was proceeded with. Verdict for plaintiffs. Motion for new trial denied. Defendants appeal from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Appellants assign 45 grounds of error, duly saved by a bill of exceptions.

The first grounds of error assigned relate to the rulings of the court as to the cross-examination of plaintiffs' first witness, Mary E. Sawyer. Plaintiffs introduced Mary E. Sawyer, who testified that she went upon the premises in person, and placed her notice of location thereon, upon the 11th of February, 1871; that she had the notice recorded, did some work, and conveyed her title to plaintiffs. Defendants then asked the following questions:

"(1) Did you remove any notice or notices from the monument on which you placed your notice at the time you placed your notice there? (2) What did you find upon the monument at the time you placed your notice there? (3) Was the claim in controversy known as the 'Linn Claim' at the time and prior to the time you placed your notice on it? (4) Did you see any work done on the claim at the time you made your location? (5) Was anybody else at work on the claim whilst you were at work there?" Defendants, under a general objection, were not allowed to ask any of these questions, and the refusal to allow these questions to be asked constitutes the first five grounds of error assigned by appellants.

Plaintiffs introduced John A. Rush, one of the plaintiffs, who testified that he and his co-plaintiff purchased the premises in question from Mary E. Sawyer about June 13, 1871; that on the day of the purchase, or day prior, he and his co-plaintiff went on the premises, with a view of purchasing; then purchased, and afterwards put men to work. Cross-examined: "When I went to examine the claim I saw that some considerable work had been done. I do not know by whom it was done." (6) Defendants were then prohibited from asking the following question, and assign such refusal as the sixth ground of error: "Were you not informed by your grantor that the work you saw on the claim had been made by Linn and French before your purchase?"

Alonzo E. Davis, the other plaintiff, was then introduced by plaintiffs, and on direct examination testified to the same effect as Rush, as to visiting the premises prior to the purchase; that he put men to work, who were driven off by defendants; that no one was on the claim at the time his men went to work; that there was nothing to show that any one was in possession at the time; that the lands were considered public mineral lands at the time; and that he did not know of Mr. French's being in possession of the premises at the time. Cross-examined: "When I went with Mr. Rush to examine the ground I saw a cut that had been run into the hill towards the lead."

(7) Defendants were then prohibited from asking the following question: "Do you know by whom the work in the cut was done?"—wherein they assign error 7.

(8) Defendants were prohibited from asking: "Did you examine the district and county records before purchasing, in regard to the adverse claim to Mary E. Sawyer, of Linn and French, to the premises in controversy?" Assigned as error 8.

(9, 10) Defendants introduced William A. Linn, one of the defendants, who on direct examination testified as to his long friendship and intimacy with French, and as to the correspondence between him and French relative to the premises in question. Exceptions 9 and 10 were taken as to proving the contents of this correspondence, but are not pressed.

(11) Defendants were prohibited from asking: "What authority, if any, did you ever give Mr. French to make location of mining claims for you in this territory, prior to the location of the Tiger mine?"—wherein is assigned error 11.

Defendants introduced Washington French, one of the defendants, who, among other things, testified to his relations and correspondence with Linn. The letter of French to Linn of January 27, 1871, asking Linn to send a deed of the ground, was produced. Witness was asked: "What did you receive in answer to this? Answer: "I received a deed from Linn to two hundred feet of ground; also a power of attorney, and a letter, at the same time. I have not got that letter now. I suppose that it is burned up. I have searched for it, and cannot find it. It was my custom, as I have stated, to burn all letters as soon as answered; and I suppose that this one was burned." (12) Defendants offered proof of the contents of this, as being instructions for the use of the deed and power of attorney accompanying it. Disallowed, wherein is assigned error 12.

(13) Question by defendants: "For what purpose did you request Linn to send you a deed of the premises in controversy?" Disallowed. Assigned as error 13.

(14) Question by defendants: "Did you have or claim any pecuniary interest in the ground in controversy by virtue of the deed from Linn to you?" Disallowed. Assigned as error 14.

(15) Question by defendants: "Why did you have the deed and power of attorney both recorded?" Disallowed. Assigned as error 15.

(16) Question by defendants: "Did you offer to reconvey to Linn the entire interest in the claim in controversy on his return to Prescott?" Disallowed. Assigned as error 16.

William A. Linn, one of the defendants, recalled. Direct examination. Witness is shown the deed for the premises in question, and the power of attorney from himself to French. He said that he executed them, and that there was no consideration from French for the deed.

Question by defendants: "(17) For what purpose and what induced you to execute the deed and power of attorney to French of the claim in question? (18) Did you execute the deed to French at his request, as stated in his letter of January 27, 1871, and for the purpose therein mentioned? (19) For what purpose did you execute the deed to French, dated February 9, 1871? (20) For what purpose did you execute a power of attorney at the time you executed the deed of the claim in question? (21) Did you execute the deed for the reasons stated in the letter of January 27th? (22) What induced you to execute the deed of February 9, 1871, to French? (23) Did you expect to receive from French all the benefits derived from the claim deeded? (24) Did you at any time have any agreement or understanding with French by which you were to deed to French this ground, or any portion of it, for his own benefit? (25) Had you at any time before the location of this claim any agreement or understanding with French by which he was to cause locations of mining claims to be made for you, and you to deed them to him, for his benefit? (26) Was the letter from French to you, dated January 27, 1871, the only inducement and consideration upon which you executed the deed to French, of February 9, 1871?" All these questions, from 17 to 26, were objected to generally, and were disallowed, and therein are assigned errors 17 to 26, inclusive.

Defendants introduced E. S. Junior, who on direct examination testified that he knew all the parties to, and most of the circumstances of, this case; that he went himself on the premises for the purpose of relocating them a day or two before Mary E. Sawyer placed her location there; saw Linn's notice of location on the claim at that time; knew Mary E. Sawyer, plaintiffs' grantor; had a conversation with her as to her location of this claim about the time her location was made. (27) Question by defendants: "State what that conversation was." (28) "Did you have this conversation with Mary E. Sawyer on the same day that she placed her notice on the claim?" (29) Defendants offered to prove by this witness that at the time Mary E. Sawyer placed her notice on the claim in controversy she said that she relocated and jumped the claim, because Linn was a non-resident of the territory, and was not entitled to hold a claim. Questions 27, 28, and 29 objected to generally, and objection sustained; wherein appellants assign errors 27, 28, and 29.

Alonzo E. Davis, one of the plaintiffs, was called as a witness for the defense. On direct examination the first question was: (30) "Did you not, prior to the purchase by yourself and Rush of Mary E. Sawyer of the claim in controversy, examine the records in relation to the adverse claim of the Linn location?" General objection, and question disallowed. Assigned as error 30. Witness then stated, in response to other questions, that he was not certain whether he stated on the former trial that he had examined the records prior to purchasing, but he knew in some way that the ground had been taken up for Linn and deeded to French, but that it was considered as a bogus claim. (31) "Did you buy the claim from Mary E. Sawyer because you supposed the conveyance from Linn to French was a bogus affair?" Disallowed. Assigned as error 31.

William C. Collier, for defense. Direct examination. "Have been engaged for ten years locating claims here. Am acquainted with the general custom of miners around here in making locations where no organization exists. My knowledge is confined to this county. Am not acquainted with them elsewhere." (32) Defendants asked: "State what are the general usages and customs of miners in making locations of mining claims in unorganized districts?" Disallowed, under a general objection; and therein defendants assign error 32. The record shows that the premises in question were situated in the county of which witness spoke.

Fred Henry, for defense. Direct examination. "My occupation has been that of mining and prospecting since 1858. I have prospected in what was then Utah, afterwards Nevada, from 1858 to 1861; since then I have been in California, Idaho, Washington Territory, New Mexico, and Arizona. I am acquainted with the usages and customs of miners in making locations in unorganized districts." (33) By defendants: "What is the general usage and custom of miners in like places (unorganized districts) in regard to the discovery of mines in making locations for other parties not present?" Disallowed; wherein defendants assign error 33.

34 and 35 are not pressed by appellants. Counsel for defendants asked for the following instructions:

"First. Plaintiffs must recover, if at all, on the strength of their own title; and, having based their title on a location under and by virtue of the local rules and customs of the district, must not only show a compliance with these rules and customs, but that the claim was subject to location and appropriation at the time they, or those under whom they claim, sought to locate the same." Given.

"Second. That if the claim or mining ground in controversy had been previously ['lawfully' inserted by the court] located and appropriated by the defendants, and those from whom they derive their title, in accordance with the local rules or customs of the district or vicinity, plaintiffs cannot recover by virtue of a subsequent location of the same claim or ground, unless they show a voluntary abandonment of the claim, or a failure on the part of the first locator to comply with the local rules or customs of the miners of the district." Given. "And that such failure was of itself declared to be a forfeiture of the claim." Refused. The counsel for defendants then and there excepted to the insertion of the word "lawfully" in the first clause of this instruction, and to the refusal of the court to give all of the above instruction; and assigned therein error 36.

"Third. That the right to locate and acquire title to the mineral lands belonging to the United States is not restricted to the inhabitants or residents of any particular district or portion of the country; and unless it is shown that the local rules and customs require the locator to be personally present to make the location, or to do some act in person, before acquiring a right to a mine or claim on a mine, all that is required to be done may be done by an agent or servant, for and in the name of his principal or employer, with the same force and effect as if done by the principal in person." Given.

"Fourth. If the defendants were [located and lawfully] inserted by the court] in possession and occupancy of the claim in controversy at the time plaintiffs' grantor attempted to make her location, no right was acquired by such location." The court gave the above instruction after inserting the words "located and lawfully," to the insertion of which counsel for the defendants then and there excepted. Assigned as error 37.

"Fifth. To entitle plaintiffs to recover on the strength of possession alone they must show an actual prior possession and occupancy without interruption for a sufficient length of time to show an appropriation to the exclusion of all the world; a mere scrambling possession, with occasional acts of ownership and control, is not sufficient." Given.

"Sixth. If the acts done by and under the direction of French for and in the name of Linn in the location and appropriation of the mines in controversy would, if done by Linn in person, constitute a good and valid title to the premises, according to the local rules and customs of the mines and miners of the district, the subsequent ratification and occupation by Linn makes them his own acts, and invests him with all the rights which he would or could have acquired if he had been personally present and performed those acts in person." Given. "Unless a valid location by some other person had in the interval between the location of French and the ratification by Linn been made and perfected." Added by the court. The court gave the above instruction after adding the italicized clause at the end thereof, to which alteration the counsel for defendants excepted then and there, and therein assign error 38.

"Seventh. No express or written authority is necessary to constitute an agent to make a location of a mining claim." Given. "And a location made by one person for and in the name of another vests a right in the one for whom the location is made, which can only be divested by his own acts or omission, or by operation of law." Refused. The court added: "But some authority, either express or implied, must exist, or the agency must be ratified, before other valid claims intervene." To the refusal of the court to give the instruction as asked, counsel for the defendants then and there excepted, and assigned error 39.

"Eighth. The law makes the discoverer of a mine the agent of those for whom he chooses to act, and his act becomes their act, regardless of the fact whether the party for whose benefit the location is made has any knowledge of it or not. In such cases, however, the agent making such location has no power, afterwards to make any change in the same, so as to affect injuriously the right of the party for whose benefit the location was made. A failure to comply with the local rules and customs of the district will not work a forfeiture, unless such failure is declared by such rules and customs to be a forfeiture." The court refused to give the above instruction, to which counsel for defendants excepted, and assigned error 40.

"Ninth. It is not necessary that the record of a mining claim should be an exact copy of the notice placed upon the claim. If the record is substantially the same, describing the same ground by the same name, and of the same date, and substantially the same as the notice on the claim, it is a sufficient record."

Plaintiffs asked for the following instructions:

"First. That if Moreland acted as the agent of Linn in locating the ground in controversy and located in the name of Linn, the defendants, to avail themselves of such location, must show that Moreland, at the time of making such location, had written authority from Linn to make such location." The court refused to give the above instruction, to which counsel for plaintiffs then and there excepted.

"Second. That the location of a mining claim upon the public mineral lands of the United States under the laws of the United States is the creation of an interest in lands within the purview of the statute of frauds, and an agent cannot make such location for his principal, unless he be thereunto authorized by his principal in writing." The court refused to give the above instruction, to which counsel for plaintiffs then and there excepted.

"Third. If the jury believe from the evidence that plaintiffs were in possession of the premises in dispute, and that defendants entered and ousted them therefrom, they will find for plaintiffs, unless the jury believe from the evidence that defendants had a better right to the premises than the plaintiffs." Given. Assigned as error 41.

"Fourth. If the jury believe that French had authority to act as the agent of Linn in locating the ground in controversy, that authority could not be delegated by French to any other person without express authority from Linn to do so." The court refused to give the above instruction, to which counsel for plaintiffs then and there excepted.

"Fifth. If Moreland had the authority to make the location in question, defendants, in order to avail themselves of it, must show that the location was made in accordance with the local rules and regulations of miners in the mining dis-strict in which the said location was made, and that the notice of location was transmitted to the county recorder within sixty days after the location was made." The court refused to give the above instruction, to which counsel for plaintiffs then and there excepted.

"Sixth. If the location of the mining claim in question was made in the name of Linn by Moreland and French, or either of them, for the purpose of having Linn convey to them, or either of them, the whole or any part of said mining claim without further consideration, Moreland and French having already located two hundred feet each on the same lode, and Linn ratified the act of location for the purpose of making such conveyance, such location was void, as made in fraud and evasion of law." Given. Assigned as error 42.

"Seventh. That if the jury believe from the evidence that Linn and French were partners, and that French located the ground in controversy in the name of, and for the individual use of, Linn, and not for Linn and French, then the partnership conferred no authority upon French to locate for Linn." The court refused to give the above instruction, to which counsel for plaintiffs then and there excepted.

"Eighth. That no person can make more than one location upon the same lead or lode." The court refused to give the above instruction, to which counsel for plaintiffs then and there excepted.

"Ninth. A person, having made for himself, or other person or persons, a location for mining purposes on a quartz lead or lode, cannot afterwards make, either for himself or any other person, another location on the same lead or lode." The court refused to give the above instruction, to which counsel for plaintiffs then and there excepted.

The court also gave the jury the following instructions:

"First. A party locating a mining claim upon the public lands of the United States, and complying with the laws of the United States and with the local rules and customs of miners in the mining district in which the claim is situated, in locating and holding such claim, acquires a right to the possession of such claim against every one except those who have legally appropriated such claim prior to such location.

"Second. If the location of the mining claim in question was made in the name of Linn by Moreland and French, or either of them, for the purpose of having Linn convey to them, or either of them, the whole or any part of the said mining claim, without further consideration, Moreland and French having already located two hundred feet each upon the same lode, then the location was absolutely void, and made in fraud and evasion of law." To the above, counsel for defendants then and there excepted.

"Third. A bona fide possession of the premises by plaintiffs, of however short duration, prior to an ouster by defendants, will entitle plaintiffs to recover, unless defendants show a better right to possession than that of the plaintiffs." To the above the counsel for defendants then and there excepted, and assigned as error 43 the giving of said second and third instructions.

"(44) That it was error to refuse a new trial in this: that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

"(45) That it was error to refuse a new trial in this: that the verdict is against the law as given to the jury by the court."

In approaching the consideration of this case, we find a multitude of objections to evidence certified from the court below, and we deem it well to call attention to some general rules on the subject. In doing so we do not mean to reflect on the practice of attorneys in this particular case; on the contrary, we feel more like complimenting the counsel on both sides for the extraordinary care bestowed on the case, and for the very able briefs filed, which have rendered the examination of the questions raised more a pleasure for the court than a task. But it is astonishing how many appeals are lost through a defect in the transcript as to the presentation of the grounds of objection to evidence. Case after case occurs in every state where the whole benefit of an objection is lost by an imperfect record on the matter of exceptions to evidence. The mere exception itself is generally taken correctly, and we think, as a matter of fact, that the proper grounds of objection are generally stated on the trial, and strenuously urged; but when the record comes to the supreme court the transcript fails, with wonderful frequency, to show what grounds of objection were urged, and the benefit of the exception is lost. This, doubtless, arises in a great measure from the absence of phonographic reporters, and the disinclination of all parties to stop in the midst of a trial, and keep a judge and jury waiting, in order that counsel may clearly settle their exceptions. We know that it is very hard to do this in the absence of short-hand writers, but until a more enlightened public opinion furnishes us with these wonderful aids to the dispatch of business, we must plod on in the old cumbrous way, and let juries possess their souls in patience, as best they may. We hope the consideration we have given this subject, and the reference we have made to adjudications on the point, will enable the bar of this territory to avoid many difficulties of this kind in the future.

The cases where we are called on to review rulings on the admission of evidence may be reduced to two classes: (1) When the party objecting was overruled, and he appeals; (2) when the party objecting was sustained, and the other side appeals. In the first case, where the party objecting was overruled, and he appeals, he must show by the record (1) what the question was, and what answer was given to it, or what the evidence was which was introduced against his objection. This is important, because the evidence admitted may not injure him. The answer may have been in his favor. It is not necessary that he should show clearly that he was injured, because that would often be impossible, but he must show that the evidence was admitted against his valid objection, which, it may be, has injured him; for the object of granting a review by this court is not to determine the abstract question as to whether the judge below ruled correctly or not, but to give relief in case a party may have been injured by an erroneous ruling. (2) He must set out enough of the evidence to illustrate the point of his objection, and to raise the presumption that he may have been injured; but where error is shown, injury will be presumed, unless the contrary clearly appears. (3) He must show what kind of an objection was made; and, to avail him here, he must show that the objection as made was good. Then it is for the other party to see that the statement made contains a showing sufficient to sustain the admission of the evidence as against the objection made. The amount of showing the latter party must make depends upon the nature of the objection. If the party objecting interpose merely a general objection, all that is necessary is to show enough to obviate the general objection. If the objection is specific, all that is necessary is to show enough to obviate the specific objection as made. Beyond this, we cannot, in reason, require him to go. He should defend himself against the particular attack made, but we cannot ask him to fortify himself against all possible attacks which might have been made. In the second case, where the party objecting was sustained, and the other side appeals, and asks to have the ruling declared erroneous, the party appealing must see that the record shows (1) what question he asked, or what evidence he sought to introduce; (2) sufficient of the other evidence to illustrate the admissibility of that offered; (3) that the evidence so offered was excluded; (4) that there is reasonable ground to presume that he may have been injured by such exclusion. The other party must see that the record shows good grounds of exclusion.

What grounds of objection will be considered on appeal. The supreme court, in examining a question as to whether a ruling of the court below on an objection to evidence was correct or not, will not consider any other grounds of objection to the evidence than those urged in the court below. This rule is of universal adoption in the courts of this country. We do not see that it makes any difference which party it is that complains of the ruling, the question not being one of parties, but simply whether the ruling was correct or not. Of course, no one can complain of the ruling unless he appeals. Martin v. Travers, 12 Cal. 245, and numerous cases there cited; People v. Glenn, 10 Cal. 33, and cases hereinafter cited under the question as to what is the effect of a general objection. The reason of the rule is apparent. Courts are instituted, and judicial proceedings are granted, for the purpose of securing speedy justice. The right of parties to be protected against improper evidence is mutual, and is secured in the most ample manner. All that is required is that the party complaining state a proper objection, and, if the judge below refuse to exclude, when the proper objection is made, or exclude when the objection made is not proper, relief is granted here on review. But a party wishing the benefit of the remedy must, at the time he complains, show how he is hurt; in the language of the old authorities, "he must lay his finger upon the point of objection." 2 Bac. Abr. 529. See, also, Martin v. Travers, 12 Cal. 245; Frier v. Jackson, 8 Johns. 396; Jackson v. Cadwell, 1 Cow. 622; Whiteside v. Jackson, 1 Wend. 418; Waters v. Gilbert, 2 Cush. 29; Covillaud v. Tanner, 7 Cal. 38. He must not merely complain in a general way, and say that to let certain evidence in will hurt his case, and that, under the law, it ought to be excluded, and leave the judge and opposite side in the dark as to what principle of law he relies on, and compel them to decide hap-hazard, or else stop the trial of the cause with a jury waiting, while the counsel examine the whole body of the law, from the earliest judicial expositions down to the latest act of legislature, to see if they can discover any valid objection to the testimony. The opposing counsel can make no reply to a general objection except to throw the whole responsibility upon the judge at once, or else begin systematically, and argue that under any possible objection the testimony should come in. Many trials under such a system would practically never end. The effect of it would be to compel one party to fight in the dark, not knowing when his opponent intended to strike, while the other would be free to choose his weapons, and the time and place to use them. Such things may do in love or war, where all things are said to be fair; but life is too short to transact business on such a system in courts of justice. It may be urged that where a judge below has ruled on an objection, we should uphold his ruling, if any reason can be found to sustain it, even though it be a different one from that assigned, as in the case of a judgment. It is true that we must do so when the ruling is correct, but the very question raised by the exception is whether the ruling is correct or not. We are driven at once to the question: Did the party objecting state at the time good grounds of objection? If he did, of course his objection must prevail; if he did not, of course it must fail.

Why grounds of objection should be stated. The object of requiring the grounds of objection to be stated, which may seem to be a technicality, is really to avoid technicalities, and prevent delay in the administration of justice. When evidence is offered to which there is some objection, substantial justice requires that the objection be specified, so that the party offering the evidence can remove it, if possible, and let the case be tried on its merits. If it is objected that the question is leading, the form may be changed; if that the evidence is irrelevant, the relevancy may be shown; if that it is incompetent, the incompetency may be removed; if that it is immaterial, its materiality may be established; if to the order of introduction, it may be withdrawn and offered at another time,—and thus appeals could often be saved, delays avoided, and substantial justice administered. Counsel are held to the grounds of objection stated at the time they call for a decision of the judge below, because they are supposed to know the law of their case; and if they do not offer other objections they are supposed to waive them, and evidence admitted without valid objection should stand. Counsel must not be permitted to wink at the introduction of evidence to which they think there is a valid objection, hoping that it may benefit them, and, if it goes the other way, move to exclude it. Neither must they be permitted to plead inattention as an excuse. It is their business to be attentive on a trial, and if they miss a point by neglect they must lose it. Neither can we allow them to strike between wind and water on the trial, and then go home to their books, and study out other objections, and urge them here. They must stand or fall upon the case they made below, for this court is not a forum to discuss new points of this character, but simply a court of review to determine whether the rulings of the court below on the case as presented were correct or not.

Effect of a general objection. A general objection is unworthy of consideration. This is stating the rule very broadly, but perhaps the only limitation it can ever require is in those exceedingly rare cases where it is apparent on the face of the proposition that it is impossible the evidence is or can be available for any purpose. As the object of requiring a specific objection is to enable the other party to obviate it if possible, if the objection is apparent, and it is clear that the defect cannot possibly be obviated, a specific objection would not help the adverse party, and in such case a general objection would be sufficient. But, of course, such cases will be very rare, and a prudent practitioner will hardly risk any point on a general objection. People v. Apple, 7 Cal. 290; Killer v. Kimbal, 10 Cal. 267; Martin v. Travers, 12 Cal. 245; Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 180; Mabbett v. White, 12 N. Y. 451; Railroad Co. v. Pointer, 9 Kan. 629; Wilson v. Fuller, Id. 186; Walker v. Armstrong, 2 Kan. 226; Jackson v. Cadwell, 1 Cow. 639; Michel v. Ware, 3 Neb. 235; Johnson v. Adleman, 35 Ill. 265; Carroll v. City of Benicia, 40 Cal. 390; Rosenheim v. Insurance Co., 33 Mo. 230; Greene v. Gallagher, 35 Mo. 226; Clark v. Conway, 23 Mo. 438; Grimm v. Gamache, 25 Mo. 41; Stone v. Oil Co., 41 Ill. 85; Graham v. Anderson, 42 Ill. 514; Howell v. Edmonds, 47 Ill. 79; Moser v. Kreigh, 49 Ill. 84; Hanford v. Obrecht, Id. 146; Harmon v. Thornton, 2 Scam. 351; Gillespie v. Smith, 29 Ill. 473; Sargeant v. Kellogg, 5 Gilman, 273; Swift v. Whitney, 20 Ill. 144; Buntain v. Bailey, 27 Ill. 410; Johnson v. Adleman, 35 Ill. 265; Tozer v. Hershey, 15 Minn. 261, (Gil. 197;) Welde v. Davidson, 15 Minn. 330, (Gil. 253;) Schell v. Bank, 14 Minn. 47, (Gil. 34;) Gilbert v. Thompson, 14 Minn. 544, (Gil. 414;) Bickham v. Smith, 62 Pa. St. 45; Batdorff v. Bank, 61 Pa. St. 179; Moore v. Bank, 13 Pet. 302; Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet. 328; Camden v. Dorenius, 3 How. 515, 530; Hinde v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. 199.

Effect of special objection. An objection that the testimony is irrelevant, without specifying wherein or how or why it is irrelevant, will not be considered in the supreme court as raising any issue, if the testimony could, under any possible circumstances, have been relevant. Dreux v. Domec, 18 Cal. 83. An objection that the testimony is inadmissible may be disregarded. It amounts to no more than the assertion that the evidence is illegal. The objection should fully and specifically point out how it is inadmissible. Leet v. Wilson, 24 Cal. 402. When an objection is that the evidence offered is incompetent and illegal, it is the duty of the court to overrule it if the evidence was admissible for any purpose. Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 627; Bohanan v. Hans, 26 Tex. 450. An objection that evidence is incompetent does not raise any issue as to whether the question is leading or not. The only way to raise such an issue is to object specifically that the question is leading. Railroad Co. v. Pointer, 9 Kan. 627. Where a witness was clearly incompetent by express statute as to certain conversations by reason of the death of a party, an objection to the evidence as irrelevant, immaterial, or improper was held not sufficient. There must be a specific objection that the party is not a competent witness, because the person with whom he transacted the business, and about whose statement he proposes to testify, is dead. Cornell v. Barnes, 26 Wis. 480, (June term, 1870.) This case is somewhat interesting, from the fact that the court, while adhering to the law, expressed its personal regret that the proper objection had not been made, the party deceased having been so well and favorably known to the court that it would not believe the charges made against him, even though the evidence had been properly admitted. The objection was that the evidence was immaterial, irrelevant, and improper. But it was very relevant, very material, and very proper if it were competent. But the question of its competency was not raised, and therefore it was error to exclude it. An objection to a deposition for substance raises no question as to competency, but the party objecting subsequently raised the point of competency, just as the judge was going to charge the jury, asking to have the evidence excluded for incompetency. Refused, and refusal upheld. On appeal, the court said it would be unjust to the plaintiff to allow the defendant, after the testimony is closed, and the court ready to charge the jury, to raise the question of competency when he had placed his objections upon some other grounds at the time the testimony was introduced. If the defendant had objected for competency at the time, the plaintiff might have availed himself of other testimony on the points. Motley v. Head, 43 Vt. 636.

An objection was made that certain evidence was incompetent. The judge refused to entertain the objection unless accompanied by a specification of grounds upon which the party objecting claimed that the evidence was incompetent. Exception to such ruling. On appeal, the supreme court declared: "We think the judge very properly refused to entertain the objection. A judge presiding at the trial of a cause is not to be burdened with the duty of searching for objections to an inquiry put by counsel which the opposing counsel is himself unable to discover, or which, if apparent to his own mind, he sees fit to conceal for no other purpose apparently than to prevent a full consideration of the objection, and with the ultimate intent of taking advantage of an error, in case of defeat, which might have been avoided if his views of the matter had been fairly and candidly expressed at the proper time." Bundy v. Hyde, 50 N. H. 121, (July term, 1870.) An objection that evidence was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial was held to be merely a general objection, and not good if the evidence was admissible for any purpose. Voorman v. Voight, 46 Cal. 398. There are numerous authorities and adjudications in support of the natural, common-sense proposition that a general objection raises no issue except it is as to whether the evidence would under any circumstances or for any purpose be admitted; and that a special objection raises no other issue than the particular one tendered. They are also in support of the proposition that, if a judge overrule a general objection, he must be sustained, unless it clearly appears that under no possible circumstances in the case could the evidence come in; and that, if he sustain a general objection, he must be reversed if it is possible that under any view of the case the evidence might be admitted. That if he overrule a special objection, he must be sustained if the particular objection is bad, no matter how many other good objections might have been offered; but, if he sustain a special objection, he must be reversed if the special objection urged is not good, notwithstanding that there may be other objections which, had they been urged, would have sustained his rulings. The policy of the law is, evidently, to admit evidence unless a good objection to it is clearly shown. All the equities and all the presumptions are, not that a ruling is correct, but that evidence offered ought to come in, unless at the time it is offered good reason is shown why it should be excluded. "Competency is presumed until the contrary is shown." Hall v. Gittings, 2 Har. & J. 112, 120, 121, and cases cited by CHASE, C. J., at the last page; Stoddert v. Manning, 2 Har. & G. 147; Callis v. Tolson, 6 Gill & J. 80, 91; Saxon v. Boyce, 1 Bailey, 66; Smith v. White, 5 Dana, 382, 383.

Limits of cross-examination. The first five assignments of error may be considered together, they being all based on the refusal of the court to allow defendants to cross-examine plaintiffs' witness as to what she saw and did with regard to an alleged former location, at the time she claimed to have made a mining location on the same premises. The witness testified in chief that she went upon the ground, put up a notice, and did some work. On being cross-examined, she said she did not erect any monument, but put her notice on a stone monument already there, by lifting a rock, placing her notice under it, and then replacing the rock. She was then asked by defendants whether she removed any notice from the monument at the time; what she found on the monument at the time; whether the premises were not known as the "Linn Claim" at the time; whether she saw any work done on the claim at the time; and whether anybody else was at work on the claim while she was at work there. General objections to all these questions were sustained by the court. Respondents argue that defendants could not cross-examine as to these matters; that it was opening defendants' case, and that testimony to open their case could not be so introduced. But, while respondents make this argument here, it does not appear from the record on what grounds they urged their objection below. No grounds are stated in support of any objection made by either party at any time in the trial below.

English rule. The English rule on cross-examination is that when a witness has been introduced and sworn and examined as to any material point in the case, the other party may cross-examine him as to the whole case, including any new matter of defense; but the extent to which he may be allowed to press the witness with leading questions will depend upon the circumstances of the case, the demeanor of the witness, his apparent bias, and other things; and must, to a great extent, be left to the discretion of the judge. 2 Phil. Ev. 896-911. This rule is followed to a great extent in the United States. Parties may cross-examine as to all matters pertinent to the issue. Webster v. Lee, 5 Mass. 335, (June term, 1809.) Where a witness is sworn generally in a suit he cannot be restricted, on cross-examination, to such points as the party calling him may choose to select. Merrill v. Berkshire, 11 Pick. 274. Chief Justice SHAW of Massachusetts reviews the question thus: "But upon the question, whether, as a general rule, the cross-examining party is prohibited from putting a leading question, to a matter not inquired of by the party calling him, on his examination in chief, there is a diversity of opinion. It was held by Mr. Justice WASHINGTON that such questions could not be put. Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 580. This is a very respectable authority, and entitled to great consideration. But in the case cited the nature of the question and the circumstances under which it was put are not stated, and no argument was had, and no authority cited. The same view seems to have been taken by the supreme court of Pennsylvania. Ellmaker v. Buckley, 16 Serg. & R. 77. But we think the general practice has been otherwise both in England and in this state, and is so laid down by the compilers. 1 Starkie, Ev. (4th Amer. Ed.) 131; 1 Phil. Ev. (6th Ed.) 260. There is one authority directly in point, where the objection was taken, and it was decided by Lord KENYON, at nisi prius, that such leading question is admissible. Dickinson v. Shee, 4 Esp. 67. So in several recent cases it has been held that, where a witness is called to a particular fact, he is a witness to all purposes, and may be fully cross-examined to the whole case, and no distinction is suggested as to the mode of cross-examination. Morgan v. Brydges, 2 Starkie, 314; Rex v. Brooke, Id. 472. On the whole, the court are of opinion that the weight of authority is in favor of the right to put leading questions under the circumstances stated, and that this is confirmed by practice and experience. It is most desirable that rules of general practice, of so much importance, and of such frequent recurrence, should be as few, simple, and practical as possible, and that the distinctions should not be multiplied without good cause. It would be often difficult in long and complicated examinations to decide whether a question applies wholly to new matter or to matter already examined into in chief. The general rule admitted on all hands is that on a cross-examination leading questions may be put, and the court are of opinion that it would not be useful to ingraft upon it a distinction not in general necessary to attain the purposes of justice in the investigation of the truth of facts; that it would often be difficult of application; and that all the practical good expected from it may be as effectually attained by the exercise of the discretionary powers of the court, where the circumstances are such as to require its interposition." Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 498, 28 Amer. Dec. 317. It should be borne in mind that the point involved in the case from 3 Wash. C. C., quoted by Chief Justice SHAW, was not whether the witness might or might not be cross-examined as to new matter, but whether on that cross-examination leading questions as to such new matter might be put. There is a general impression that the right to cross-examine implies the right to put leading questions, but the very point of Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C., is that the judge there was of the opinion that such is not always the case that you may cross-examine and lead while you keep within the limits of plaintiff's case, but that, when you strike new matter, though you may still cross-examine, you must not, in that part of the cross-examination, put leading questions; and, though this seems a fine distinction, it may often be broad enough to secure valuable results. But in Massachusetts and many other states they reject even this limitation on the English rule, and hold that leading questions may be put in cross-examination as to all matters in issue in a case. It may be urged that great hardship to a plaintiff might arise under so broad a rule; that he would never be safe in calling any witness, unless he knew, to an absolute certainty, how he would stand the fire of cross-examination all along the line of the case; but, after an experience of 50 years under this rule in Massachusetts, the court say, in the October term, 1854: "Experience has shown that this rule is convenient and easy of application in practice, and works no disadvantage to the party producing a witness. On the other hand, a different rule, by making it necessary for the court, during the examination of a witness, constantly to determine what is or is not new matter, upon which the opposite party has the right to put leading questions, leads to confusion and delay in the progress of trials." Beal v. Nichols, 2 Gray, 264. The English rule is followed in New York. Jackson v. Varick, 7 Cow. 238; Varick v. Jackson, 2 Wend. 167; Bank v. Stafford, Id. 483. It prevails in Vermont, (Linsley v. Lovely, 26 Vt. 123;) in Ohio, (Legg v. Drake, 1 Ohio St. 286;) in Missouri, (Page v. Kankey, 6 Mo. 433; Brown v. Burrus, 8 Mo. 26; Railroad Co. v. Silver, 56 Mo. 265;) also in Wisconsin, (Knapp v. Schneider, 24 Wis. 70.) To what extent it prevails in other states we are unable to say, on account of the limited number of Reports accessible to us here.

American rule. Greenleaf says (volume 1, § 445) that some of the states have adopted a contrary rule, which is called, by way of distinction, the "American rule," but refers to only two cases: Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 580, and Ellmaker v. Buckley, 16 Serg. & R. 77. But 3 Wash. C. C. is not a state report, and it does not say that the cross-examination shall not be had, but simply that leading questions shall not be put on such cross-examination as to new matter; and Ellmaker v. Buckley does not say it shall not be done, but simply that it may be refused, as a matter in the discretion of the judge. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 447, says that, though the party may not cross-examine as to new matter before opening his case, he may recall the witness, and cross-examine him, after he has opened. In the same section (447) he says that the rule is considered well settled by the supreme court of the United States that a party has no right to cross-examine except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination, and quotes Railroad Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. 448. We cannot comprehend how this matter could have been considered by the supreme court as well settled. It certainly had not been settled by the supreme court itself. The point had never been before the court, and was not before it in 14 Pet. The question before the court was as to the admissibility of certain evidence which was excluded below. The record showed that it was offered for the purpose of proving that the Baltimore Railroad Company, in making a compromise with a certain patentee and paying him an agreed sum to settle a claim he made upon them for an infringement of his patent, did not recognize that the patentee's claim was good, or that he had any right in the invention, but that the money was given to him simply to get rid of him. The supreme court said that on this showing the court below was right in excluding the evidence; that it was immaterial, or inconsequential, as they say; that the reasons which induced the Baltimore Railroad Company to pay money to the patentee have nothing to do with the patentee's right to his invention. Then, after disposing of the question as presented by the record, they go a little further, for the purpose of satisfying counsel, and say: "But it is now said that evidence was in fact offered for the purpose of rebutting or explaining certain statements made by one of defendant's witnesses in answer to cross-examination made by plaintiff's counsel." Then the court replies: (1) It does not seem natural from the record that the evidence could have been offered simply to rebut those statements. (2) Defendant might have objected to the admission of those statements as not being legitimate under the cross-examination, they not being statements of facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination. (3) The question is then presented whether defendant, having omitted to object to improper evidence brought out on cross-examination, can thereby found a right to introduce testimony in chief to rebut or explain it.

This is the question to which all this introductory matter leads up, but they do not decide the question, and therefore it cannot be said that, having decided a question wherein the other proposition was taken as a necessary premise, they, by implication, decided that also. They dismiss the question with the remark that, if this improper cross-examination by the plaintiff had brought out something to his disadvantage, he would not have been allowed to rebut it, and therefore there is great difficulty in saying that if he could not do so defendant might; and then they waive the question altogether, and say that they place their ruling sustaining the exclusion of the evidence on other grounds, viz., that it was not distinctly stated below that it was offered in rebuttal, and that it was seeking to introduce parol evidence as to a matter evidenced by a written instrument, without producing or accounting for the instrument. Now, is it not apparent from this that the second declaration, on which it is claimed that so important a principle as the American rule on cross-examination is founded, is a mere dictum occurring in the statement of matters of inducement made for the purpose of bringing another question into notice, which other question was finally dismissed without adjudication? We apprehend that no court holds itself responsible, or desires to be held responsible, for every incidental remark made for the purpose of illustrating a question under consideration. We cannot know what the court meant by saying that the principle involved in the second declaration was well settled. They could not have meant well settled in England, for such had never been the rule there. Nor in Massachusetts, Vermont, New York, Ohio, Wisconsin, or Missouri. The case they had in hand was from Pennsylvania, and the rule in that state was, it is true, settled, as the supreme court says; but whether they meant that, or that it was settled in the United States circuit court for Pennsylvania, or what they meant, we cannot tell. A "dictum" is defined by Bouvier to be "an opinion expressed by a court, but which, not being necessarily involved in the case, lacks the force of an adjudication." It frequently happens that in assigning its opinion upon a question before it, the court discusses collateral questions, and expresses a decided opinion upon them. Such opinions, however, are frequently given without much reflection and without previous argument at the bar, and as, moreover, they do not enter in the adjudication of the point before the court, they have only that authority which may be accorded to the opinion, more or less deliberate, of the individual judge who announces it. 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 476. This dictum in 14 Pet. may have contributed somewhat to the declaration in Houghton v. Jones, 1 Wall. 705, which still further contracts the rule. But even the rule as stated in 14 Pet. is very broad; it covers an inquiry into all the facts and circumstances connected with the matter stated in the direct examination; but, while it is broad, it is also uncertain, and uncertainty is almost the greatest defect a rule can have. Whatever may be urged against the English rule, it cannot be charged with uncertainty. It possesses certainty even to my Lord Coke's celebrated third degree. There is little danger of trenching upon its limitations, for it is practically without any. We do not wonder that it is popular with judges, for it relieves them of all anxiety upon one of the most intricate and delicate branches of their duty.

But it seems very hard that a party may be allowed to set up new matter in defense, and draw the proof to support it out of the plaintiff's witnesses by cross-examination. Doubtless, it is the apprehended hardship of this part of the rule which has tempted courts to depart from it; but whenever they have done so, and have failed to adopt some other definite rule, great trouble and difficulty have followed. The matter is one of the greatest possible moment. It affects, or may affect, the examination of every witness in the opening of every case; and it is a question which the nisi prius judge must pass upon at once when presented. It is of the greatest importance to suitors, judges, juries, and counsel that some clear, well-settled rule be adopted, which may be applied with some reasonable celerity and certainty. In California they have cut loose from the old rule, and the consequence is that such renowned jurists as Baldwin and Sanderson confess that even on appeal, with full time for examination, they have difficulty in coming to a satisfactory conclusion as to what the judge below should have admitted, and what he should have excluded. Under such a condition of things, no matter what the ruling of the judge below may be, there is always a fair chance for an appeal. It is a reproach to the law to admit that such an imputation is just. Rather than have such a state of things obtain here, we would be in favor of adopting the English rule out and out; for that, at least, has certainty to commend it. Judges in this country, who have worked under it, say it entails no hardship.

The first case in California where this question arose was in 1855. A majority of the court claimed to follow the case in 14 Pet., and excluded the question, but HEYDENFELDT, J., dissented, and stated that he thought the English rule ought to be adopted. Landsberger v. Gorham, 5 Cal. 451. In 14 Cal., four years later, Judge BALDWIN speaks of difficulty under the construction adopted in California. He finally says that the question proposed was proper, but the only definite reason he gives for its propriety is that it did not concern new matter of defense, but was simply in denial of plaintiff's case. He comments on Greenleaf's rule, but does not touch the point whether defendant might not subsequently call the witness, and cross-examine, even on new matter. Jackson v. Feather R. & G. W. Co., 14 Cal. 24. The next time we find the point appearing in California is in 1864, when it was held that, "the witness not having testified in chief upon the subject of the alleged breach, defendant had, in strictness, no right to interrogate the witness upon that subject at that time." SHAFTER, JR., in Aitken v. Mendenhall, 25 Cal. 213. The qualifying words, "at that time," might seem to point to that portion of the rule in Greenleaf which says that defendant may cross-examine the witness by recalling him after his case has been opened. We next find the question raised in Wetherbee v. Dunn, 32 Cal. 106, in 1867. Defendants offered testimony by cross-examining one of plaintiffs' witnesses, which, though relevant, did not tend to rebut anything which that witness had said in his direct examination. Held, that "it was properly excluded, upon the objection of plaintiffs as to that mode of proof. So far as we can learn from the transcript, the offer was not subsequently renewed." SANDERSON, J. By the concluding sentence, it would seem that the court had also in mind the provision in Greenleaf as to cross-examination on recall. The question came up again in 33 Cal., in the same year as the last case. Judge SANDERSON acknowledges having difficulty with the point. The plaintiff sued for an accounting of a partnership, concerning a mining company, in which there were shares of stock. Defendant asked one of plaintiff's witnesses, on cross-examination, whether the plaintiff had not assigned to him 25 shares of stock, which it was not contended was not the property of plaintiff to dispose of as he pleased. The object of the question was evidently to throw some discredit upon the witness, as showing him to be biased in favor of plaintiff. He says that the court erred in prohibiting the cross-examination, but the only reason he gives is that the witness was intimately associated with the plaintiff in matters directly connected with the facts involved in the action, and spoke to the main points in issue; that, under the circumstances, the defendant had a right to test his credibility by any mode of examination that was calculated to illustrate the attitude and relation of the witness to the parties and the subject-matter of the action. Harper v. Lamping, 33 Cal. 641.

But the question is, under what general principle of law was it proper to exclude this question? How is a party to bring himself under the rule of this case? How is he to know what may reasonably be held to be within the rule in Harper's Case? That the decision did not settle the point, we may infer from the fact that it was very soon after again presented to the court. We find it in Thornton v.

Hook, 36 Cal. 223, in 1868. Plaintiff sued a sheriff for attaching and taking from him a team of horses. In presenting his case he proved by a witness that he had placed the horses in possession of witness to keep them for him on witness' farm, and that while witness was so keeping them for him the sheriff attached and took them in a suit brought by creditors against one Bogart. Defendant, on cross-examination, asked the witness if he knew how plaintiff came into possession of the horses, and if he knew whether, before the property was put into his possession by plaintiff, it had ever belonged to Bogart. Excluded. On appeal the court began by declaring: "It is not always easy to determine the precise point beyond which a cross-examination should not be allowed to proceed." They say, in effect, that this question tended to the destruction of plaintiff's case, but it also tended to help defendant's case; that it was pertinent to the matter pending, but that it also affected new matter. Then they say they will declare no rule in such a case, but leave it to the discretion of the judge below, and cite Ellmaker v. Buckley and 7 Cush. as authority for so doing. But the case in 7 Cush. (Burke v. Miller, 550) is a Massachusetts case, where the English rule prevails, and the right to a full cross-examination was admitted; the only objection made being that the judge ordered the defendant to wait till he had opened his case. There being no denial to him of his right, but merely a ruling on the order of testimony, it was held to be discretionary with the judge. But the supreme court of Nevada meet this issue squarely on this point of double pertinency, and say that in such a case "the fact that circumstances called forth by legitimate cross-examination happen also to sustain a cross-action or counter-claim affords no reason why they should be excluded." Ferguson v. Rutherford, 7 Nev. 391. And in support of such proposition they cite Mondel v. Steel, 8 Mees. & W. 858. This seems to us the more reasonable doctrine—First, because there is certainty in it; and, second, because it seems unfair that a question, legitimate to bring out some truth which will help the defendant, may be suppressed because it must necessarily bring out other evidence which, in strictness, ought to be offered at another time, and possibly in another form. Illinois is also vague and indefinite as to just what the new rule, called the "American rule," means. In fact, no two authorities that we can find agree as to what the rule is. The United States supreme court, in 14 Pet., does not follow Greenleaf; the case in 1 Wall. does not follow 14 Pet.; and the state courts follow none of them, but seem to decide each case on its own inherent equities. The first glimmer of light, in the matter of precedent, which we can see upon the subject of how to proceed, if the English rule is departed from, is from Judge BALDWIN in the case of Jackson v. Feather R. & G. W. Co., in 14 Cal. He decides the matter first upon the general equities, and then adds that there is another reason why the evidence was proper, viz., that it did not relate to new matter of defense, but was a mere denial of plaintiff's case. Judge GARBNER, of Nevada, in Ferguson v. Rutherford, 7 Nev. 390, takes up the idea shadowed forth by BALDWIN, and evolves from it a clear, definite rule, which everybody can understand, and which any one thoroughly versed in the effect of pleadings can apply, viz., that the one invariable test to determine whether the cross-examination can be permitted is, does it concern new matter of defense or not? As we understand the purport of this decision, it means that whatever is in mere denial of plaintiff's case may be brought out on cross-examination, whether the witness directly testified concerning it or not. That any such matter is, for this purpose, a fact or circumstance, legitimately connected with the matter testified to. If the witness has testified to any material fact in behalf of plaintiff's case, he may be compelled to disclose on cross-examination all he knows about the plaintiff's case, and everything that will go towards denying and destroying the case set up by plaintiff. That, so far as defendant has a right to cross-examine on such matter, he shall have the full benefit of cross-examination, viz., the right to make such examination leading, thorough, and exhaustive, and the fact that the evidence thus elicited, while pertinent to the pending matter, will also help defendant's case, is no ground for its exclusion. But he does not touch at all upon the other point in the rule as given by Greenleaf, (1 Ev. § 447,) that though a party may not before opening his case introduce evidence by way of cross-examination of the witnesses of the adverse party, yet he may do so after opening by recalling them for that purpose. We have only one objection to the rule as stated by Judge GARBNER, and that is the difficulty of applying it with certainty in the hurry of nisi prius trials. The test as to whether matter is or is not new matter of defense is, can it be given in evidence under a general denial? and very often it is not easy to say, at a moment's notice, whether the matter is new or not in this sense. The rule would hardly forward business on the trial. There would be the same objection by counsel as to admissibility, the same consumption of time in argument, and the same hesitation on the part of the court to decide. But there is this advantage: After the trial is over, all parties know just what is necessary to determine whether an appeal will lie or not. They know where the line is drawn. They can look for it, and when they find it they know that they have struck "wall rock," and that it is useless to go further. This is a great deal better than trusting to some other man's idea of the general equities of the case. Still, it is a very poor substitute for the plain, simple, English rule, which avoids all possibility of dispute, saves all contention at the trial, dispatches the business at once, and yet, according to the testimony of our oldest and busiest states, hurts nobody. Nevertheless, the supreme court of the United States has discarded the English rule, and has furnished some suggestions for a new rule, which different states have accepted as a basis on which to build up what is called, by way of distinction, the "American rule," though it has hardly received an adoption sufficiently general to warrant such a title.

These suggestions have been adopted in California and Nevada, and our intimate relations with these states lead us to believe that, on the whole, it will be more satisfactory to all parties interested to have our practice in harmony with theirs. As the matter of determining rules on these matters is almost universally left to the courts, and as it is exceedingly desirable to have something definite on the subject, we shall adopt the following rules, believing them to be clearly in accordance with the doctrine held in Nevada, and substantially in accordance with the practice in California: (1) When an adverse witness has testified to any point material to the party calling him, he may then and there be fully cross-examined and led by the adverse party upon all matters pertinent to the case of the party calling him, except exclusively new matter; and nothing shall be deemed new matter except it be such as could not be given under a general denial. (2) The fact that evidence called forth by a legitimate cross-examination happens also to sustain a cross-action or counter-claim affords no reason why it should be excluded. (3) The party entitled to cross-examine may waive his right to do so at the time, and recall the witness, and cross-examine him, after he opens his case. (4) The court, in its discretion, may forbid the cross-examining party putting leading questions when the objection is made that the witness is biased in favor of the party cross-examining, and the court is satisfied that the objection is good.

Under this view the assignments of errors from 1 to 5, inclusive, are good. The questions were improperly excluded. They merely tended to show that the title to the premises was really in the defendants, and not in the plaintiffs. In ejectment it is not new matter to set up defendant's title. Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 176. It was error generally to exclude the question, because no valid grounds of objection were stated. A general objection is bad.

Errors 6, 7, 8. The court erred in rejecting the evidence offered by defendants to prove that plaintiffs knew that the work on the claim had been done by Linn, and that they had examined the records, and knew of defendants' title to the premises in question, (1) because no specific objection was made to the introduction of this evidence; (2) it was evidence tending to show title and possession in defendants, and was therefore not new matter, as was ruled in Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 176. Parties must distinguish between new matter and new evidence, between new matter of defense and new facts and circumstances connected with plaintiff's case. A new fact, properly brought out, is in one sense a new matter, but it is some matter connected with plaintiff's case, which goes to break down the case he is attempting to make; and so long as it is not exclusively new matter of defense which could not have been offered under a general denial it is admissible. We do not mean that this evidence was proper because it might show that plaintiffs had notice of defendants' title; but, whether proper for that purpose or not, it was proper for defendants to show by these witnesses, as well as by any others, that they had located and recorded the claim, and had done work upon it. The questions were directed to facts going to prove title in defendants, and such proof, if made, would have been in direct denial of plaintiff's allegation that the title was in them, and therefore was not new matter of defense.

Error 11. The court erred in rejecting the question: "What authority, if any, did you ever give Mr. French to make locations of mining claims for you in this territory prior to location of the Tiger mine?"—because no specific objection was made to the question; and herein becomes painfully apparent the consequence of bringing a question before us in this form, because we cannot strike at the heart of the matter upon such an objection. The object of an appeal is to settle something, so that, when the case goes back, the parties can know where they stand as to the questions raised on appeal. What can we settle on this question? Are we to go into an examination as to whether this question is leading or not, or whether it was a proper question to ask the witness at the time it was propounded, or whether it was immaterial or irrelevant at any time? We cannot guess as to which of these points counsel desire a ruling; but as no authority is necessary to enable one to locate a mining claim for another, we think that the question might have been excluded as immaterial, if objection had been made on the ground. But, though immaterial so far as authority to locate being necessary was concerned, it might have been material for some other purpose, and, therefore, if objected to as immaterial, the particular reasons why it was claimed to be immaterial should be stated.

Error 12. The court erred in excluding evidence of the contents of the letter from Linn to French, which accompanied the deed and power of attorney to French, because no specific objection was made to the introduction of such evidence. This evidence stands, in one respect, on much the same ground as that objected to in the last exception. We cannot tell what objection plaintiffs had to it; whether it was immaterial, or that sufficient foundation had not been laid for its introduction. We think that the foundation was sufficiently laid. We must distinguish in these matters as to the character, occupation, and business habits of the person claiming to have lost a paper, and as to the importance of the paper itself. If the witness were shown to be a lawyer or business man, with an established office or place to keep his papers, and who claimed to be unable to produce an important document received by him in the course of business, we would hold him to very full proof of loss and search; but if it were an unimportant document, one of trifling value to anybody, we could not hold him to such full proof. But the witness in this case was shown to be a wandering miner, a prospector who moved over the whole mineral region west of the Rocky mountains, flitting hither and thither at a moment's notice, according as the mining excitement raged in one part or another. Naturally we would not expect such a man to carry many papers about with him. He testified that it was his custom to burn all letters as soon as answered. He said that he could not find this letter, and supposed that he had burned it, as was his custom. It is true that the proofs of search were not very full, and would not have been sufficient in the case of an ordinary business man, with an established place of business or residence, as to a document received by him in the ordinary course of business, but in this case we think that it was sufficient. We do not see, though, how it was material, but no objection was made on that ground.

Error 13. The court erred in rejecting the question: "For what purposes did you request Linn to send you a deed of premises in controversy, or power of attorney?"—because no specific objection was offered to such evidence.

Errors 14-26. The court erred in rejecting the evidence offered, because no specific objection was urged against its introduction. So far as the evidence was offered to rebut the presumption of fraud in using Linn's name as a locator with the expectation that he would convey his title to French or Moreland, the parties who made the location for Linn, it might have been successfully objected to as immaterial, because no presumption of fraud arises from such a fact. It is no fraud on anybody for one man to locate another in a mine, and receive back from such person a deed to the property, having made no misrepresentations to such person as to such transfer. Nobody is injured by such a proceeding. The law and customs of miners permit persons to make locations for persons not present. When so made, all the title anybody can acquire by location vests in the persons so located. They cannot be divested of it except by their own voluntary act, or by forfeiture in not complying with the rules and regulations of the district. The title thus acquired is theirs to dispose of as they please. They may bargain, sell, transfer, or give it to whomsoever they like. By having once been located in the claim, their right to acquire any further interest in the discovery by location is exhausted. The fact of their non-residence is immaterial, unless the contrary is expressly declared in the rules and regulations of the district. Whether the miners would have power to disqualify non-residents from being located is, of course, not passed upon here; but when there is no attempt at such disqualification, non-residents stand in the same position as those in the district. They must contribute to the development of the district by working their claims, or paying the fees, the same as those present; and it has been the policy of miners to encourage such locations, rather than look upon them with disfavor. It causes their mining district to be known abroad, and fur-

Errors 27-29. The court erred in rejecting the evidence as to the declarations of plaintiff's grantor relative to the grounds on which she based her title, viz., that she expected to hold the premises because Linn was a non-resident, and that therefore his location was not good, because no specific objection was urged against such evidence. Evidence on this point would have been material, and admissible if it formed a part of the res gestæ. The witness was the immediate grantor of the plaintiffs. Declarations of a grantor as to the nature of the title he asserts, when they go to limit his title, are admissible, not only against himself, but as against parties claiming under him. Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 148. The reason of this rule is that, when a person admits anything against his own interest, he cannot claim that such admission is unworthy of belief. He cannot object to it as insufficient evidence against himself, and his grantees take his interest in the premises cum onere. If this were not so, a party could always avoid his own admissions by simply deeding to some one else. But these admissions must be contemporaneous with the fact to which they relate. The material fact in the case of this exception is not the mere act of Mary Sawyer placing the notice on the mine, but the grounds on which she based her title. As long as she claims title to the premises she is supposed to be interested in maintaining that title. Any admissions made by her as to her title during the time she claimed it, which would go to limit, impair, or modify that title, must be admitted as against her and her grantees. But the moment she had parted with the title, she becomes a stranger to the contest, and her remarks as to the title, made after she had ceased to claim under it, are of no consequence. She may be interested, then, in decrying the title. The evidence sought to be introduced went to show that she knew that defendants had already located the premises, and the reason assigned by her why she thought defendants' title not good was the simple fact of non-residence. Such evidence might often be of great importance. Defendant has a right to show title under a general denial. The record of this title may be lost. He may have no witness to prove that he was located. He may have been, as in this case, a non-resident at the time he was located. The party who located him may be dead or inaccessible, and then an admission of a would-be ejector that defendant was in fact located, but that there was a question whether he was entitled to hold or not, might be decisive of the whole case. The jury might find that, the location being admitted, he was entitled to hold, notwithstanding his non-residence.

Errors 30, 31. These assignments of error are practically the same as 7 and 8. In 7 and 8, Davis, one of the plaintiffs, testifying in the opening in his own behalf, was asked by defendants in cross-examination if he did not know that defendants had worked and recorded their claim.

Objected to and excluded. Subsequently defendants, after opening their case, called Davis as a witness, and asked him the same questions. Objected to by plaintiffs. Objection sustained. Defendants except, and assign errors 30 and 31. It was error to exclude the testimony—First, because no specific objection was made thereto; and, second, for the reasons given in considering points 6, 7, and 8.

Errors 32, 33. The court erred in excluding the evidence of Collier and Henry as to mining customs, because no specific objection was made thereto. The question asked of Collier was open to objection, as being too general for the foundation laid. He showed a knowledge of the customs of Yavapai county alone, and was asked as to general customs without limitation to place; but to raise the point the special ground of objection should have been stated. The effect of such an objection, we may naturally suppose, would have been to limit the question to that county, and then there would have probably been no appeal on this point. Question 33 to Henry seems to us free from objection as to lack of foundation, but, in any event, as no particular objection was urged, and the question seems proper, it was error to exclude it.

Errors 34, 35. Plaintiffs introduced proof of an agreement between Thorne and Cassidy on the one part, and Moreland, an owner in the original Tiger claim, on the other, whereby Moreland was to locate for them 400 feet next north of the premises in controversy, on condition that they would deed back to him one-half of the ground, and that the agreement was fully carried out. Defendants objected, were overruled, and assign therefor errors 34 and 35. The objections were properly overruled, no specific grounds of objection having been stated, and we cannot say that the testimony might not have been admissible for some purpose. Counsel for plaintiffs urge here that the testimony was relevant, and of weight, as relating to an attending circumstance going to show a fraudulent intent of the original locators of the Tiger in trying to hold, by this agreement, more ground on the claim than they were entitled to retain by location; and that such a circumstance, if proved as to the Thorne and Cassidy claim, would tend to raise a presumption, taken in connection with other circumstances, that the same thing was true as to the Linn location. We will notice the point in considering assignment No. 44.

Error 36. The refusal of the court to give the concluding clause of defendants' second instruction was, in effect, a refusal to charge that a claim, being located according to local rules and customs, a failure to comply with such rules as to making and holding the claim would not, of itself, work a forfeiture, unless such failure was, of itself, ordained by such rules and customs to be a forfeiture. This was error. The general rule is that a statute without a penalty is mere brutum fulmen. The miners are recognized as law-makers in the matters of their rules and customs. When they prescribe a duty, and affix no penalty for non-compliance, how are we to know what penalty they intended? For us to fix the penalty would be to make laws for them, which we have no right to do. The province of the courts in this matter is merely to receive the evidence, and from it to declare what laws or rules the miners have in fact adopted. Courts do not presume in favor of forfeiture; but, on the contrary, when parties claim a forfeiture under the mining laws, these laws, instead of being liberally construed to establish the forfeiture, will be strictly construed against it. Colman v. Clements, 23 Cal. 248. The failure of a party to comply with a mining rule or regulation cannot work a forfeiture, unless the rule itself so provides. Bell v. Mining Co., 36 Cal. 219; McGarritty v. Byington, 12 Cal. 426; English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 118.

Error 37. Defendants asked the court to instruct that, "if the defendants were in the possession and occupancy of the claim in controversy at the time plaintiffs' grantor attempted to make her location, no right was acquired by such location." The court refused to give this instruction, but gave in its stead another and very different one, by inserting the words "located and lawfully" before the words "in the possession." This was calculated to seriously mislead the jury. It was the same as to say to them that possession and occupancy were not sufficient unless accompanied by a formal location, and that, in addition to location, the possession and occupancy must be lawful. This, so far as it related to possession before May 10, 1872, was error, and the possession claimed in this case was before that time. Before that time, possession and occupancy, so long as they continued, were sufficient to hold a mining claim against a would-be subsequent locator. The main object of recording a claim is to give parties the opportunity of ascertaining, by visiting the records, what ground is claimed in the district. The only object of putting a notice on the claim is that it shall speak for the owner in his absence, and to give notice to parties coming on the premises that some one has claimed them; but if the party is there himself in possession and occupancy of the claim by himself or his agent, he gives the parties fully as much notice as they could derive from inspecting a slip of paper. If it be suggested that a written notice speaks with more certainty, the answer is that it is doubtful if that be so. A notice never does more in regard to boundaries than to describe the length of the claim. A party claiming to hold by mere actual possession must mark his boundaries by such distinct physical marks or monuments as will indicate to any person what his exterior boundaries are, and he must occupy within them, or do work which is intended to affect the premises; and he is bound by any declaration he may make as to what his possession covers, in this: that he cannot hold more than he claims. If he claims more than the law allows him, a stranger may locate the surplus, just as he could in case a written notice claimed an excess. Of course, if the miners had legislated upon the subject, and in their local assemblies, known as "miners' meetings," had adopted a law that mere possession should not hold against a party regularly locating under the laws, then such possession would not prevail as against such subsequent location; but, in the absence of such law,—and its absence is presumed until the contrary is shown,—actual possession is good so long as it lasts. Before 1866, the courts, of their own motion, adopted the rules, regulations, and customs of miners as a standard by which to determine issues arising between such miners. But from July 26, 1866, to May 10, 1872, which covers the possession and occupancy involved in this case, citizens, and those who had declared their intention to become such, were, by act of congress, permitted to explore and occupy mineral lands of the public domain, subject to such regulations as might be prescribed by law and the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same were not in conflict with the laws of the United States. Here was as absolute a grant of legislative power given to the miners themselves as congress ever gave to the legislature of any territory, or, rather, much larger, for there was no local veto that could nullify their acts. The customs, rules, or regulations of miners were thus given, with the limits named, the full force of legislative enactments, as binding upon the courts of this territory as any law of the legislature, and subject to the very same rules of construction. It gave, in this country, probably the first example of the pure democracies of ancient times as seen in the Grecian states, when the citizens made their laws, not through the medium of representatives, but by assembling in person, and directly declaring their will in the matter. These laws come directly from the source of all political power,—the people themselves,—duly authorized to act in this manner; and this is why they have just as much solemnity and binding force as though they had been enacted by representatives of the people instead of the people themselves.

The questions as to rules or customs, thus adopted, are the same as with any other legislative acts presented. Did the act, or rule, become a law? Was it in force at the time claimed? What is the meaning of the words used? What rule do they establish? How does that law or rule affect the case? Up to May 10, 1872, there was generally no limit to the power of the local legislatures known as "miners' meetings" except the general principles of law. During this time, then, actual possession was good, so far as it did not claim more than the law allowed; it not being shown that a failure to comply with the rules by posting a notice, recording, working, etc., was of itself declared to work a forfeiture. Since May 10, 1872, there are some restrictions upon the powers of miners to legislate. The United States act of May 10, 1872, prescribe some conditions as being necessary to sustain a possessory title, and expressly declares that a failure to comply with those conditions will, of itself, work a forfeiture, and leave the premises open to relocation. But those provisions do not apply to this case as to the points now in hand. It was also error to insert the word "lawfully," as qualifying the possession and occupancy of the premises in controversy, without explaining what force or meaning it was intended the term should have. People v. Byrnes, 30 Cal. 206. Legal terms must not be used without explanation. There is a great necessity for this rule. The law is full of expressions familiar as household words to a lawyer, but no more intelligible than so much Greek would be to the average juror. Not to go back to the old books at all, but to take the language of judges in our own country in comparatively modern times, it may be, and doubtless is, perfectly correct to say that the devisee of a remainder in fee, after death of tenant for life, formerly had remedy by formedon in remainder, or, on entry after death of donee for life, by writ of entry declaring on his seisin, (Wells v. Prince, 4 Mass. 66;) that in double pleading to writ of entry sur disseisin, first plea, nul disseisin, second in bar, that plaintiff was never seised, second is bad, (Martin v. Wood, 6 Mass. 6;) that a plea of non-tenure in formedon without remainder is good, (Prout v. Libby, 14 Mass. 151;) that in a writ of right a plea of seisin to save an easement is bad, for confessing easement alone confesses non-seisin, (Miller v. Miller, 4 Pick. 244;) that darrein seisin is good against a writ of right, that generally a descent cast tolls the entry, but the equity of the jus postliminii sometimes saves the right to an infant heir, (Smith v. Lorillard, 10 Johns. 357;) that in pleading a common recovery assued to the use of the tenant in tail, who was to the foræcipe, it is not necessary to show that the indenture to lead the uses was executed by him, (Dow v. Warren, 6 Mass. 328;) that, in California, defendant in ejectment must set up subsequently acquired title as in the plea puls darrein continuance, (Hardy v. Johnson, 1 Wall. 371;) or that under the plea of non-tenure, with disclaimer and issue to the country, with or without finding for the tenant, plaintiff is not entitled to possession, (Porter v. Rummery, 10 Mass. 64;) but if it be a plea of nul disseisin only, in a writ of entry by a trustee against a cestui que trust, plaintiff may recover, (Needham v. Ide, 5 Pick. 510.) But it would be a hardship to suitors to instruct a jury in such language, and then say to them: "Gentlemen, this is the law of the case; you are bound to follow it, and render your verdict accordingly." Why should not this language be used? It is English by adoption and use; it is clear, forcible, exact, and terse beyond any colloquial words which can be found; but the trouble is, the jury might not understand it. It was necessary, therefore, to adopt the rule that legal expressions should not be used without explanation in such cases. The term "lawful" may seem simple enough for any comprehension, but day after day is often spent in the sole effort to determine whether a certain act was lawful or not. It would be manifold error to instruct, without further explanation, "If you believe that the defendant lawfully killed the deceased, you will acquit;" for that is to make the jury the judges of the law. And so of the use of any legal term; if it is reasonable to think it may have misled the jury, the use of it without explanation will be error.

Error 38. Defendants, in their sixth instruction, asked the court to charge "that the subsequent ratification by Linn of the location by him gave the location the same effect as if made by himself." Given, with the qualification added, "unless a valid location by some other person had in the interval between the location of French and the ratification by Linn been made and perfected;" thus saying, in effect, that the title in an absent locator does not become perfect until he has knowledge of it and ratifies it. This was error. When a location is made for an absent locator, whether with or without authority, or with or without his knowledge, whatever rights are given to him by such location vest in him at once; and even the person locating such absentee, without authority, cannot take down the name of such absentee and insert another, even if he do it before the absent locator has knowledge of the fact that he has been located. Morton v. Mining Co., 26 Cal. 527.

Error 39. The court refused to give the words in defendants' seventh instruction, "and a location made by one person for and in the name of another vests a right in the one for whom the location is made, which can only be divested by his own acts or omissions, or by operation of law." This was error. Id. The court added the words, "but some authority, express or implied, must exist, or the agency must be ratified before other valid claims intervene." This was error. It tended to mislead the jury. As a matter of law, there is implied authority in the very act of making the location, but it tended to impress upon the jury that some other authority was necessary. None other is required. Id. Counsel for respondents urge that a mining claim is an interest in lands within the meaning of the statute of frauds, and that it cannot be created without authority in writing. The point is not fairly before us, and we will dismiss it with the remark that the object of the statute is to guard the owner of an estate in lands against any new estate in the same property being created for another out of the estate of the owner, except by the operation of law, or by his written consent. This writing is to be signed by the party creating the estate, or by some one having written authority to do so. The party who locates a mine obtains an estate therein by such an act, but it is not he who creates that estate. Whatever estate he obtains he derives from some source. There is a proprietor of the land above him. This proprietor says to the locator: "Do thus and so, and you may have a certain estate in the mine." The locator performs the act and obtains the estate, but it is the proprietor who creates the estate in him. If another person places a notice on the claim, that other person does not thereby create an estate for anybody. He has no estate in the premises out of which he can create an estate for another. He is merely performing the acts which are a condition precedent to the creation of an estate in the premises by the real proprietor. It is only after the estate comes into being in the locator that the statute of frauds as to his acts in creating estates in the premises for others applies. The court, in refusing plaintiff's instruction on this point, ruled correctly.

Error 40. The eighth instruction of defendants was refused, and was as follows: "The law makes the discoverer of a mine the agent for those for whom he chooses to act, and his act becomes their act, regardless of the fact whether the party for whose benefit the location is made has any knowledge of it or not. In such cases, however, the agent making such location has no power afterwards to make any change in the same, so as to affect injuriously the rights of the party for whose benefit the location was made. A failure to comply with the local rules or customs of the district will not work a forfeiture, unless such failure is declared by such rules or customs to be a forfeiture." This instruction is obnoxious to criticism in this: that it contains two distinct legal propositions relating to entirely different questions. Still it stated the law correctly as to all cases arising before May 10, 1872, of which this was one, and it was error to refuse it. The territorial law declaring forfeitures for non-compliance with its requirements was repealed in 1866, and no other law declaring forfeitures was enacted until the United States act of May 10, 1872. The latter portion of the instruction as to forfeiture would require modification, but it was correct as to cases arising between 1866 and 1872.

Error 41. Plaintiffs asked for the following instruction: "(3) If you believe from the evidence that plaintiffs were in possession of the premises in dispute, and that defendants entered and ousted them therefrom, you will find for plaintiffs, unless the jury believe from the evidence that defendants had a better right to the possession than that of plaintiffs,"—which was given. This instruction raises the question as to what plaintiff must show in order to entitle him to recover in ejectment. The answer is, he must show a right of possession. Formerly he was obliged to show, not only a right of possession, but also a valid, legal, subsisting title in himself at the commencement of the action. Showing even an equitable title was not sufficient: Adams, Ej. 32; Lord Mansfield, in Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burrows, 119. It was formerly the rule, without any qualification whatever, that any defendant, no matter under what circumstances he entered, might defeat the action by simply showing an outstanding title in some one else than the plaintiff, even though the defendant did not in any way connect himself with that title. This was the logical sequence of the rule that plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, (3 Com. Dig. 553;) that, therefore, it mattered not in what way defendant showed that plaintiff was not within the rule; if he showed it, that was sufficient to defeat the action. This doctrine was held in our United States supreme court as late as in

Love v. Simm's Lessee, 9 Wheat. 515. The learned judge who delivered the opinion in that case felt that there might be some force in the objection; that it was extending too much consideration to tort-feasors, mere naked trespassers, to give them the benefit of such a rule; but he remarked that such cases must be of rare occurrence, and that it was time enough to consider them when they arose. The judge evidently never lived in a mining country; that is, one where the "jewels of sovereignty," the precious metals, were the subject of contention; where it is not uncommon for a man to retire at night from premises of which he has had peaceable possession for years, and, on his return next morning, find strangers encamped upon his grounds, with barricade erected, shotguns and six-shooters displayed with reckless prodigality, and a wild-mannered captain accosting him with the bland salutation: "Don't you think it would be healthier for you to keep away from here, my friend? We don't want to hurt you, you know; but we have been requested to retain possession of these premises." The gallant captain himself would admit that we had outdone him in courtesy if we were to give him the benefit of the rules as applied to bona fide innocent holders claiming under color of title. The first case of tort-feasor presented in the supreme court subsequently, was from the Texas border country, in Christy v. Scott, 14 How. 282, and the court then modified the rule so as to declare that a mere intruder, entering without any claim of title upon the peaceable possession of another, and ejecting him therefrom, cannot then question the title of the party dispossessed, nor can he undertake to show that the real title is in somebody else. He has made a contest simply on possession, and, if plaintiff shows a prior peaceable bona fide possession, and the defendant shows nothing but his mere intrusion, the plaintiff shall have judgment. But if the defendant entered under color of title, under a claim of right, he is not under the ban, and he may rebut the plaintiff's claim of title or right of possession by showing that it is in himself, or in another, subject, however, to one additional limitation, which it was found necessary to adopt in California. In California and other mining countries on the Pacific slope the general government refused for a long time to grant any title to the mineral lands, but tacitly acknowledged a license to work the mines, raising a kind of tenancy at will in the first occupier. The courts found it necessary to declare that this bona fide prior occupation should be sufficient to maintain ejectment against any one not connecting himself with the paramount title; that the possessory title sufficient to maintain the action vested in the first possessor, and flowed from him. The defendant was not prevented from showing that the possessory title was outstanding in another, but merely showing that the paramount title in fee was in the government was not sufficient. This rule is stated in Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 573, and the reasons most lucidly given by Mr. Justice Field, who did so much in California to add to the glory of the common law, by showing how admirably the animating principles of its apparently rigid rules could be applied to the newest and strangest condition of society.

There are two kinds of possessory rights recognized in this territory; one based on the act of November 9, 1864, (Comp. Laws, p. 586,) the other resting on mere prior occupation. To maintain a right under the first, plaintiff must show a compliance with the requirements of the statute; to succeed under the second he must show prior possession, without alienation or abandonment, down to the time of the entry complained of. The action of ejectment is a possessory action, and possession always raises some presumption of right. Plaintiff begins in ejectment, as to this matter, by averring that he is entitled to the possession; that the defendant has the possession; then he undertakes to overcome the presumption flowing from defendant's acknowledged possession by showing that defendant obtained that possession wrongfully by entering upon the possession of plaintiff. If the matter stop here, plaintiff must recover; but if defendant show in reply, as here, that plaintiff obtained his possession by entering on the possession of defendant, presumption is shifted again in favor of defendant. Then, unless plaintiff can go higher in the history of possession, and bring the presumption back in his favor, he does not, through proof of possession alone, put the defendant upon his defense at all; and, if this be the end of the showing made by the plaintiff, he must fail. But plaintiffs did not stop here in this case; they showed color of title, to-wit, a notice of location of the premises. Defendants replied by showing an earlier notice of location for the same ground. Here, then, was a case where plaintiffs, according to the evidence, had failed, so far as a naked possession was concerned, for defendants showed a prior possession. The question then stood as between the parties as to the effect of plaintiffs' notice of location. Instructions should be in harmony with the proof in the case. It was therefore error to instruct the jury "that if they believed from the evidence that plaintiffs were in possession of the premises in dispute, and that defendants entered and ousted them therefrom, they will find for plaintiffs, unless they believe from the evidence that defendants had a better right to possession than that of plaintiffs." This instruction, we may reasonably infer, led the jury to believe that the mere fact of possession by plaintiffs at the time of the ouster gave them, under the evidence in the case, a prima facie right to recover. This was not the law, because the presumption flowing from that possession by plaintiffs had been met and overcome by defendants when they showed an earlier and continuing possession under an earlier location of the same premises. The qualifying clause as to their belief of defendants' better right did not save the instruction, because the jury, we may reasonably believe, were misled as to the condition of defendants on that issue, and as to what onus of proof was on them.

Any charges given to the jury as to the effect of possession in this matter should have informed them that, if they believed defendants had shown a prior and continuing possession, all presumptions, so far as mere possession was concerned, were in favor of defendants. As this case goes back for a new trial, and as the conflict will probably be as to the effect of the two notices, and as the case has already been here twice, it may be well for us to remark that any charge given concerning the notices should be given with careful regard to the evidence adduced respecting them, and that the jury be instructed as to what the effect will be in law upon the rights claimed under the notices, according as they believe any particular set of facts has been proven, and not leave it to them to say generally which they consider gives the better title.

Error 42. The court gave the following instructions at the request of the plaintiffs: "If the location of the mining claim in question was made in the name of Linn by Moreland and French, or either of them, for the purpose of having Linn convey to them, or either of them, the whole or any part of said mining claim, without further consideration, Moreland and French having already located two hundred feet, each, on the same lode, and that Linn ratified the act of location for the purpose of making such conveyance, such location was void, as a fraud and evasion of the law." There is nothing in the record tending to show that French ordered the location of the claim to be made for Linn for the purpose of having the whole or any part of it deeded back to him or Moreland without further consideration, nor is there anything tending to show that Linn ratified the location for the purpose of making any such conveyance; on the contrary, the evidence is directly the other way, so far as it raises any presumption on this point. The evidence is that, as soon as the location was made, French advised Linn that it was of great value; that the vein was 12 feet wide, assayed $1,350 per ton silver, and that he thought that the location made for him (Linn) would be good for $10,000 in less than a year. Fifteen days afterwards, he again wrote him, and speaking more enthusiastically than before of the value of the claim, saying that it was from 12 to 20 feet wide, averaging $1,000 per ton, smelting process, assaying $2,000 per ton; to have no fears; that their claim would be worth $100,000 in less than a year; that he would write for Linn to come as soon as he thought it necessary, but in the mean time he wanted the deed without delay, in order to have no doubt about being able to protect their claim. Linn came on from Nevada some four or five months after, and then French deeded back to him half the ground. Linn testified that it was at his (Linn's) request that French kept the other half of the ground in his (French's) name as security for Linn's indebtedness to him. This is, so far as we can see, all the evidence as to the motive French had in getting the deed for this ground from Linn. Does it tend in any way to raise a presumption that possibly French was trying to commit a fraud on some one by trying to get a deed of this ground to himself without consideration? We cannot find anything in the record to show that he underestimated the value of the location in his representations to Linn. In the first letter of advice, which it is shown was received by Linn before he made the deed, he gave his opinion that Linn's claim was worth, or would be in the course of a year, $10,000. Fifteen days later he wrote a letter, which it was shown was received by Linn before he sent the deed, in which he says: "Our claim will be worth one hundred thousand dollars in less than a year." We do not know exactly what he meant by that, but, if we are to consider the evidence for the purpose of saying what inference might be drawn from it, we would infer that, as each one of them had a claim of 200 feet on the vein, the meaning was that their claims were by him considered to be worth $50,000 apiece. We do not think that this evidence raised any question in the case as to French's honesty of intention in the matter of making the location for Linn, or that he expected to get possession of the premises from Linn without consideration. We are not speaking of the weight of evidence. If there had been any conflicting evidence on this point a question might have been raised for the jury to determine whether French had made these representations or not, whether he had in fact deceived Linn as to the value of the premises, and whether the deed Linn made to him was an absolute conveyance instead of a trust, and whether that was fraud. Even in such case, if they had found fraud, it would only have been a fraud of French upon Linn; would have left the whole title in Linn, and so would not have helped the plaintiffs. But there was no evidence raising such a question in the case, and therefore the instruction had no relevancy to any question involved in the issue. It is never error for a judge to refuse an instruction under such circumstances. Whether it is error to give such an instruction depends upon whether it is calculated to mislead the jury or not. If it appear at all probable that a superfluous instruction might have misled the jury so as to materially affect their verdict, then it is error to give it; and, when error is shown, injury is presumed, unless the contrary plainly appears. This instruction might have misled the jury. It invited them to consider and pass upon a question of fraud not raised by the evidence. Such consideration might have prejudiced the defendants, and therefore the giving of the instruction was error.

Error 43. The following was given as an instruction by the court: "If the location of the mining claim in question was made in the name of Linn, by Moreland and French, or either of them, for the purpose of having Linn convey to them, or either of them, the whole or any part of said mining claim, without further consideration, Moreland and French having already located two hundred feet each on the same lode, the location was absolutely void, as made in fraud and evasion of law."

(1) There was nothing in the evidence on which to raise any presumption that French or Moreland had located the premises with such expectations, and the instruction was therefore irrelevant. It was likely to mislead the jury to the prejudice of the defendants, because it said to them, in effect, that there was such a question involved, which they should pass upon; and therefore the giving of it was error.

(2) Even if the evidence had left it an open question whether French or Moreland had an expectation of getting the ground deeded to them without consideration,—that is, getting a deed of gift to the premises,—and had made the location for that purpose, it was error to instruct that such location would therefore be absolutely void. The location put the title in Linn, to dispose of as he pleased. Even if the parties locating him had expected that he would deed back to them for nothing, and made the location because of that hope and belief, Linn might have been ignorant of such intention and expectation, and might have declined to gratify it. His title depended upon the fact of location, not on the intention the parties locating him might have had in their own minds at the time. A person locating for an absentee, in the hope that the latter will give away the right thus secured for him, takes the chances as to whether he will give it away or not, and as to whom he will give it, if he gives it at all. In case a locator knew in advance that the object of using his name was to enable the person using it to hold more feet on the lead than he could acquire by location under the laws, and consented to such use of his name for that purpose, the question as to whether such an arrangement between the parties would be a fraud sufficient to vitiate the location is not before us.

The question as to the propriety of the second instruction of the court is practically considered in errors 41, 44, and 45.

The forty-fourth and forty-fifth assignments of error are that the court erred in not granting a new trial, because it is claimed the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, and that the verdict is contrary to law. Of course, the general rule is well established that, no matter how much evidence the transcript discloses against the verdict rendered, if it shows sufficient evidence in support of the verdict to raise a substantial conflict with the evidence on the other side, this court will not interfere; for when there is a substantial conflict of evidence it is the province of the jury to weigh the evidence, and decide which side is entitled to prevail. The transcript in this case embodies all the evidence that was given, and sets it all out with wearisome particularity in the exact words as given by the witnesses,—a most objectionable and reprehensible manner of making up a statement. Considering the round-about way in which most witnesses generally tell their story, and the mass of trifling and irrelevant matter they interweave with their statements, a lawyer, when he comes to present to the supreme court a statement of what has been proven on the trial, should not follow the words of the witness, but should state succinctly what evidence was given which is material on appeal. There may be nothing in the testimony of the witness affecting the appeal, and, if so, his narrations should not be thrust upon us to consume our time and exhaust our patience. In this case about 200 folios of oral testimony have been sent up, when the whole statement could have been much more clearly presented in the compass of 30 or 40 folios. But counsel very considerably caused the transcript to be printed, though not obliged to do so. Had they not done so, this case could not have been examined in time for the approaching term of the court below.

Now as to whether there is a substantial conflict of evidence in this transcript. All presumptions as to possession were overcome as to plaintiffs, because defendants showed a prior and continuing possession down to the beginning of plaintiffs' possession. Plaintiffs were then put upon their right of possession. They introduced paper title,—a notice of location. Defendant proved a prior location. The whole issue turned, then, on the question as to whether plaintiffs' notice was good. Plaintiffs made but two objections to defendants' notice, charging: (1) That it was fraudulent; that, if not fraudulent, it was void, having been made without authority and therefore void ab initio. (2) There being no other issue before the jury, in finding for plaintiff they declared that defendants' location was either void for fraud, or void from want of authority to locate. We have read the transcript over repeatedly and carefully, and we cannot find any evidence at all which raises a question of fraud, or which tends to raise the presumption of fraud, even granting that the evidence proved the facts which plaintiffs claimed constituted the fraud. Granting that the agreement between Moreland, individually, and Thorne and Cassidy, as to the latter deeding back half of the ground in consideration of a location being made for them was fraud, it is a long way from the fact to the conclusion that Linn's location is open to the suspicion of fraud. This is the only evidence, taken in connection with the nature of the relations and transactions between Linn and French, from which respondents claim proof of fraud. The conclusions respondents seek to draw are that this agreement showed a desire upon the part of the original Tiger Company to get more ground than they could hold by location; that they took the south half of the Thorne and Cassidy claim, which was the half nearest the original location; that Linn's location lay between; that it was made by French without Linn's knowledge; that, therefore, it was the intention of the Tiger Company to have Linn's location at the time it was made. To this the first answer is: The whole vein was open to location at the time the original location was made; the locations were all made the same day, and by the same person. The original locators took only 1,200 feet. If they had wanted more ground, they could have taken it, even to the extent of 3,000 feet. The very fact that they did not locate for themselves the 200 feet of Linn's location and the south 200 feet of the Thorne and Cassidy claim, if it shows anything as to this matter, shows that the original locators did not want that ground in their company. Second. The agreement with Thorne and Cassidy was not an agreement by them with the original locators of the Tiger, but with the individual named Moreland; and it was not an agreement for the south half any more than for the north half. It was not an agreement to segregate any particular part, but simply an agreement to convey to Moreland one-half the premises. Moreland, for reasons which are not explained in the record, got Thorne and Cassidy to consent to segregate the south half of their claim, and also, for reasons not explained, or in any way alluded to in the record, gave the original locators the benefit of his agreement with Thorne and Cassidy, and had the deed from them for that half interest made directly to the original locators on the vein. But there is nothing to show that Linn knew anything of this, or that he consented to any plan they might have had in regard to his location. We do not see in these facts anything which even tends in any way to taint Linn's location with fraud of any kind. If the verdict of the jury was based on the theory that the evidence did not show authority for the location, it should be set aside, because no proof of authority was necessary. The new trial should have been granted. Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

1. In deciding an issue involving the existence of a public law and affecting public rights, stipulations of the parties as to the law or the action of the legislature will be disregarded.

2. Where there is no evidence of the existence of a statute in the published laws or in the secretary's office, courts will not examine the legislative journals to ascertain whether such a law was passed.

DUNNE, C. J., dissenting.

G. H. Owry, for appellant. J. T. Alsap, pro se.

PORTER, J. This is an action in the nature of a quo warranto, in which the plaintiff seeks to obtain possession of the office of probate judge of Maricopa county. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is probate judge of Maricopa county; that on the 1st day in May, 1875, an election was held for the office of probate judge therein, for the term of two years from the first Monday in June, 1875; and that at such election the plaintiff was duly elected; that he received a certificate of such election from the proper officers, and in due form; that he gave bond and qualified, as required by law, and that he demanded of the defendant, and was entitled to, the possession of said office of probate judge: further alleging that the defendant had, on the first Monday in June, 1875, usurped said office, and has ever since withheld the same from plaintiff, demanding judgment against the defendant that he be ousted from such office, and plaintiff put in possession of the same. The defendant, in his answer, denies that the plaintiff is probate judge of Maricopa county; denies that plaintiff was elected to such office at any lawfully authorized election therefor. That the election pretended to have been held in the said county on the first Monday of May, 1875, was not authorized to be held by any statute law of the territory of Arizona. He further alleges that the defendant was probate judge of Maricopa county; that he held said office by appointment of the governor of the territory of Arizona, under a commission from him dated the 23d day of February, 1875; that said commission, by its terms, appointed him such judge, to have and to hold the same until the 31st day of December, 1876; that he had executed the official bond, taken the oath as required by law, and was in the lawful possession of the office of probate judge. On the trial of the cause no evidence was given by either party, but the case was submitted on stipulations between the parties as follows: That on or about the 25th day of January, 1875, a bill was introduced in the legislature of the territory of Arizona, then in lawful session, authorizing and directing that a general judicial election be held throughout the territory on the first Monday in May, 1875, and every two years thereafter, and that at such election a probate judge for each of the counties should be elected; that said bill passed both houses of said legislature, was duly enrolled, and presented to the governor for his approval; that the governor returned said bill to the house where it originated—to wit, the council—on the 12th day of February, 1875, without his approval; that on the same day the council again passed the said bill by a vote of two-thirds of the members thereof, the vote being taken by yeas and nays; that the said bill was then in the regular manner transmitted to the house of representatives for its action, and on the same day the said house passed the said bill by a vote of two-thirds of its members, the vote having been taken by yeas and nays, and the said bill was then regularly returned to the council. The council returned the bill to the governor. It is further stipulated that the election, or pretended election, mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, was held as therein stated; that the plaintiff received the greater number of votes; that he received a certificate of election from the board of supervisors; that he executed an official bond, and demanded and was refused possession of the office, as alleged in the complaint; that defendant held said office by commission of the governor, in manner and form as set forth in defendant's answer.

The stipulations in this case do not appear to relate to any questions of fact between the parties that are personal and private in their nature, the determination of which might affect only the interest or conduct of the parties to this action; but they relate almost wholly to what transpired on certain days in a legislative body when having under consideration the question of the passage of a law to provide for the election of a probate judge in every county of the territory,—a law general in its character, of interest to the living, and affecting the estates of the dead. The issue raised by the pleadings clearly is, whether at the time stated in the complaint there was a law of the territory in force authorizing the election of a probate judge in Maricopa county. If there was such a law authorizing such an election in Maricopa county on the first Monday in May, 1875, the same law authorized a similar election in each county in the territory. If the law was then in force, it is still in force, and will by its terms authorize a similar election in May, 1877. The court was asked to decide the issue, the determination of which reached far beyond the parties of record,—to every county of the territory; to decide this by not taking judicial knowledge of such a law, by examining the printed statutes, or the office of the properly appointed custodian of the original copies of laws passed, not even from the proved action of the legislature in considering such a law, but solely from the stipulations of the parties. We hold that parties to an action cannot properly stipulate what the law is that is to govern their case, and that courts should not regard such stipulations when made, and we are equally of the opinion that they cannot stipulate what the action of a law-making body was in a given case, and from the stipulations thus made ask the court to determine whether a general law is or is not in force. The agreement of parties that a statute with certain provisions is in force does not make it in force. The agreement of parties that a law-making body did certain things when considering a bill, even though the things they agree between them to have been done were all that were necessary in the opinion of a court to constitute its passage, does not constitute the bill a law. In deciding the issue raised, which we think would have been better raised by demurrer than by answer, we shall not regard the stipulation.

Was there, then, a law of the territory of Arizona authorizing the election of probate judge in Maricopa county, as alleged in the complaint? There is no such law among the published laws of the territory. There is no copy of such law in the office of the secretary of the territory,—the officer who is the lawful custodian of the original bills that have been properly passed. Not finding any evidence of the existence of such a law in the published laws or in the office of the secretary, is it competent for the court to examine the journals of the two houses of the legislature, and seek there to find evidence of such law having been enacted, and still in force? The language of the authorities, as marshaled in a leading case of Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, is stated that "the result of the authorities clearly is that, whenever a general statute is misrecited or its existence denied, the question is to be tried and determined by the court as a question of law. There is no plea by which its existence can be put in issue and tried as a question of fact." In the same case it was held "that the court, upon passing upon the validity of a law that appeared among the published laws, would not examine the journal or the enrolled bill to see if it was published as passed." If it is not competent in such a case to examine the journal or enrolled bill, to verify or alter the published law, it appears to us still more certain that the same rule should govern in a case like the present, where there is a total absence of any evidence of legislative action upon the law in question. If the enrollment, authentication, and depositing with the secretary of state is conclusive that a law has passed, the want of all these things may be conclusive that there is no such law. It appears to the court that it was never intended that the journals of a legislative body were to be regarded as evidence to the courts as to what laws were enacted by it, and that a court, in a merely collateral issue, would not be warranted in declaring a general law in force on such evidence alone. The presumptions of law all are that if the legislature had passed the law under consideration, the same would have appeared among the published laws, or at least they would have seen that the secretary of the territory was provided with an enrolled copy thereof. We are therefore of the opinion that on the first Monday in May, 1875, there was no law of the territory authorizing the election of a probate judge in Maricopa county, and that the election so held was without authority of law, and void. It follows from these conclusions that the judgment of the district court must be affirmed, but upon views in some respects different from those which seem to have prevailed in the court below. Judgment affirmed.

TWEED, J., concurred.

DUNNE, C. J., (dissenting.) I cannot concur in the judgment of the majority of the court affirming the decree below, for the following reasons: The plaintiff, Graves, claiming to be the duly-elected probate judge of Maricopa county by vote of the people, brought his action to oust from said office the defendant, Alsap, claiming to hold the same office under appointment from the governor of the territory. The case was tried by the court without a jury. The court found the following facts: (1) The jurisdictional facts as to the institution of the action, waiver of service, appearance of parties, facts of trial, etc. (2) This is literally copied. "That on or about the twenty-fifth day of January a bill was introduced in the legislature of the territory of Arizona, then in lawful session, authorizing and directing that a general judicial election be held throughout the territory on the first Monday in May, 1875, and every two years thereafter, and that at such election a probate judge for each of the counties should be elected; that said bill passed both houses of said legislature, was duly enrolled and presented to the governor for his approval, and that the governor returned the said bill to the council where it originated, on the twelfth day of February, 1875, without his approval, and on the same day the council again passed the said bill by a vote of two-thirds of the members thereof, the vote having been taken by yeas and nays; that the said bill was then in the regular manner transmitted to the house of representatives for its action, and on the same day the house of representatives passed the said bill by a vote of two-thirds of its members, the vote having been taken by yeas and nays, and the said bill was then regularly returned to the council; and that the council returned the bill to the governor." (3, 4, 5) In substance. The election was ordered in Maricopa county, and plaintiff elected thereat to the office of probate judge, and qualified, etc.; all in accordance with the requirements of said alleged law. (6, 7) In substance. That defendant was appointed to said office by the governor on February 23, 1875, under the old law, qualified, etc., and was in possession of the office. As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court found, in substance: (1) That the action of the legislature upon said bill subsequent to the return of the same to it by the governor was "without authority of law, and was void." (2, 3) That the said election for probate judge in Maricopa county was without authority of law, and was void, and plaintiff therefore not entitled to the office. (4, 5) That the defendant is entitled to the office, and to judgment accordingly. Judgment was entered in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals, and assigns for error: (1) That the court erred in finding the conclusion of law that the action of the legislature upon said bill, after the return thereof without the approval of the governor, was "without authority of law, and void." (2) That the court erred in finding the conclusion of law that the election was void. (3, 4, 5, 6) That the court erred in finding, as conclusions of law, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and that defendant was.

It will thus be seen that, if the regularity of the proceedings below be admitted, all the facts relating to this particular case are settled, as regularly found by the court sitting as a jury. They are established just as effectually as if they had been found by a jury of 12 men. They have been found by a jury; that is, by the court sitting as a jury. The findings of facts were reduced to writing and filed. There is no exception by either party as to the correctness of the finding of facts. All the facts which govern the case as between these parties are absolutely settled, and there can now be no question raised by either party as to which facts are or are not proven in this case, so far as the act of finding was warranted by law. The error assigned is not that there has been any improper finding of facts, but that the court did not draw correct conclusions of law from those facts established on the trial. The conclusion of law found below, upon which the court determined plaintiff's demand, was this: that the action of the legislature upon the bill, after it was returned by the governor without his approval, was without authority of law, and was void. The question here is, was that proceeding regular, and, if so, was it a correct conclusion of law upon the facts established on the trial? The conclusion involves two propositions: (1) That the acts of the Arizona legislature in the premises were without authority of law; (2) that the acts were void. The learned judge below did not find that the acts were without authority, and therefore void, but that they were without authority, and that they were void.

Let us first examine whether the acts were or were not done without authority. All authority in the matter is regulated by the acts of congress. The legislature of Arizona had just so much legislative authority, and no more, as is given by the laws of the United States. The following facts appear from the laws of the United States: (1) Up to December 1, 1873, under the laws of the United States, the governor of the territory of Arizona had absolute veto power. (2) On the 22d of June, 1874, congress adopted what are called the "Revised Statutes of the United States," repealing all laws of the United States passed prior to December 1, 1873, any portion of which was embraced in any section of said revision, except laws of a private, local, or temporary nature. (3) The old law fixing powers of governors of territories as to the veto power was passed prior to December 1, 1873, and was embraced in said revision, and in said revision the provision giving absolute veto power to the governor of Arizona was omitted, and in lieu thereof it was provided that, notwithstanding his veto, a law might be passed by a two-thirds vote of each house of the legislature. (4) The law stood in that shape until the 18th of February, 1875, six days after the legislature of Arizona had passed the law, over the governor's veto, making probate judges elective. (5) On the 18th of February, 1875, congress amended the Revised Statutes by inserting a clause giving to the governor of Arizona absolute veto power. Defendant, in support of the proposition that the legislature of Arizona had no authority to pass said bill over the governor's veto, argues:

1. As stated in his brief, in the following language: That "on the 20th of June, 1874, congress passed an act entitled 'An act providing for the publication of the Revised Statutes and Laws of the United States,' (18 St. at Large, p. 113,) by which the secretary of state was directed to prepare certain 'head-notes, marginal notes, references,' etc., and when so prepared, to certify the law, and when so certified and printed and promulgated, it should be legal evidence of such law. The secretary of state completed this work on the 22d day of February, 1875. See certificate of secretary of state on page next to title-page, Rev. St. This was 10 days after the legislature of Arizona adjourned." It is not clear for what purpose attention is called to this fact. The case was submitted on briefs, and there was therefore no opportunity of calling on defendant to explain the purport of this proposition. If it be intended to lead to the conclusion that the law itself was not in force until thus promulgated, the answer is that the law became operative as soon as it was signed by the president. Certified copies of the act would have been evidence of the law at any time after its enactment. This was merely a provision to secure a great number of certified copies in a printed form, which, when duly certified, printed, and promulgated, should everywhere be received as evidence of the law. The same thing is done with the acts of state legislatures. Provision is made that printed copies, duly attested by the secretary of state, shall be received as evidence of the law, but it is not supposed, nor is it the fact, that the laws are not in force until the printed copies are circulated. They are only a convenient means of proving the law.

2. Defendant, speaking of the amendments of February 18, 1875, claims that those amendments were to take effect at the same time as the Revised Statutes themselves, because of the wording of section 2 of the amendatory act, which reads as follows: "Sec. 2. That the secretary of state is directed, if practicable, to cause this act to be printed and bound in the volume of the Revised Statutes of the United States." I do not think there is much force in the argument that the expression by a legislature of a desire to have two or more laws printed and bound in the same volume, if practicable, is an indication of an intention on the part of the legislature to have all the laws thus bound together take effect at the same time, particularly when the laws were passed at different sessions of the legislature. The more reasonable method to discover when it was intended a law should go into effect is to look at the provisions of the law itself on that point, and if nothing is said on the subject in the law itself, the presumption is that it takes effect on its passage. In the British parliament at one time the rule was that all laws took effect from the commencement of the session. In other legislatures there is a general rule that, in the absence of other provisions, all laws take effect from the last day of the session; but acts of our congress, in the absence of express provisions to the contrary, take effect from their passage. 1 Kent, Comm. 455, note 1.

3. Defendant urges that the title of the original act is an indication that it was the intention of congress to have the amendatory act of February 18, 1875, take effect from the 1st of December, 1873, and refers us to that title. On reference, I find that the title reads as follows: "An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the first day of December, 1873." How that title, of an act passed June 22, 1874, can give any indication of what congress intended in a subsequent act passed the following year, is not clear.

4. Defendant urges that the intention of congress to have the act of February 18, 1875, take effect at the same time as the act adopting the Revised Statutes is shown by section 5595 of the Revised Statutes, and refers us to that section. To this argument there is the same objection as to the last. Section 5595, referred to, reads as follows: "Sec. 5595. The foregoing seventy-three titles embrace the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, in force on the first day of December, 1873, as revised and consolidated by commissioners appointed under an act of congress, and the same shall be designated and cited as the 'Revised Statutes of the United States.'" That section is a part of a law adopted June 22, 1874. How the words just cited can give any indication of what congress intended in a subsequent act passed the following year is not clear.

5. Defendant urges that the intention of congress to have the act of February 18, 1875, take effect 1 year, 2 months, and 18 days prior to its adoption, is shown by the wording of the first paragraph of section 1 of the act itself. This paragraph, in my opinion, is a mere preamble, which undertakes to state the object of the act, and is in these words: "That, for the purpose of correcting errors and supplying omissions in the act entitled 'An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the first day of December, A. D. 1873,' so as to make the same truly express such laws, the following amendments are hereby made therein." But a preamble is no part of an act; neither is the title. 1 Kent, Comm. 460. Some modern authorities admit they may be parts of the act, but only formal parts, not governing the act itself. In our acts of congress, when the language of the title or preamble is entirely in accord with the spirit of the act itself, it is simply a corroborating circumstance as showing intent. The attention of legislators is especially directed to the provision of the act itself, to the enacting clause proper. If those are satisfactory to the legislators, they know the phraseology of the title or the preamble is of little moment. The title and preamble are worded in accordance with the ideas of the original introducer of the bill. They are generally in harmony with the bill as originally drawn, but when the bill is submitted to the legislature it becomes the property of the house; it is often amended and transformed until its original author would not know it. Sometimes, when the fight is over, some member with a logical turn of mind rises and proposes an amendment to the title or preamble which will bring them into harmony with the new bill thus made. Sometimes the changes are so great and the amendments so incongruous that no reasonable length of title could express the purport of the bill, and the original title is allowed to stand, and sometimes it stands through oversight, inattention, or indifference; and all this because legislators know that neither the preamble nor the title constitutes any portion of the act itself, and that the plain provisions of the act cannot be affected by any inconsistency or incongruity between the act proper and things which are no part of the act itself. Thus we find that one of the most important acts ever passed by congress—the act changing the whole policy of this government in the matter of the occupation and ownership of all the mines of gold, silver, and cinna-bar or copper contained in the United States—is entitled "An act granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands, and for other purposes;" and the most incongruous provisions of legislation are repeatedly found in acts the titles of which show they were introduced for the purpose of making appropriations. The essentials of an act are the propositions enacted. The rest are but attendant circumstances. "Propositions enacted" argues, of course, enacting clause and actual enactment. In cases where the courts find the language of the act so ambiguous that they have to resort to construction to try to discover the intent of the legislature, they may derive some light from a consideration of the title and preamble, as showing, possibly, to some extent, the intent of the legislature; but courts will not permit an act, plain in its own terms, to be made ambiguous because of some inconsistency between the act and its title or preamble. Only such ambiguities will be considered as are raised by the language of the act itself; for it is the act itself courts are required to enforce, not its title or preamble.

Let us now look at the legislation of congress on this subject of the Revised Statutes, and see whether the acts themselves are intelligible or not. The initial legislation on this subject of the Revised Statutes is the act of June 27, 1866, entitled "An act to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statute laws of the United States." Section 1 provides for the appointment of commissioners to revise, simplify, arrange, and consolidate all statutes of the United States general and permanent in their nature which shall be in force at the time such commissioners may make the final report of their doings." Section 2, fixing the powers of these commissioners, says they shall bring together all statutes and parts of statutes which from similarity of subject ought to be brought together, omitting redundancies or obsolete enactments, and making such alterations as may be necessary to reconcile the contradictions, supply the omissions, and amend the imperfections of the original text. Section 3 provides "that, when the commissioners have completed the revision and consolidation of the statutes as aforesaid, they shall cause a copy of the same, in print, to be submitted to congress, that the statutes so revised and consolidated may be re-enacted, if congress shall so determine." Sections 4, 5, and 6 provide for the printing of the report in parts, for contemporaneous criticism, salary of commissioners, clerks, etc. From this it will be seen that these persons were not compilers to merely report to congress what did exist as the law, but commissioners with power to revise, omit, supply, make alterations, amend imperfections, and report to congress such a body of law as they thought ought to exist, so that congress might, if it chose, re-enact such revision and declare it to be the law of the land, in lieu of all former laws on the subject embraced in such revision. The commissioners, after a lapse of about seven years, submitted a revised and consolidated body of laws. Congress, by a regularly enacted law of March 3, 1873, raised a committee of three to accept on the part of the United States the draft of the revision of the laws thus prepared; but, having in view the great powers conferred on the commissioners, and fearful that such acceptance might be construed into an adoption of the revision, they added a saving clause that the effect of this act authorizing acceptance should not be construed as adopting the revision. Then subsequently, on June 22, 1874, congress adopted the revision, possibly with amendments of their own added thereto, the same as they would enact any other law, and repealing all prior laws any portion of which was embraced in said revision. The repealing words are very carefully chosen. They are as follows: "Sec. 5596. All acts of congress passed prior to said 1st day of December, 1873, any portion of which is embraced in any section of said revision, are hereby repealed, and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof, (all parts of such acts not contained in such revision having been repealed or superseded by subsequent acts, not being general and permanent in their nature;) provided, that the incorporation into said revision of any general and permanent provisions taken from any act making appropriations, or from an act containing other provisions of a private, local, or temporary character, shall not repeal or in any way affect any appropriation, or any provision of a private, local, or temporary character, contained in any of said acts, but the same shall remain in force; and all acts of congress passed prior to said last-named day, no part of which are embraced in said revision, shall not be affected or changed by its enactment." The repeal of the old laws was to date from December 1, 1873, but as the repeal was not made until June 22, 1874, it was seen that acts might have been done, rights might have accrued, and the tenure of office might have continued or have begun under the old laws after December 1, 1873, and before June 22, 1874,—the day of the repeal. Then, by section 5597, provisions were made for such cases by affirming the general principle of law that acts done and accrued rights could not be affected by such repeal, declaring that such repeal should not affect such acts or rights, nor the term or tenure of such offices. It was also seen that various acts have been passed since December 1, 1873, and before the enactment of the Revised Statutes, and it was declared that all such acts should have effect the same as if passed after the enactment of the Revised Statutes, and then there was a declaration as to what that effect would be. This, so far as congress could do so, is a declaration of the effect of an enactment subsequent to the adoption of the revision. If A. is declared equal to B., and then the value of A. is declared, it is a declaration of the value of B. It was there declared that the effect of a subsequent statute would be to repeal any portion of the revision inconsistent with such subsequent enactment.

The question will arise as to the effect of such repeal upon acts done or rights accrued between the time of the adoption of the Revised Statutes and date of such repeal, and the answer to that question will, I think, be decisive of one question in this case. Under the law prior to December 1, 1873, the governors of the territories of Utah and Arizona had absolute veto power. In the territories of Colorado, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, Washington, Wyoming, and New Mexico, the governors had only a qualified veto power. What report the commissioners made on the subject I do not know, and it is entirely immaterial what they reported. The act as passed by congress is before us, and is the law on the subject. In that act we find that congress placed the legislatures of all the territories on equal footing in this respect, giving to all of them the power to pass laws over the veto of the governor by a two-thirds vote, the act to date from December 1, 1873, saving and respecting, however, all acts done and all rights accrued between that date and June 22, 1874. The first question, then, is, were the provisions of the old law, giving absolute veto powers to the governors of Utah and Arizona, repealed and no longer in force after December 1, 1873? The answer is that they were repealed unless such provisions were of a private, local, or temporary character. They were not temporary, because there was no particular time when they should expire. They were not private, because they were a part of the general organic act of the territory, and related to the rights of the whole people of the territory. The courts of the territory would certainly take judicial notice of the organic act, which they could not do if they were private acts. Were these provisions local in their character? "Local" is from "locus," a place. It is defined by Webster: "(1) Pertaining to a particular place, or to a fixed or limited portion of space, as, local circumstances; (2) limited or confined to a spot, place, or definite district, as, a local custom." Was this a provision relating only to a particular place? Was it something affecting a place merely, or something affecting the rights of the people of the United States in general? This was a most important provision, relating to one of the most important political rights a people can have,—the right to make their own laws. It fixed their political status as a people. It removed restriction on their political power. It referred not to the place, but to the people thereof, and to the people of the United States. If such a provision can be said to be local in the sense of the Revised Statutes, every provision concerning any territory is likewise local, for it is as local to give this right in one place as it is to withhold it in another, and on that theory no laws concerning territories have properly any place in the Revised Statutes, being all local in their nature. By the very act of revising the legislation concerning territories, and consolidating it all into one uniform body of law, congress declared its understanding to be that legislation on this subject was legislation of a general and permanent nature. If the law fixing the political rights of the people of Utah and Arizona was a local law, in the sense of the Revised Statutes as to local laws not being repealed, then there was no propriety in making the amendment at all, for if it was a local law then it was not repealed by the adoption of the Revised Statutes, but was in force without the amendment. True, this argument is not conclusive, for the amendment might have been made ex industria; but the facts that congress treated it as a general law by incorporating the general rule into the Revised Statutes, and then again treated the Utah and Arizona matter as a general law by inserting the provisions concerning them in the Revised Statutes, are corroborative facts tending to show that this view of the case is also the one taken by the congress of the United States. This point will be considered again later in this opinion. For the present, I will state that in my opinion all the old laws relating to territories were set aside excepting whatever provisions might have been therein contained of a private, local, or temporary nature, such as the provisions concerning fees of certain officers, the occupation of certain buildings, the prosecution of certain works, or such private, local, or temporary matters; that the legislation concerning political power is not local, but that the general scheme of territorial government as to the exercise of political power in passing laws was uniformly fixed by a new general law, and all old laws on the subject were repealed.

The people of all the territories, then, stood upon an equal footing as to their political rights under the Revised Statutes until February 18, 1875. Up to that time the people of the territories of Utah and Arizona had power to pass laws over the veto of the governor, the same as people of other territories might do. The people of Arizona, it is claimed, exercised that power on the 12th of February, 1875, passing, it is claimed, a certain law over the veto of the governor. Then, six days after the law had been so passed, congress amended section 1842 of the law concerning territories by adding thereto the following provision: "Provided, that so much of this section as provides for making any bill passed by the legislative assembly of a territory a law without the approval of the governor shall not apply to the territories of Utah and Arizona." Now, what effect did the adoption of this amendment have upon the law passed by the legislature of Arizona February 12, 1875? In the absence of any special words in the act of amendment as to the time it was to take effect, it would, of course, take effect only upon and after its adoption. The only words which it is claimed govern on the matter are the following, constituting the first paragraph of the act: "That, for the purpose of correcting errors and supplying omissions in the act entitled 'An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, 1873,' so as to make the same truly express such laws, the following amendments are hereby made therein." Now, what is a preamble? Webster defines it as "an introductory portion; an introduction or preface, as to a book, document, or the like. Specifically, the introductory part of a statute, which states the reasons and intent of the law." This introductory part of the statute, which states the reasons and intent of the law, is, then, merely a preamble. It makes no difference that it is placed after the enacting clause instead of before it. Whether a certain collocation of words has force as a law or not depends, not upon their location on a page of the statute book, but whether they enact anything or not. Whether there is any law enacted in this paragraph or not is easily seen. Strike out what follows it, except the approval, and there is nothing enacted. There is nothing in it but a declaration of an intention to do something, namely, to correct errors and supply omissions in a certain act, so as to make the said act truly express what laws were in force December 1, 1873. It is claimed that these words make the amendments take effect at the same time with the act they amend. But suppose there was a concluding section saying they should take effect 30 days after the date of their passage, which would govern then, the preamble or the concluding section? The latter, of course. But why? Is it because they would be the later expression in the act on the subject? No; for they would not be the later expression in the act. They would be the only expression in it on the subject, for the preamble is not a part of the act. There is no expression here in the act proper as to when the amendments are to take effect. They therefore take effect from the date of their adoption. The preamble says the act is to correct errors and supply omissions, but, as I understand it, the first thing the act does is neither to correct an error nor to supply an omission, but to repeal sections and enact new ones, so as to change the law concerning how stationery shall be furnished to congress. Is an act declaring how the clerk of the house shall buy his stationery to be considered a law general and permanent in its nature, and yet an act affecting the political rights of the whole people of the United States to be considered a private, local, or temporary act? In the Revised Statutes, which it is declared contain the laws of a general and permanent character, we find acts regulating the management of the Smithsonian Institution, the salary of pages to the senate and house, compensation of one laborer in charge of private passage, the salary of the steward of the president's household, etc. Why are these considered general acts? Is it not because the people of the whole United States are interested in these salaries, since they have to foot the bill? And are not the whole people of the United States affected by this legislation concerning the veto power of the governor of a territory? Each separate territory is the property of the people of the United States. It is governed by officers appointed indirectly by the people of the United States. All the salaries of all those officers, as well as those of the members of the local legislature, and all the expenses attending the passage and printing of the laws, are paid by the people of the whole United States. The people of the United States are interested in all that concerns the government of these territories; but when it comes to the matter of making laws for these territories, as the law stood December 1, 1873, and as it now stands, the whole people of the United States are a part of the law-making power of the territory of Arizona,—a part of the legislature. To pass a law in Arizona at present, three consents are necessary: The consent of the assembly, the consent of the council, and the consent of the governor. There are thus three independent houses, so to speak, through which a bill must pass before it can become a law. The governor does not act for himself in this matter, of course. For whom does he act? Whom does he represent? Not the people of Arizona, for they did not make him governor. He represents the people of the United States, for it is they who indirectly have placed him there as a part of the legislature of that territory to act for them, the only owners and sovereigns of that territory. The people of the United States said they would not trust the entire legislative power over the territory of Utah to the people there, because they felt there was a two-thirds majority there which would make laws of which they did not approve, and they reserved to themselves the right to an absolute veto, to be exercised by their governor. For some reason they declared the same thing with regard to Arizona. They will not even trust their governor in some of the territories, but reserve a further right of veto, even over his consent, to be exercised by their representative in congress.

Can it be said that a law that reserved to the people of the United States the right to absolutely veto the acts of the people of Arizona and Utah was a local law, affecting only the people of those territories? Did it not directly affect the people of the whole United States? If it was not a local law, then it was repealed the day the Revised Statutes were adopted, for it was not contained in those statutes, and all other laws were repealed except those of a private, local, or temporary character. Congress has passed many acts concerning the rights of the people of the territories, and it has so carefully guarded the rights of the people of the United States to govern these territories themselves that in no two of the territories are the political rights of the people and right of habeas corpus the same. In Idaho, legislative acts become laws unless vetoed in three days; if vetoed, they may be passed by a two-thirds vote; it is not necessary to submit them to congress for approval; postmasters may hold territorial offices; the people control the government penitentiary; the delegate elected to congress must be a citizen of the United States; the people cannot assign the districts of the federal judges; they cannot establish courts and fix their jurisdiction; they cannot fix the day of electing their delegate to congress; and they are not entitled to habeas corpus on the same grounds as in the District of Columbia. In no other territory are the rights of the people the same in all these respects. In two territories the veto may be delayed five days; in two the veto is absolute; in one no postmaster can hold a territorial office; in five the people cannot control the territorial penitentiary; in six the delegate to congress need not be a citizen of the United States; in seven the people may assign the judicial districts; in seven the people may fix the day for electing delegates; in seven the people may have habeas corpus for the same reasons as in the District of Columbia; in only one can the people establish courts and fix their jurisdiction. All of these laws are in the Revised Statutes of the General Laws of the United States. Can any one of these provisions be said to be an exception to a rule? If so, which is the rule and which is the exception? They cannot be local acts, because they affect the rights of the whole people of the United States; they are not considered local by congress, because the commissioners, the men chosen as learned in the law, present them as general laws; congress, which may be supposed to know the difference between a general and a local law, enacts them in the Revised Code of General Laws. In what, then, does their generality consist? Not in the application of the rule; for there is no general application of any rule, except the rule that the governing power of all territories is in the whole people of the United States; that not even a law creating the office of constable may stand if the people of the United States at large do not choose to have it so. The generality of this consists in this: that all these acts are legislation on the general subject of the political rights of the people in the territories, and that every act on the subject affects the whole people of the United States, as either taking some power from them, and giving it to the people of the territory, or recalling some such power already granted.

There is another fact which goes to show that congress did not consider that a provision affecting only a particular territory was therefore a local provision. Title 23 of the Revised Statutes is devoted to legislation concerning the territories, but it is divided into three chapters. Chapter 1, consisting of 56 sections, is headed, "Provisions Common to all the Territories;" chapter 2, containing 57 sections, is headed, "Of Provisions Concerning Particularly Organized Territories;" chapter 3, composed of 22 sections, is headed, "Provisions Relating to the Unorganized Territory of Alaska." Now, there is nothing in the chapter relating to Alaska which applies to any other territory of the United States. No provision is made allowing the people of that territory to make laws in any manner for their own government, but it is declared they shall be governed by the general laws of the United States; that is, governed by the people of the whole United States, to whom the territory belongs. No courts are established in Alaska for the administration of those laws; but the Alaskans are given over to the jurisdiction of the United States dis-strict courts of California, Oregon, and Washington. The principal industry of the territory, the seal-fisheries, is placed under the control of the treasury department of the United States. The secretary of the treasury is authorized to appoint an agent to manage the seal-fisheries, and to perform such other duties as the secretary may assign to him. This agent is the local representative in Alaska of the power and authority of the United States. This act concerning the unorganized territory of Alaska is local, in the sense that it relates on one side to Alaska, but on the other side it relates to the owners and sovereigns of Alaska,—to the whole people of the United States,—as indicating how their power shall be felt in Alaska. It is a declaration of the sovereign power as to how Alaska shall be governed, and affects not only the people who live in Alaska, but the people who bought, paid for, own, govern, and control Alaska, and it is therefore a general law, and is in its proper place in the Code of General Laws. If it was a mere local statute, it had no business in the general code. If it was a mere local act, it remained in force without a re-enactment. But congress did not look upon it as a local act, and the people of the United States do not consider that the government of Alaska is a mere local matter, with which they have nothing to do. In the same way congress enacted, in chapter 1, 56 provisions common to all territories. There remained, then, in the old laws, a great number of particular provisions, some relating to only one territory, some to two or more territories. If those provisions were regarded as mere local exceptions to a general law, and therefore as mere local laws, they would have kept their place in the statute book without re-enactment; but congress did not look upon it in that light. On the contrary, it went carefully through all the laws relating to territories, collected all those acts called by counsel "local exceptions," but called by congress "provisions concerning particular territories," and re-enacted such of these particular provisions as they still desired to continue in force, enacting them in a separate chapter of title 23. In that chapter they filled 57 sections with such particular provisions, even to the point of regulating where the United States marshal should have control of a federal prison and where he should not. If we cannot judge by this what were the particular provisions they intended should be continued, how can we judge? There is a maxim, expressio unius exclusio est alterius. But here is an expression as to an intention to retain 57 particular provisions, the fifty-eighth left out, and yet it is claimed that we are bound to consider that they intended to retain the fifty-eighth also. I take it, then, that in leaving out the particular provisions, existing in two separate acts, which gave absolute veto powers to the governors of two territories, congress intended they should be left out, and that the old laws on this subject were repealed by the adoption of the Revised Statutes. We cannot consider them as in force after the adoption of the Revised Statutes, without construing directly against the letter of the statute. And so far as the spirit of the act is concerned, the action of congress in the matter, having had its attention called to particular provisions, having legislated on particular provisions, having declared what ones it intended to retain, shows, if it shows anything, that congress acted in the matter with full notice of these provisions, and deliberately omitted them. To construe against the very letter of the law is to go to the extreme limit of judicial power in the matter, and will never be done if any reasonable construction can be given to the law as it now stands. Is there anything unreasonable in thinking that congress meant to do what it did do? There were nine territories, and in seven of them the people were granted full legislative powers. In two of them this power was restricted by a particular limitation. The act, as it stands, removed the particular limitation and placed all upon an equal footing. Are we to leave the plain, direct, unequivocal language of the statute, and go about the law, behind the law, and presume an intention different from what is expressed, and construe on that presumed intention, set aside the letter of the law, destroy uniformity, and set up diversity? The effect of the statute as it stands is to remove diversity and establish uniformity.

It is claimed that the legislation concerning the government of the District of Columbia is not in the Revised Statutes, and that that is an argument to show that congress looked upon the legislation as local. This is a mistake. The legislation concerning the District of Columbia is found in the Revised Statutes. It is true it is not found in the first volume thereof, but congress specially ordered that "the revision of the statute relating to the District of Columbia, to post-roads, and the public treaties," be published in a separate volume, and entitled and labeled, "Revised Statutes Relating to the District of Columbia, and Post-Roads, and Public Treaties," which has been done. An act granting certain powers may be a general act. The power thus granted may be exercised only in a particular place. The power may be exercised only in a certain locality, but the act granting the power may still remain a general act. States pass general laws concerning notaries public, providing for a certain number in each county, but limiting the exercise of notarial power to the county in which the notary resides. An exception is made as to one county, providing that the notaries of that county may exercise notarial powers in an adjoining county, also thus giving the notaries of one county more power than is given to others. Then comes a revision of the statutes, in which, by general law, notarial power is abolished. There is a section in the revision saying that all general laws not in the revision are repealed. Would the notaries of the favored county still have notarial powers, on the plea that they had them by virtue of a local law? A law is not necessarily local because it seems to operate only in a particular locality. The territory of Arizona was acquired by treaty; that is, the territorial area now called Arizona was so acquired. A treaty is a law of the land. Was that law by which Arizona was acquired a local law, affecting Arizona alone? It seemed to relate only to Arizona; it seemed to simply change the political condition of the people of Arizona, effecting a change in their citizenship; but that was by no means the extent of the operation of the law. That law, which seemed limited in its effect to Arizona, really affected every member of the body politic of Mexico and of the United States. It effected a change in political and proprietary rights. Would a law transferring Cuba to the United States be a local law? It seems to relate only to the status of Cuba. Would a law ceding Arizona back to Mexico be a local law? It seems to apply only to Arizona. Why is it not a local law? Because in ceding Arizona to a foreign power the people of the United States would divest themselves of proprietary and political rights. The people of the United States, by treaty, acquired the political right to make laws for the government of Arizona. Any law by which the people of the United States become divested of those rights, in whole or in part, is a general law, because it concerns the people of the whole United States. When the people of the United States cede political power to the people of Arizona, they are divesting themselves of it for the time being as completely as though they ceded those rights to Mexico. It may be called a "lease" of power, as distinguished from an absolute divestment, because in one case it can be resumed at will, in the other not; but even then, does not a lease of rights affect both parties to the act, the lessor as well as the lessee? When the people of the United States ceded to the people of Arizona a limited power of making their own laws, the law by which it was done was a general law, because it affected the political power of the whole people of the United States. The act, then, which gave the people of Arizona power to make such laws as might receive the sanction of the governor was a general, and not a local, law, because, though it affected the people of Arizona very materially in giving them a certain amount of political power, it affected the people of the United States to the very same extent, for the gain of the people of Arizona was the exact measure of the loss of the people of the United States. I am therefore again led to the conclusion that the act fixing the political power of the people of Arizona, prior to December 1, 1873, was a general law, and was repealed by the adoption of the Revised Statutes June 22, 1874, which established a different rule on the subject, increasing the political power of the people of Arizona by giving them power to pass laws notwithstanding the objections of the governor.

It is, however, contended they did not have power to do so on February 12, 1875, by reason of the amendatory act of February 18, 1875. Having considered the old law as repealed, we may then look on the Revised Statutes of June 22, 1874, as the original law on this subject, and the question will then be as to the effect of the amendment of February 18, 1875. I have already shown that I do not consider there is anything in the amendatory act—that is to say, in the act proper—declaring when the amendments are to take effect, and that they therefore take effect only from their enactment, to-wit, February 18, 1875; and that any laws passed prior to that date, and since December 1, 1873, over the governor's veto, stand as laws of Arizona until repealed. I have shown that I consider that the clause which it is claimed gives these amendments a retroactive effect is merely a preamble. But suppose it is not a preamble, but in fact a part of the act, even then it could not affect the validity of the law of the legislature of Arizona duly passed February 12, 1875, in accordance with the provisions of the Revised Statutes of 1874, over the governor's veto, for two reasons: (1) Because congress had no power to give the act that effect; (2) the acts in pari materia show it was not the intention of congress, in the adoption of the Revised Statutes, to invalidate any act done or disturb any right which accrued under existing laws.

1. Congress has no power to give a statute such a retrospective effect as will destroy vested rights. The doctrine is stated by Kent in the following language: "A retrospective statute, affecting and changing vested rights, is very generally considered in this country as founded on unconstitutional principles, and consequently inoperative and void." 1 Kent, Comm. 455. The vested right in the case which cannot be destroyed is not the right of the plaintiff to the office of probate judge, but is the right to a certain amount of political power which vested in the people of Arizona the day the limitation on their legislative power was removed by the adoption of the Revised Statutes, June 22, 1874. From that day until February 18, 1875, they had vested in them the right to make laws by a two-thirds vote of the legislature, notwithstanding the objection of the governor. It was shown that there was at least an attempt to exercise that right. An attempt was made to at least thus pass a law. Under that alleged law, if properly passed, the people acquired the right to elect a certain class of judges. Everything that could be done to give the people that right, if the law was really passed, was fully and completely done. True, they had not yet exercised the right of election, but the right of election was not the right which vested under the act of congress. The right which vested under the act of congress was the right to make laws, notwithstanding the objections of the governor, and that right they had exercised, or at least attempted to exercise. Subsequent acts of congress might recall this right of legislation, but they could not recall the acts done while that right existed. A principal may revoke the authority of an agent, but he cannot annul acts duly performed and consummated while the authority existed. Whether congress thought it had the power to do so or not is immaterial. Its power in the matter was exhausted when it passed the law. The powers of the government are divided into three co-ordinate branches, each supreme in its sphere. It is the province of the judiciary to declare the effect of laws. This right is not shared by the legislative department, but is an exclusive attribute of the judicial power. The language of what I consider the preamble in the amendatory act of February 18, 1875, undertakes to say that the effect of these amendments shall be to make the Revised Statutes, adopted June 22, 1874, truly express what was the law December 1, 1873, not congress. For congress to undertake to do it is to usurp judicial functions. It would be no more irregular for the president to do this by proclamation than for congress to do it by declaration. In Kent's Commentaries the rule is stated: "It seems to be settled, as the sense of the courts of justice in this country, that the legislature cannot pass any declaratory laws, or acts declaratory of what the law was before its passage, so as to give it any binding weight with the courts." 1 Kent, Comm. 456, note c, and numerous cases there cited in support of the proposition as to the authority of co-ordinate branches of government. Here is an attempt, on February 18, 1875, by congress, to declare what law was in force December 1, 1873. But the courts cannot accept the declaration of a legislature that a certain law was in force on a certain prior day. To admit a contrary doctrine would be to take the construction of statutes from courts and give it to the legislature. The courts must take the statute books, and from them discover and declare what laws were or were not in force on a certain day. Congress claims that the non-insertion in the Revised Statutes of the provision giving absolute veto power to the governor of Arizona was an omission; that congress intended to insert it. So they might have intended to enact a whole law, but from any cause might have omitted to do it. Can we adjudicate upon such an intention? The doctrine of intention in construction is that where a law has really been enacted, but its meaning is by its own terms ambiguous, that is, capable of two constructions,—“ambiguous, and with double sense deluding,”—then, if the intention of the legislature can be clearly ascertained, the sense which will give effect to that intention will be adopted. But to supply a whole proviso of new and independent matter, constituting an exception to the law as it plainly reads, simply because the legislature may declare that they intended to enact that proviso, but that by some mischance it was overlooked and omitted, is further than courts can be expected to go.

When an intention as to the policy of an act is shown by an actual declaration in an act, in the form of an enactment therein, and that policy is in accordance with public policy and sound law, that will be accepted as the declared policy of the act, and as showing the spirit and intention of subsequent acts in pari materia, if there be nothing in subsequent acts to make such a construction an unreasonable one. In the first act adopting the Revised Statutes, it was declared, in section 5597, that the adoption of these statutes repealing former acts should not affect any act done or any rights accrued before the repeal of the former acts. This was because the repeal took place June 22, 1874, to date from December 1, 1873, and this was to save all acts done and all rights accrued while the old acts were in force. In other words, although the repeal was to date back to December 1, 1873, nothing which was regularly done in the mean time should be disturbed, nor any accrued rights be destroyed. In the subsequent act in pari materia, it is claimed that it was intended to have the change in the law relate back to a certain date, but the spirit of the organic act saves all acts done and all rights accrued in the mean time. There is nothing in the subsequent act declaring any intention to depart from the declared policy in the organic act in this respect. The language of the statute is much stronger than the general rule of law on the subject. The general rule is that rights to be saved must be clearly vested, but the policy of this act is declared in broader terms. It goes so far as to say that every act done and every right accrued under existing laws stands as good, notwithstanding changes in the law. I am therefore of the opinion that on the 12th of February, 1875, the legislature of Arizona territory had authority and power to pass an act, notwithstanding the objections of the governor. It may then be thought that the only question remaining is, did they really do it? But that is not the question in this case. The question in this case is, was it, in this case, under the pleadings, necessary to prove, and if so, was it proved, that they really did it?

2. This brings me to the consideration of the second proposition contained in the first conclusion of law of the judge below, in which he said that the acts were void.

Were the acts of the legislature void? On this point the defendant urges in his brief a proposition in the following language: “(6) The election held, etc., was void. No law authorizing an election to be held on that day is to be found in the printed statutes of the territory, nor is there such a law on file among the enrolled laws of the territory in the secretary's office. * * * If the journals of the legislature be referred to, it will be found that, after passing the bill the second time, it was by special committee (not in the ordinary manner) returned to the governor. The governor is not the custodian of the laws of the territory, nor is he required to care for their preservation more than any other citizen of the territory. His connection with the bill ceased when he returned it to the house in which it originated, with his objections. There is no statute requiring of him any other duty as to the bill save to approve or disapprove. * * * To say there is such a law, as claimed by the appellant, when the same is not found either in the printed statutes or on file among the enrolled laws, is putting on trial for official misconduct the secretary of the territory and the legislative council, in a merely collateral proceeding, in which they are not parties, and are wholly unheard, and is a violation of their constitutional rights and the plainest dictates of justice." To this argument there are two answers: (1) The secretary of the territory is not put on trial for any official misconduct, because there is nothing to show the bill was ever delivered to him. It has not been traced to his hands, and he cannot keep what was never intrusted to him. (2) The defendant is bound by the facts established in this court, by the facts found by the court sitting as a jury, filed in the case as the facts found proven, and the finding not excepted to.

It is urged that the stipulation as to proof made by plaintiff cannot help him in this action; that the court below could not take notice of facts brought in only by the stipulation. And yet it is only from the stipulation that the right of the defendant to the office by appointment appears. Yet the court took notice of the facts there shown in his favor, and on them adjudged that he was rightfully entitled to the office. Why must it not take equal notice of the facts stipulated in plaintiff's favor? It was a stipulation as to mere probative facts, entirely capable of actual proof in case they really existed. If defendant thought plaintiff could not prove them, he was not obliged to admit them. He simply waived the formal proof, admitting that the facts were as claimed. He denied the conclusions which plaintiff wished to draw from them. It is not alleged, nor does it appear, that this is a feigned issue. Let us see first what act congress required or directed the legislature to do if it wished to pass an act over the veto of the governor, and then what acts it is proven in this case were done, so as to see whether the legislature fully complied with all the requirements or not. Section 1842 of the Revised Statutes says, (and I number the provisions for convenience in reference:) (1) "Every bill which has passed the legislative assembly of any territory shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor." (2) "If he approve it, he shall sign it;" (3) "but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that house in which it originated;" (4) "and that house shall enter the objections at large in its journal;" (5) "and proceed to reconsider it;" (6) "if after such reconsideration two-thirds of that house agree to pass the bill," (7) "it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house," (8) "by which it shall be likewise reconsidered;" (9) "and if approved by two-thirds of that house, it shall become a law." (10) "But in all such cases the vote of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays," (11) "and the names of the persons voting for or against the bill shall be entered in the journal of each house." Now, in the matter of this bill, acted on by the legislature of the territory of Arizona, February 12, 1875, all of these things may have been done, but in this case the record does not affirmatively show that it was proven in the trial below that all of these things were done.

1. The record does not show that the fourth requirement was complied with, viz., that the house to which the bill was returned entered the objections at large on its journal; but neither does it show that the governor stated any objections. The court found the fact on this point to be that the governor returned the bill "without his approval." I do not see that we can go beyond that finding in this respect, and presume that the governor did state objections. So far as the record goes, it does not appear that he stated any objections. I do not then see how it could be held that the omission to prove that objections of the governor were entered in the journal would affect this case, for we do not know that there were any objections to enter.

2. The seventh direction speaks of sending the objections of the governor with the bill when the latter is sent to the house. The record here does not explicitly state that any objections of the governor were sent with the bill, but the court below found that, after the bill had been passed by a two-thirds vote in the council, "the said bill was, in the regular manner, transmitted to the house of representatives for its action." So far as the transmission was concerned, it seems to me that the finding of the court, if good for any purpose in this matter, shows it was sufficiently regular, particularly as it does not appear that there were any objections to transmit.

3. The eleventh direction says the yeas and nays shall be entered on the journal of each house. The record in this case does not show whether that was done or not. Was it necessary in this case for plaintiff to prove that that was done? How does the matter of proof stand? Under the pleadings in this case, what proof was necessary for the existence of this law? Plaintiff, in his complaint, alleges that he was the duly elected and qualified probate judge of Maricopa county. He alleges the election was duly held, stating the time of his election, the fact thereof, when he received his certificate, when he qualified, and when he made demand for his office. He did not plead the law under which he claimed. The defendant did not demur. He answered, and pleaded nul tiel record, alleging there was no law of the territory authorizing such an election. It seems to be pretty well settled that an issue as to the existence of a public law cannot be raised in that way. See numerous cases cited in Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253. From that case I quote as follows: "Thus, in The Prince's Case, 8 Coke, 28, 'it was resolved that against a general act of parliament, or such act whereof the judges ex officio ought to take notice, the other party cannot plead nul tiel record, for of such acts the judges ought to take notice. But if it be misrecited, the party ought to demur in law upon it, and in that case the law is grounded upon great reason; for God forbid, if the record of such acts should be lost or consumed by fire or other means, that it should tend to the general prejudice of the commonwealth, but rather, although it be lost or consumed, the judges, either by the printed copy or by the record in which it was pleaded, or by other means, may inform themselves of it.'" See, also, Dwar. St. 613.

Defendant says, in this case, in his brief, that the law is lost; that is, that it cannot be found in the secretary's office; that the journals show it was delivered to the governor, but that he is not responsible for it. Yet the case in 8 Coke says that in such cases God forbid that it should tend to the general prejudice of the commonwealth; that in such cases the judges, either by a printed copy or by the records, or by other means, may inform themselves of it. Dwarria says: "The existence of a public act must be tried by the judges, who are to inform themselves in the best way they can." The existence of a law is not a question to be left to a jury to determine on the accidental evidence before them. Senator VERPLANCE's opinion, (as judge,) cited in Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 264. In De Bow v. People, 1 Denio, 14, Mr. Chief Justice BRONSON says the question must be settled by the court as a question of law. Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 268. The supreme court of California says, in the last-cited case, that "at common law not even the plea of nul tle record was admissible. There was no plea by which the existence of a general act of parliament, as a question of fact, could be put in issue and tried. It was regarded as a question of law alone, of which the judges were bound to take notice. If the enrollment was in existence they would consult it, but of course would not go beyond that record. But if that had been lost or destroyed, and there was no printed statute, (which I will remark is what defendant claims here,) it was necessary for the judges to look for it in other documents, where it had been recited or recognized and acted upon, or to inform themselves in the best mode they could. It was still a question of law, and not of fact, and they were supposed to know the law." Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 259. The legislature of Arizona have adopted the common law as the rule of decision in all courts of this territory, in all cases not in conflict with the statute law governing them. Comp. Laws, p. 524, § 7. I do not know of any statute here changing the common-law rule of pleading in this respect. I am confident there is none, and that the question of the existence of the law under which plaintiff claims was never properly raised in this case.

The court found, as facts proven, that all of the proceedings as to the election itself were regular; that the election was held; that plaintiff was elected, received his certificate of election, filed his bond, and took the oath required, and made demand of the office. No question as to the existence or validity of the law under which he was elected having been properly raised, how should it have been determined? I think defendant misconceives the effect of the authorities he quotes from 30 Cal.

Statutes, without some necessary penalty, either expressed or implied, are merely directory. They may be followed or not, as parties choose; for if there is no penalty, how does it matter? In the act of congress governing this case there is no declaration of the consequences of non-compliance. To be fatal, it should have so declared, unless it can be found from the law and practice in such cases that non-compliance with all these forms is held to be fatal. I am of opinion it will be found that inquiry as to the fact of compliance or non-compliance with these requirements is not allowed, even when the attempt is directly made to invalidate the statute because of the very fact of non-compliance. The effect of Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 298, is not that the party claiming the existence of a statute must show affirmatively that the yeas and nays were entered in the journal, but that it is a matter of defense that the party denying the validity of the act may prove the journals, and if he can show from them that the vote was not entered, he may thereby defeat the act. Even in this decision the supreme court of California remark that it was decided by two justices, the third being absent, and that the ruling was expressly based upon the very special provision of the constitution of that state. Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 270. Even in Spangler v. Jacoby, the court declared that if the journal is lost or destroyed, it will be intended that the proper entry was made on the journal. Sherman v. Story, Id. 271. When the journal is not produced, when the defendant does not attempt to show a non-compliance, then must it not also be presumed by the court that either the journal is lost, and that the entry will be intended, or that defendant, failing to produce it, and failing to undertake to show non-entry, waives any objection on that point? In Railroad v. Governor, 23 Mo. 353, it was declared that inquiry could not be made as to whether the legislature had complied with a direction requiring particular forms to be observed in passing a bill. This was where the rules for the action of the legislature were prescribed by the constitution,—certainly as binding a requirement as the provision of the act of congress in this case. The court says to go into an inquiry as to whether all the forms had been complied with "would seem like an inquisition into the conduct of the members of the general assembly; and it must be seen at once that it is a very delicate power, the frequent exercise of which must lead to endless confusion in the administration of the law. This inquiry may be extended to good as well as bad laws; to those passed as well with the approval of the governor as those which are passed, his objections to the contrary notwithstanding; for it is clear that if a law passed over the objections of the governor may be impeached by inquiry, whether the forms of the constitution were observed in its enactment, the same inquiry may be instituted in relation to laws passed with his sanction; and thus statutes constitutional on their face, regular in their terms, which may have been the rule of action for years, and under which large amounts of property have been vested and numerous titles taken, may be abrogated and declared void." (I will remark here that every law of Arizona territory rests on this footing. See section 3, p. 179, Comp. Laws, which requires the vote on the final passage of all bills to be by ayes and nays, and entered in the journal. Under the doctrine contended for here by defendant, the validity of every law of this territory would depend upon whether the clerk of either house had or had not possibly, in a moment of hurry, carelessness, or neglect, omitted to make a certain entry in his minutes.) The court continues: "A principle with such a consequence should be supported by a weight of authority which no court can resist. When we reflect on the manner in which journals are made up, and the rank of the officers to whom that duty is intrusted, how startling must the proposition be that all our statute laws depend for their validity on the journals of the two houses of the general assembly showing that all the forms required by the constitution to be observed in their enactment have been complied with! The required form may be observed, and the clerk may fail to make the necessary or correct entry. If the journals had been designed as the evidence in the last resort that the laws were constitutionally passed, would not some method have been adopted by which greater care would have been exacted in entering the proceedings of the two houses? Would the task of making them have been intrusted to a single clerk, with a power in the house to dispense with their reading, even should there be a rule requiring them to be read?—a matter, however, about which the constitution is silent." Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 272. In Turley v. County of Logan, 17 Ill. 152, the correctness of the above decision, on general principles, was expressly admitted, but it was again claimed that the constitution of Illinois required a different rule in that state. But on this point Mr. Justice SKINNER, who was not on the bench when Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 298, was decided, expressly reserved himself, even under the constitution of Illinois. Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 274. In Sherman v. Story, the supreme court of California say it is a remarkable commentary on the worthlessness of journals as evidence of the law that, out of the dozen cases cited in that opinion, in at least two of them, if not more, it was shown that the clerks blundered in making up the journals, and adds this language: "Better, far better, that a provision should occasionally find its way into the statute through mistake, or even fraud, than that every act, state and national, should at any and all times be liable to be put in issue and impeached by the journals, loose paper of the legislature, and parol evidence. Such a state of uncertainty in the statute laws of the land would lead to mischief absolutely intolerable." 30 Cal. 275.

What is the effect upon this case of all this law? I take it that it has this effect: that it establishes the proposition that the defendant himself, even if he were regularly at work impeaching the law, having admitted all the substantial facts concerning its passage,—the original passage, the vote, the reconsideration, the two-thirds vote in each house, and the taking of the vote by ayes and nays,—could not himself have introduced proof to show whether the journals contained the record of the vote or not. This, under the rule in Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 275, and what the court there says, is the general law. Even under the restricted rule in the case of Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 298, on which, it is plain, much doubt is thrown by the courts of other states, as also by the new judge on the bench when that case was decided, all the defendant can claim is that if he were regularly impeaching the validity of the act he might bring in the journals, and if the record of entry were not there, he might claim that its omission invalidated the act. But he is not regularly impeaching the validity of the act, and if he were it is not shown that the vote is not recorded; so he makes no point in any event. But the point that is made is by no means clear, that defendant could in any case offer proof that the record of the vote does not exist. If there had been a clear issue as to whether the act had passed, and the act itself had been produced on the trial, what proof of its passage would have been sufficient? Simply this: the certificate of the presiding officer of each house that the bill was passed by a two-thirds vote. It would not have been necessary that this certificate should state anything about the record or transmission of objections, vote by ayes and nays, or record of the vote. See the attestation of the passage of the civil rights bill in congress over the veto of the president, April 9, 1866. The certificate in that case proves one fact only,—the substantial fact that the bill passed by a two-thirds vote. That is all the plaintiff could have been asked to establish in this case. He proved it by the admissions of the defendant. What clearer proof could he give?

As to their disposition of the bill in sending it to the governor. He is the person to whom, under the absolute veto power, they were obliged to send all bills. He received them. If he approved of them, he signed them and handed them over to the secretary for safe-keeping. When the legislature found themselves suddenly in possession of a new power of legislation, they found, after the passage of the bill, that there was no legislation as to where it should be sent. This because they never had any use for such a regulation, never before having had the power to pass bills in that way. They had been in the habit of sending all their bills to the governor. It is well known that our laws are mainly copied from the laws of California. In that state the rule, after the passage of a bill over the governor's veto, is to send the bill again to the governor, who is to deposit it with the secretary of state. Defendant says the journals show that the legislature appointed a special committee to carry the bill to the governor and deposit it with him. Yet defendant says in his brief that because the legislature sent the bill to the governor in this way they evidently did not intend that the act should become a law. For what purpose, then, did they appoint a special committee to carry this act to the head of the executive department of the territory? The clause in section 1842 of the Revised Statute, as to passing laws over the veto of the governor, is copied from the provision in the constitution of the United States relating to passing laws over the veto of the president. I do not find any provision in the acts of congress prescribing what shall be done with a bill after it is passed over the veto of the president; but I apprehend that if the legislative department of government, in transmitting its laws to the executive department, should send a special committee to the head of the executive department, instead of to a secretary of his department, it would not be considered as irregular, nor as invalidating the act.

There is no mode prescribed in Arizona territory for authenticating statutes passed notwithstanding the objections of the governor. Neither do I find any in the laws of the United States concerning a bill passed over the veto of the president. I find the United States Statutes at Large are printed without any certificate from anybody in the printed copy of laws stating that they are correct copies of the law. There is an act of August 8, 1846, declaring that a certain edition of the laws printed by Little & Brown is declared complete evidence of the laws, without any further proof or authentication thereof. On April 9, 1866, congress passed an act on civil rights. It was vetoed by the president. It was passed over his veto. Under section 7 of article 1 of the constitution, it was required that the vote in such cases should be taken by ayes and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill should be entered on the journal of each house respectively. In the attestation of the passage of the bill over the veto, it is not stated that the constitutional provisions were complied with as to entering the veto on the journals, nor was it stated that the vote was taken by ayes and nays. The same section of the constitution requires that the objection of the president should be entered at large in the journal, yet it is not stated that this was done. Yet the proof of the mere fact of its having received the two-thirds vote is declared by congress to be sufficient to establish the law. Therefore, the plaintiff in this case could not have been required to prove compliance with the requirements as to entry of objections, nor that the vote was by ayes and nays, nor that entry thereof was made in the journal, even if the validity of the law had been regularly put in issue; much less is he required to establish it when there has been no issue raised on the subject. The pleadings in this case did not raise the issue. It is true such does not seem to have been the understanding of the pleaders, but the question as to what issues are raised by the pleadings is to be determined by the established rules of pleading, and not by the understanding or intent of the pleader. The court has no power to submit this question to be tried by a jury as an ordinary question of fact. Section 153 of our Compiled Laws says issues are of two kinds, of law and of fact. Section 154 says an issue of law arises by demurrer. It cannot, then, be raised by an answer.

Section 156: "An issue of law shall be tried by the court, unless it be referred upon consent, as provided in this chapter." The matter as to reference is settled in the section on pages 413 and 414, Comp. Laws. The trial of an issue of law may be referred. The parties must agree to the reference, and their agreement be filed or entered in the minutes. The reference shall not consist of more than three persons. The existence or non-existence of the statute in this case was a question of law. It was tried by the court sitting as a jury. Properly it could be tried only by the court or by a reference agreed upon by the parties. Therefore the whole matter of trying it by a jury in the ordinary way was irregular, even if the issue had been raised on the pleadings. A multo fortiori, was it error when there was no such question raised? It is seen here how easily this issue could have been fully tried. If the existence of the statute were denied, and the issue properly raised as one of law, it could have been tried by the court or by a reference of three persons. The court or the referees would, as Dwarries says, have informed themselves on the matter in the best way they could, and have determined the matter accordingly. But, even if this mode would have been adopted, the conclusion of law from the admitted facts of the case was error.

The substantial facts, viz., the intention of the bill, original passage, veto, and subsequent passage by a two-thirds vote, were all proved, and that was sufficient to prove the existence of the statute. To say that, because the act itself cannot be found in the secretary's office, it cannot therefore be proved in any way, is to say that the will of the people, solemnly enacted in the form of law, may be entirely defeated by any one who chooses to abstract the roll of the statute from the secretary's office; but I call attention again to the language quoted in Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 275: "God forbid that the will of the people should be thwarted in that way." If such a case arises, the authorities are that the judges will inform themselves of the existence of the statute and its contents, as Dwarries says, in the best way they can. The cases cited in 30 Cal., and relied upon by defendant, are where parties undertook to contradict the actual official record of the law, but in this case there was no attempt to contradict a record. It was claimed the act was lost, and the effort was simply to prove what the record contained. The issue was not raised on the pleadings, but the plaintiff voluntarily furnished proofs of all the essentials of the statute, the substantial facts of its passage, and what it contained. Clearly, under all the rules, he was entitled to do this, even when fairly put on proofs. He furnished the strongest, most indubitable proof,—the admission of the defendant himself, reduced to writing, and filed in the case. He therefore proved the existence of the statute. A statute is the will of the people, just as a certain document may be the will of a deceased person. But neither the paper nor the writing thereon, in either case, constitutes the "will" spoken of. The words are but the symbols used to convey the will of others, —to show what the will is. The contents of a lost will may be proven. So may the contents of a lost statute. The fact of loss, it may be said, must be first established. Not necessarily. That is a ground of objection to the evidence, but if the objection is not made, and the evidence is admitted, it stands. No objection was made in this case. On the contrary, the fact of loss was set up by the defendant himself, and he there admitted the contents of the instrument and its execution; that is, in this case, certain facts as to its execution, which facts in law are sufficient to establish its execution.

The decision in this case does not extend beyond the parties. It does not bind the people in any other case. If another case arises, the question can be raised again. The decision of the supreme court is the law only of the case in which it is rendered. If the defendant here has admitted more than can be proven in another case, or than could have been proven in this case, it is his own affair. Each case stands on its own merits. It is true, parties cannot stipulate that, as a matter of fact, a certain law exists. Neither can they deny that it exists as a fact, because the existence or non-existence of a statute is not a question of fact, but a question of law. The parties in this case did not stipulate as to what the law was. That is the very thing the defendant would not admit, — that this law did exist. He was willing to admit certain things were done. Whether because he was satisfied they could easily be proven or because he knew himself what they were in fact does not matter. He admitted the facts, but he denied utterly that therefore there was a law. But these facts which he admitted show that the law does exist. I am therefore of opinion (1) that on the whole of the 12th of February, 1875, and up to the 18th day of that month, the legislature of the territory of Arizona had power to pass laws, notwithstanding the objections of the governor; (2) that the existence of the law authorizing the election held in this case was not called in question in this case, nor its effect and purpose, as claimed by plaintiff; (3) that nevertheless, though not required to do so, plaintiff showed facts sufficient to establish the existence of the statute and its contents, sufficient to govern this case; (4) that he showed a right to the office under the law; (5) that therefore the decision of the court below, denying his right to the office, should be reversed.

TORTS OF MINOR—LIABILITY OF FATHER.

A father is never liable for the wrongful acts of his minor son unless the acts are committed with the father's consent or in connection with the father's business.

Error from district court, Brown county; R. C. BASSETT, Judge.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Brown county by Susan E. Smith and her husband, Joseph Smith, against A. G. Davenport, for personal injuries sustained by Mrs. Smith in consequence of the acts of Albert Davenport, a minor son of the defendant, 11 years old, in riding over her with a horse. The case was tried before the court and a jury, and at the close of the plaintiffs' evidence the defendant demurred thereto upon the ground that it did not prove any cause of action, and the court sustained the demurrer and rendered judgment for costs in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiffs; and the plaintiffs, as plaintiffs in error, bring the case to this court. The facts of this case, stated briefly, are substantially as follows: On September 18, 1885, in the afternoon, the defendant directed his son, Albert, to hunt for a colt that had strayed away from their premises. The boy procured a pony mare belonging to Mr. Cochran that was kept on the premises, and proceeded to hunt for the colt, but not finding it, he returned that same afternoon about sundown. The mare was then led by the hired man, and in about one half hour afterwards the boy went on foot to the house of Mr. E. D. Lacroix, about half a mile distant, to inquire concerning La Croix's health. About the same time a little brother of Albert's, about eight years old, named Byron, and another little boy, named Johnny Nelson, who was about nine years old, rode Mr. Cochran's pony mare to Mr. Lacroix's house. Albert went to the house and made his inquiry. The other two boys with the mare remained at the gate. They then came inside of the inclosure between the house and the gate. They then got off the mare and Albert got on and rode it upon a "lope" towards the gate, and arriving near the gate the pony changed its course and ran back, and in doing so ran against and over Mrs. Smith and injured her; and then the mare changed its course again and ran towards the gate, and getting near the gate it stopped suddenly and threw the boy off and over its head. Albert was not sent to Mr. Lacroix's house by his father. These are substantially all the material facts in the case.

We shall assume, for the purposes of this case, that Albert Davenport committed an actionable tort, for which he himself was liable; for infants as well as others are liable for all the injuries to either person or to property which they themselves wrongfully commit. 10 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 668. But the question arises, was the father, A. G. Davenport, liable for the wrongful acts of his son? This question must be answered in the negative. Edwards v. Crume, 13 Kan. 348, 350, and cases there cited; Baker v. Morris, 33 Kan. 580, 7 Pac. Rep. 267. A father is never liable for the wrongful acts of his minor son unless the acts are committed with the father's consent or in connection with the father's business. In the present case, the son was not performing any act for his father; he was not directed by his father to go to Lacroix's house; it does not appear that he was even there with his father's knowledge; and what he did had no connection with his father's business. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

APPEAL—PRESUMPTION—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where the record is silent as to the time of filing a motion for a new trial, and it appears that such motion was not considered until more than two months after the verdict and judgment were rendered, and no reason is assigned for such delay, it will be presumed by this court, for the purpose of upholding the judgment of the district court, that the motion was not made within the statutory time, and that the court committed no error in overruling such motion. *Hover v. Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Allen county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

Knight & Foust, for plaintiff in error. G. A. Amos and W. A. Choquill, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. The record of this case discloses the fact that a trial was had in the district court of Allen county on the 8th day of November, 1886, and on the same day the jury returned into court with a verdict for the plaintiff below. A judgment was accordingly rendered thereon. On the 26th day of January, 1887, the court considered a motion for a new trial and overruled the same. The record is silent as to when this motion was filed. The affidavits used upon the hearing were filed on the same day the motion was heard.

As it does not appear from the record that the motion was filed within the statutory time, and no reason is assigned for the delay, it will be presumed by this court, for the purpose of upholding the verdict and judgment of the district court, that the motion was not filed within the time required by section 308 of the Code. Bartlett v. Feeney, 11 Kan. 593; Nesbit v. Hines, 17 Kan. 316; Lucas v. Sturr, 21 Kan. 480; Hover v. Tenney, 27 Kan. 133. The judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

HORTON, C. J. On the 21st day of June, 1886, James Hite commenced his action against Joseph Stimmell before a justice of the peace of Brown county to recover the possession of two steers, of the value of $63. The defendant obtained judgment before the justice of the peace, and the plaintiff appealed to the district court. The case was tried before the court with a jury at the November term of the court for 1886, but the jury having disagreed the case was continued. A second trial was had at the February term of the court with a jury for 1887. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant. Judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff excepted and brings the case here. The petition in error was filed in this court on January 25, 1888. The defendant has filed a motion to dismiss the proceedings in error upon the ground that since the filing of the case in this court the jurisdiction of this court in cases of error has been abridged by the Laws of 1889, c. 245, § 1. (Gen. St. 1889, par. 4642.) That statute reads: "No appeal or proceedings in error shall be had or taken to the supreme court in any civil action unless the amount or value in controversy, exclusive of costs, shall exceed one hundred dollars, ($100.) except in cases involving the tax or revenue laws, or the title to real estate, or an action for damages in which slander, libel, malicious prosecution, or false imprisonment is declared upon, or the constitution of this state, or the constitution laws, or treaties of the United States, and when the judge of the district or superior court trying the case involving less than one hundred dollars ($100) shall certify to the supreme court that the case is one belonging to the excepted classes." Under this statute it is claimed that this court has no jurisdiction, because the amount or value in controversy, exclusive of costs, is less than $100. This proceeding in error was brought to this court before this statute was enacted.

The statute does not deprive the court of jurisdiction of cases already pending in the court, but provides that after the passage of the act no appeal or proceedings in error shall be had or taken to the supreme court in any civil action unless the amount or value in controversy, exclusive of costs, exceeds $100, with certain exceptions. "It is in general true," say the books, "that no statute is to have a retrospect beyond the time of its commencement." Again, appeals or proceedings in error are to be favored. It is quite clear, therefore, that this court has jurisdiction to pronounce judgment in all cases pending in this court at the time the statute was adopted, but no jurisdiction to hear or determine cases prohibited by the statute of 1889 from being taken to this court after that statute went into force. In the case of Ex parte McCordle, 7 Wall. 506, to which we are referred, we find, upon examination, that the federal statute affirming the appellate jurisdiction of the United States supreme court in cases of that class was expressly repealed. After the repeal that court had no jurisdiction of the case then pending before it. When the jurisdiction of a cause depends upon the statute, the repeal of the statute takes away the jurisdiction. Insurance Co. v. Richie, 5 Wall. 541. That case is unlike this. The motion to dismiss will be overruled.

Upon the trial Joseph Stimmell was asked on cross-examination, after testifying that he had taken several parties to the herd to see the cattle in dispute, this question: "Question. Why did you take those parties there to identify the cattle? Answer. Simply because I wanted to be perfectly sure that they were mine, and to substantiate the evidence if I had to go into controversy with Jim Hite, because—well, I say that I took those witnesses there to identify those cattle in case he and I should ever have to have trouble with those cattle." This was an answer to the question, and all the witness was asked for; but, taking advantage of the situation, he testified further before the jury as follows: "I was told that Jim Hite was a man that had trouble with everybody that he had anything to do with; that he had taken cattle that belonged to other parties; and one man in particular told me that he knew that Jim Hite had at one time a steer that belonged to him, but he had no evidence to prove it, and he had just simply let him go." The plaintiff moved to have that part of the answer of defendant which was merely hearsay evidence stricken out. This motion the court overruled. The plaintiff excepted.

The evidence which was asked to be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury was incompetent, irrelevant, and hearsay; therefore the trial court committed error in overruling the motion of plaintiff. Muscott v. Hanna, 26 Kan. 770; 1 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) § 99. The evidence was prejudicial, and may have influenced the jury in its verdict. The court's attention was expressly called to the matter, and there seems to be no excuse for its refusal to rule out such hearsay statements. Again, W. F. Lewis, a witness called for the defendant, was permitted to testify as follows: "Question. I will ask you, were you present at the trial before the justice? Answer. I was. Q. Did you see either of the cattle there, produced before the jury? A. Yes; saw the two. But the one that I noticed mostly was that with the white stripe on his side. Q. You may state who you say they belonged to. A. I say they belonged to Mr. Stimmell. Q. Whose cattle are they? A. I think they are Mr. Stimmell's." This evidence was objected to by plaintiff. Other witnesses were permitted to testify in a like manner over the objections of the plaintiff. This evidence was incompetent. Simpson v. Smith, 27 Kan. 565. It was said in that case that "it is seldom competent to prove a fact by a simple assertion of the fact itself; and this is especially true where the fact is of a complex character, and is the principal, if not the only, ground of contention in the case. * * * As a general rule, only such facts can be testified to directly by the witness as are comparatively simple, primary, and elementary, and such only as come within the direct and immediate cognition of his senses. The witness should generally be directed to state what he has seen, heard, etc., and then he should state the same in detail, and not attempt to give it in the aggregate. Now, ownership of property is not one of such simple, primary, and elementary facts as come within the direct and immediate cognition of the witness' senses. On the contrary, it is one of that class of complex facts which can only be conceived in thought or realized in consciousness as a combination of a variety of constituent facts, or as an intangible inference or mere conclusion drawn from a variety of other facts more simple and less complicated in their nature." In the present case the principal fact to be proved was whether the plaintiff owned the steers in controversy. If he owned them he was entitled to recover. If he did not own them he was not entitled to recover. It was simply this question of ownership and nothing else which the jury were impeded to try. It was therefore incompetent to permit witnesses to testify simply as to ownership. Other alleged errors are discussed in the briefs, but as they are not very material one way or the other we shall not comment thereon. It is perhaps unfortunate that we are compelled to grant another trial in this case, but as the plain and ordinary rules of evidence were flagrantly violated upon the trial, and as exceptions were properly taken by the plaintiff, we cannot avoid the duty imposed upon us. The judgment of the district court will be reversed and cause remanded. All the justices concurring.

DOUGLASS v. ANTHONY.

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—MOTION.

1. Where a motion for a new trial is filed in the district court four days after the verdict of the jury was rendered, without any showing being made that the party filing the same was unavoidably prevented from filing it sooner, no ground for the new trial except that of newly-discovered evidence can be considered; and this, although the action is one of forcible entry and detainer, commenced in a justice's court, and certified by the justice to the district court.

2. On a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, where the newly-discovered evidence is merely cumulative, and the trial court overrules the motion, and there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict, held, that the supreme court cannot say that there was any material error in the ruling.

Error from district court, Leavenworth county; ROBERT CROZIER, Judge.

Lucien Baker, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action of forcible entry and detainer, commenced by John C. Douglass on July 16, 1884, before a justice of the peace of Leavenworth county, against D. R. Anthony, to recover the possession of lots Nos. 9, 10, and 11, in block 17, in Leavenworth city proper. The de-defendant filed an affidavit with the justice of the peace showing that the title to the property in controversy was in dispute, and the justice certified the case to the district court, where two trials were had before the court and a jury, each resulting in a verdict. The first verdict was rendered in September, 1885, and gave one lot to the plaintiff, and two lots to the defendant; but, both parties being dissatisfied, the verdict was set aside, and a new trial granted. The second verdict was rendered April 27, 1886, and gave all the property to the defendant, and judgment was rendered accordingly; and the plaintiff, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court for review.

One of the questions litigated in the court below was whether the plaintiff's cause of action, if he ever had any, was not barred by the two-years statute of limitations, (Civil Code, § 16, subd. 5.) On the last trial, and probably on the first, evidence was introduced showing that the defendant had taken the possession of the property more than two years before the commencement of the action; and the jury on the last trial not only found generally in favor of the defendant, and against the plaintiff, but also found specifically that the defendant had taken the possession of the property more than two years before the commencement of the action. The verdict was rendered and the findings made on April 27, 1886, and four days thereafter the defendant filed a motion for a new trial, including various grounds; but, as no showing was made that he was unavoidably prevented from filing it sooner, (Civil Code, § 308,) the only ground for the new trial considered by the court was the one of newly-discovered evidence. Upon the hearing of this motion, a vast amount of evidence was introduced on both sides; but it was all, so far as it was material, merely cumulative, tending to show, on the one side, that the defendant had taken the possession of the property prior to July 16, 1882, and, on the other side, that he had not taken the possession of the property until after that time. The court overruled the motion, and we cannot now say that such ruling was erroneous. Even if all the evidence that the plaintiff introduced on the hearing of the motion had been introduced on the trial, the verdict of the jury might have been, and perhaps would have been, precisely the same as it was, and for the defendant; and then, if it had been sustained by the trial court, as the verdict as rendered was actually sustained by the trial court, after the trial court had heard all the evidence that was introduced on both the trial and the motion, we could not grant a new trial.

The plaintiff claims that he was misled and deceived by the manner in which the case was conducted and tried on the part of the defendant; but we do not think that the record discloses anything from which he should have been misled or deceived, and certainly not to an extent that would authorize him to obtain a new trial. What the pleadings were, except the plaintiff's complaint, is not shown. It would seem, however, from the trial of the case, that the principal question involved in the case was this: When did the defendant first take the possession of the property in controversy? Was it more or less than two years before the commencement of this action? Was it before July 16, 1882, or not? On the trial, the court stated the question thus: "I suppose the crucial question is when he [the defendant] took possession; and that depends upon what he did." What the evidence was on the first trial is not shown, and why the plaintiff did not file his motion for a new trial within three days after the rendering of the verdict is not shown; and certainly, upon the record as brought to this court, we cannot say that any material error was committed by the trial court. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

TOPEKA CITY RY. CO. v. ROBERTS, County Treasurer.

ASSESSMENT OF TAXES—INJUNCTION.

After the property of a tax-payer had been listed, valued, and assessed, and the taxes levied thereon had been paid, the county commissioners determined that there had been an undervaluation of the property, and directed the county clerk to enter an additional valuation on the property, and to charge additional taxes thereon, which was done without notice. When the tax-payer learned what had been done, he appeared before the board, and asked to have the assessment and taxes canceled and set aside. Held, that the taxes so charged were void, and that the owner of the property can maintain injunction to restrain the collection of the illegal taxes, although he first applied to the county board to cancel and set aside the same, and although he did not appeal from the adverse decision of the board.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an action to enjoin the collection of certain taxes alleged to have been illegally charged against the property of the plaintiff by the county clerk of Shawnee county. It appears that the Topeka City Railway Company was engaged in business in the city of Topeka in 1885, and had property subject to taxation for that year. On the 1st day of June, 1885, Joab Mulvane, the president of the company, made a statement to the assessor of the company's personal property subject to taxation for that year, which statement the assessor accepted, and returned the valuation of the company's property to the county clerk as the same had been returned by the company in the statement aforesaid, which return the assessor duly certified under oath. Subsequently the county board of equalization met and equalized the property of the county, but they did not change the valuation of the property listed and returned as aforesaid. The county clerk placed upon the tax-roll of the county for that year the valuation so returned, and charged against the company a due proportion of all the taxes for that year, and afterwards the company in due time paid to the county treasurer the full amount of all the taxes charged against it. Subsequently, a special agent of the county, who had been appointed to search for property subject to and which had escaped taxation, or which had been taxed at less than its true value, made a report that the company had omitted in its statement made to the assessor $25,395 of its personal property subject to taxation for 1885, by making an undervaluation thereof. On February 6, 1886, the board of county commissioners made an order directing the county clerk to place upon the tax-roll of the county a valuation of $25,395 opposite the name of the company as an additional assessment on the plaintiff's property, and to charge taxes thereon for that year to the amount of $1,086.86, which was done. No notice in writing of the proceedings by the special agent or the board of county commissioners or county clerk, in correcting the assessor's return, and in entering an increased valuation of the company's property on the tax-roll, was given to plaintiff until the proceedings had been taken, nor until February 27, 1886, when the president of the company received, through the post-office, a postal-card from the county treasurer, stating that additional taxes had been charged against the company. On March 13, 1886, the president of the company attended a meeting of the board of county commissioners, and made a statement under oath, and advanced arguments to the board, to obtain an order for the cancellation and setting aside of the additional assessments and charges, and for an order to the county clerk to strike the same from the tax-roll. Subsequently the board reduced the charge of taxes against the plaintiff from $1,086.86 to the amount of $272.20. The county treasurer was about to collect the taxes charged, when this proceeding was brought to restrain him.

The only authority for the increase of the valuation, and for the additional taxes charged against the company, was under section 70 of chapter 34 of the Laws of 1876. This statute, however, provides that no change or correction shall be made until notice has been given. No notice or opportunity to be heard was given to the company before the increased valuation and additional tax were entered and charged against the company on the tax-roll, and the action of the board and the clerk in entering and charging the same was clearly invalid, and the tax sought to be collected by the treasurer is wholly void. The invalidity of their action is conceded, but it is claimed that the appearance and action of the company before the board on March 13, 1886, waived the notice and cured the invalidity of the levy. We do not agree with this contention. The appearance at that time was for the sole purpose of inducing the board to order the clerk to strike from the tax-roll and to cancel and set aside the illegal assessment and charges that had been made and entered against the company. The right of the county clerk or commissioners to proceed at that time under section 70 of the tax-law to correct the assessment of the company was not conceded, nor did the findings show that the company waived the want of notice. The facts and proceedings in this case are very similar to those in Commissioners v. Lang, 8 Kan. 284. There, the board attempted to increase the valuation of Lang's property without giving the notice required by law. After Lang learned of the increase, he went before the board, and moved to have the error corrected, as was done by the city railway company in the present case; but, failing in this, he sued out an injunction to stop the collection of the additional tax sought to be charged against him. Chief Justice KINGMAN, who delivered the opinion of the court, held that the board was not authorized to proceed without notice, and that "their action in the premises was clearly invalid. Defendant, when he learned of the action of the board in December, moved the board to correct their error. Failing there, he paid the taxes he was justly chargeable with, and obtained an injunction to stop the collection of the illegal portion of the tax. This he was entitled to." See, also, Griffith v. Watson, 19 Kan. 27; Commissioners v. Sergeant, 24 Kan. 572. These authorities settle the question that the tax-payer is entitled to the remedy of injunction, although he may have first asked the board to cancel and set aside the illegal assessment and levy made against him, and although he may not have appealed from the decision of the commissioners refusing to cancel and set aside such illegal assessment and charge. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of the plaintiff in error. All the justices concurring.

TOPEKA WATER-SUPPLY CO. v. ROBERTS, County Treasurer.

ASSESSMENT OF TAXES—INJUNCTION.

1. An arbitrary increase of the valuation of property, and the extension of an additional tax thereon by the county clerk after the assessment had been returned, without notice to the owner of such action, is unauthorized, and the taxes charged illegal.

2. The owner is entitled to maintain injunction to restrain the illegal tax, and the fact that the owner first applied to the county officers to cancel and set aside the illegal tax, and failed to appeal from their refusal, will not defeat the remedy. Railway Co. v. Roberts, 45 Kan. —, ante, 854.

Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

J. D. McFarland, for plaintiff in error.
Bergen, Welch & Welch, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. Action of injunction. After the property of the Topeka Water-Supply Company had been assessed for the year 1885, and the taxes thereon had been levied and paid, the county clerk of the county in which the property was situated, and in February, 1886, entered on the tax-roll, opposite the name of the company, the sum of $7,769, as an additional assessment of its capital stock for the year 1885, and charged taxes thereon to the amount of $268.03. A special agent, appointed by the county to look up property that had escaped taxation for the year 1885, reported to the board, in January, 1886, that the company had not listed its property at its true value, and recommended the increased valuation and the additional levy of taxes that have been mentioned. On this report alone the board acted, without notice to the company of any proceeding or intended proceeding to correct the assessment and to increase the taxes. No statement of any facts or evidence upon which the increased valuation was based was ever filed and kept in the office of the county clerk, except the report and recommendation of the special agent. Afterwards, the company was notified by the county treasurer that there were additional taxes charged against the company, and thereupon an application was made by the company to cancel and strike from the tax-roll the additional assessment and charges which had been entered, but the application was denied. The action of the county board and county clerk in correcting and changing the valuation and imposing additional taxes upon the company, without notice or opportunity to be heard before the increase in valuation and additional charges were made, is unauthorized, and the tax levied illegal. Injunction to restrain the collection of the illegal tax may be maintained; and the fact that the company first applied to the county officers to cancel and set aside the illegal tax, and that it failed to appeal from the refusal, will not defeat the remedy. The facts in this case are quite similar to those of Railway Co. v. Roberts, ante, 854, (just decided,) and the decision therein is controlling here. See, also, Commissioners v. Lang, 8 Kan. 284; Griffith v. Watson, 19 Kan. 27; Commissioners v. Sergeant, 24 Kan. 572; Gen. St. 1889, par. 6918. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of the plaintiff in error. All the justices concurring.

RENNICK v. BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF LYON COUNTY.

LOCATING HIGHWAYS—DAMAGES—APPEAL.

In awarding damages for the location of a county-line road, each board of county commissioners of the respective counties between which the road is to be laid out acts separately, and an appeal from the award made by either board must be taken within 30 days after the order appealed from is made, regardless of the time when final action is taken by the other board.

Error from district court, Lyon county; CHARLES B. GRAVES, Judge.

E. H. Sanford, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Feighan, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an appeal from an award of damages, made by the board of county commissioners of Lyon county, for the location of a county-line road over appellant's land. On the 15th of October, 1886, the board of county commissioners aforesaid, upon a report of viewers who had been duly appointed, proceeded to and did establish the road, so far as that board could. In establishing the road, it was necessary to appropriate to public use several acres of land belonging to Josie P. Rennick, for which the board awarded damages to the amount of $30. The order and the award were made by the Lyon county board on October 15, 1886; and the action of the Wabaunsee county board, on the part of the road located in that county, was not taken until January 5, 1887. Josie P. Rennick, feeling aggrieved by the award of damages allowed by the Lyon county board, appealed to the district court of Lyon county on January 25, 1887, —more than 90 days after the order appealed from was made. A motion to dismiss the appeal because it was not taken within 30 days—the time allowed by the statute—was made and sustained. This ruling is assigned for error.

The motion was properly decided, as the plaintiff in error was too late in taking her appeal. She was not entitled to 30 days after the final action was taken by the board of county commissioners of Wabaunsee county. In establishing county-line roads, each board acts separately. While the concurrent action of both is necessary to the establishment of the road, each is to determine for itself the amount of damages that shall be allowed for the land taken in the county for which it acts; and the order of award is to be entered on its journal. If any one is aggrieved by the award of damages made by either board, he may appeal from its award to the district court of the county in which the land taken is situate, and for which the county board is acting. The appeal is from the award of damages, and not from the order establishing the road, and it must be taken within 30 days from the time the award appealed from is made. Gen. St. 1889, pars. 5480–5483. The appeal-bond was filed and the appeal taken 20 days after the action of the Wabaunsee county board was taken; but the appeal was not from the order or award of that board, nor to the district court of that county. It was taken from the order of the Lyon county board, which was made more than 90 days prior to the time of taking the appeal. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

ACTION ON ACCOUNT—VERIFICATION—SET-OFF—APPEAL FROM JUSTICE COURT.

1. The correctness of an account filed before a justice of the peace, duly verified by the affidavit or affirmation of the party, his agent or attorney, shall be taken as true, unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the opposite party, his agent or attorney. Section 84, Justices' Act.

2. A defendant in an action brought against him upon an account, duly verified, before a justice of the peace, has the right in the justice court, and also upon appeal in the district court, to introduce evidence to prove any set-off or counter-claim which he may have against the plaintiff, although he has not denied the correctness of the account sued on by affidavit.

3. Where, in an action before a justice of the peace, both the plaintiff and defendant file their bills of particulars or accounts, and the case is subsequently appealed to the district court and a trial is commenced in that court before a jury, upon the original papers on which the case was tried before the justice of the peace, amendments to the pleadings at that time by either party is largely in the discretion of the trial court. This court will not interfere, unless that discretion has been abused.

Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

J. J. Hitt, for plaintiff in error. Jetmore & Son, for defendant in error.

HORTON, J. This was an action commenced on December 13, 1886, before a justice of the peace of Topeka, by Lydia Nichols, then in life, against Joel Baughman, on an account for rent, etc., the correctness of which was verified by her affidavit. At her request the justice of the peace ordered the defendant to file his bill of particulars, which was done. Mrs. Nichols, on leave of court, filed an amended bill of particulars on an account, the correctness of which she also verified by affidavit, wherein she claimed $204.70. These were the pleadings. The case was tried before the justice of the peace on January 4, 1887, and resulted in a judgment in favor of Mrs. Nichols. Baughman appealed to the district court. The case was tried in the district court, with a jury, on October 5, 1887, on the pleadings filed with the justice. When the case was called for trial in the district court Mrs. Nichols offered her bill of particulars in evidence, rested her case, and asked for judgment. Baughman then asked permission to file his affidavit, denying the correctness of the plaintiff's bill of particulars. The court refused, to which ruling he excepted. Baughman then asked permission to file an amended or additional bill of particulars. This was refused, and thereupon he withdrew his bill of particulars or set-off. This proceeding was filed in this court on March 1, 1888, and since that time Mrs. Nichols has died. The action has been revived in the name of George D. Hale, the administrator of her estate. Counsel for Baughman says "that the rulings of the district court deprived him of all hearing; that, even admitting the truth of the account of Mrs. Nichols, would that prevent the account of the plaintiff in error also from being correct? They can both be true, which in part is true in this case. A portion of the accounts of each party is correct, due, and owing by one party to the other, and it only awaits an adjudication and settlement of the disputed items of each side to settle the whole matter in dispute. But the action of the trial court in refusing the filing of the affidavit, denying the validity of plaintiff's claim, and in refusing the introduction of any evidence in the case, was a denial of that justice courts are established to maintain, and was an error that this court ought to correct." The petition in error contains the following specific allegations of error only: "(1) The court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff in error to file his affidavit denying the correctness of the claim of the defendant in error. (2) The court erred in refusing to permit the plaintiff in error to file his amended and additional set-off when requested. (3) The court erred in the exercise of his judicial discretion in the trial of said cause, whereby plaintiff in error was prevented from having a fair and impartial trial. (4) The court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial."

In Railway Co. v. Gould, 44 Kan. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 352, this court decided that, "where a claim or demand for money arises out of contract, either express or implied, and is for something furnished or performed by one party for another, but is not founded upon a promissory note or other instrument in writing, and a statement of such claim or demand is made out in detail and in writing by the claimant or demandant, and presented to the other party, such statement constitutes an account, within the meaning of section 84 of the justices' act, and section 108 of the Civil Code." Under the provisions of said section 84 of the justices' act, the correctness of an account, duly verified by the affidavit of a party, his agent or attorney, is taken as true, unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the opposite party, his agent or attorney. The opinion in Railway Co. v. Gould, supra, further stated that a defendant had the right, under said section 84, in both the justice's court and the district court, to introduce evidence to prove any set-off or counter-claim which he had, without any affidavit denying the correctness of a plaintiff's account. Therefore, if Baughman simply desired to prove his bill of particulars or set-off, which he had filed, it was not necessary for him to file any affidavit denying the correctness of Mrs. Nichols' account. In this view, the court committed no error in refusing to permit him to file the affidavit which he requested. If Baughman desired to dispute the items in the bill of particulars of Mrs. Nichols, he ought not to have delayed his motion until after the jury had been impaneled and the plaintiff had submitted her case. The statute provides that the case shall be tried de novo in the district court, upon the original papers on which the cause was brought before the justice, unless the appellate court, in furtherance of justice, allow amended pleadings to be made, or new pleadings to be filed. Section 122, Justices' Act. The matter of amending the pleadings after a trial is commenced is largely within the discretion of the trial court, with which we cannot interfere, unless that discretion has been abused. Taylor v. Clendinning, 4 Kan. 525; Robbins v. Sackett, 23 Kan. 301; Map Co. v. Jones, 27 Kan. 177-180. If the bill of particulars of plaintiff below was not correct, Baughman must have known it before the trial. The trial before the justice of the peace was several months prior to the trial in the district court, and nothing is shown by the record of any surprise. The pleadings in the district court were the same as the pleadings before the justice of the peace. Under the circumstances, we cannot say there was any abuse of judicial discretion upon the part of the trial court in refusing to permit the verified affidavit to be filed after the commencement of the trial. There is no showing or statement contained in the record that Baughman had any further offset, and, as he made no motion to amend his bill of particulars or set-off until after the commencement of the trial, the refusal to amend, without any other showing, was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. We are referred to the case of Chinberg v. Manufacturing Co., 38 Kan. 228, 16 Pac. Rep. 462, as decisive against the ruling of the trial court. In that case, Chinberg had paid, as he supposed, the note sued upon. Only a copy of the note was contained in the bill of particulars. He expected to prove payment, nothing else. He had in his possession the note, and, as he supposed, the original note, and therefore was surprised upon the trial when it was claimed that he had paid a forged note. Under such circumstances, we held that he should have been permitted to deny, under oath, the execution of the note sued on, so that the question whether the note sued on was a forgery, or the note paid was a forgery, could be submitted to the jury. In the Chinberg case there was surprise at the claim of the manufacturing company that a copy or forged note had been paid, but not the original note. All this came up on the trial, and therefore the application to deny the execution of the note could not have been intelligently made at any prior time. If a party, through his own laches, fails to make a motion to amend, or correct his pleadings, until after the trial of the case has actually commenced before a jury, he cannot complain if the court, in its discretion, refuses to permit the issues to be changed. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

TOWNSHIPS—TAXATION FOR ROAD PURPOSES.

Under paragraph 7084, Gen. St. 1889, township trustees are authorized, with the advice and consent of the board of county commissioners of their respective counties, to levy a tax for township, road, and other purposes; and the fact that such taxes are set out and extended upon the tax-roll in detail, as so many mills for road purposes and so many mills for township bridge purposes, instead of grouping the tax together under the single head, "For Road Purposes," is not such an irregularity as will invalidate the tax, so long as the amount levied is not in excess of that authorized by law.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Cherokee county; Hon. GEORGE CHANDLER, Judge.

Wallace Pratt and Charles W. Blair, for plaintiff in error. H. G. Webb and C. D. Ashley, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. The plaintiffs in error filed their petition in the district court of Cherokee county, praying for a temporary and permanent injunction to prevent the collection of a tax levied on the railroads of the plaintiffs in error, in certain townships in said county, by the township trustees, with the concurrence of the board of county commissioners, for township bridge purposes. To this petition a demurrer was interposed, which was sustained by the court. The plaintiffs excepted to the ruling of the court, and stood upon their petition, and judgment was rendered against them for costs. To reverse the ruling and judgment of the court below, this proceeding in error is prosecuted.

The record shows a waiver of any question in regard to a misjoinder of parties, so the only question presented is the authority of the township trustees, acting with the concurrence of the board of county commissioners, to levy a separate tax for township bridge purposes. The claim is made that the township tax attempted to be levied for bridge purposes is without warrant or authority of law. The authority for such a tax levy as the one complained of is found in paragraph 7084, Gen. St. 1889, which requires that the township trustee "shall, at the July session of the board of county commissioners, annually, with the advice and concurrence of said board, levy a tax on the property in said township for township, road, and other purposes," etc. It is insisted that the levy made under this law was threefold: First, for the general revenue and expenses of the township; second, for road purposes in said township; third, for township bridge purposes in said township; and that the latter is illegal. Can the levy for township bridge purposes be upheld under the clause, "for other purposes?" The principle is fundamental that there must be legislative authority for every tax that is levied, whether state or municipal; hence we must examine the power conferred under the phrase "for other purposes," which is indeed quite broad. In defining the clause "necessary charges," Chief Justice PARKER took occasion to say, in the case of Stetson v. Kempton, 13 Mass. 272: "The proper construction of the terms must be that, in addition to the money to be raised for the poor, schools, etc., towns might raise such sums as should be necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the year; such as the payment of such municipal officers as they should be obliged to employ, the support and defense of such actions as they might be parties to, and the expenses they would incur in performing such duties as the laws imposed, as the erection of powder-houses, providing ammunition, making and repairing highways and town roads, and other things of like nature, which are necessary charges, because the effect of a legal discharge of their corporate duty. The erection of public buildings for the accommodation of the inhabitants, such as town-houses to assemble in, and market-houses for the sale of provisions, may also be a proper town charge, and may come within the fair meaning of the term 'necessary.'" It is not claimed that the phrase "other purposes," as used in the statute, would authorize every expense a township, through its officers, might incur, but, where the statutes of the state impose certain duties upon the township to build bridges and keep them in repair, that the clause "other purposes" certainly authorizes the township trustees, with the advice and concurrence of the board of county commissioners, to levy a tax for township bridge purposes. The township board, consisting of the trustee, clerk, and treasurer, constitute a board of commissioners of highways, and have charge of the roads and bridges of their respective townships, and it is made the duty of such board to keep the same in repair, and to improve the roads and bridges, so far as practicable. Chapter 168, p. 269, Sess. Laws 1885. To carry out the provisions of this statute funds must be provided, and there can be no other method devised except by taxation. It is contended by plaintiffs in error that, under the doctrine laid down in the Lawrence Bridge Case, 22 Kan. 438, bridges upon public highways are public roads, and that there are, therefore, two different levies in the same township for road purposes. Still we do not see any objection to apportioning a certain percent. of the levy to one specific purpose and another portion to another purpose, so long as the levies are within the limits authorized by law. Upon this question of apportioning the levies, in a case not unlike this, in the supreme court of Nebraska, Chief Justice LAKE, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The 'general fund' of a county, as its name implies, is one devoted to a variety of uses; and its expenditure is left mainly to the discretion of the board of county commissioners. The amount which may be raised for this fund the legislature has wisely restricted; the limitation being as we have seen, ten mills on the dollar of taxable property. Now, in the performance of the duty of determining the amount that should be raised within this limit, the commissioners must necessarily make an estimate of the probable needs of the county for the current year in the way of legitimate expenditures. Having done this, and the total rate being ascertained, suppose that, in making the levy, instead of grouping the several items together under the comprehensive head of 'General Fund,' as is usually done, and as the statute above quoted evidently contemplates, they are set forth in detail, giving the amount estimated for each, would the tax therefore be illegal? We think not, so long, at least, as no item is included not proper to be satisfied from the general fund of the county. It would be at most an informality, in no way invalidating the levy." Railroad Co. v. Lancaster Co., 12 Neb. 324, 11 N. W. Rep. 332. It is not claimed that the levies were excessive in amount; the only contention being that there was no authority to levy "a township bridge tax." We think the levy was authorized, and the doctrine has long since been settled by this court that equity will not interfere to restrain by injunction the collection of taxes, where the property is subject to taxation, the tax legal, and the valuation not excessive, simply because of irregularities in the tax proceedings. Challiss v. County of Atchison, 15 Kan. 50; Cooley, Tax'n (2d Ed.) 775. We think the demurrer was properly sustained, and recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

DAVIDSON v. BEERS et al.

ESTABLISHMENT OF DESTROYED JUDGMENT—DEFENSES.

In a proceeding under chapter 92, Laws 1883, to establish the record of a judgment destroyed by fire, a defendant in the original action, and a party to the proceeding to establish the judgment, has the right to establish the record of any judgment that he may have obtained, by parol evidence, and to plead and prove any new matter that may have occurred since the rendition of the judgment sought to be established, which operates in whole or in part to extinguish such judgment.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Dickinson county; M. B. NICHOLSON, Judge.

J. P. Campbell and Webb & Webb, for plaintiff in error. C. F. Mead and C. J. Crawford, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. The plaintiff in error, Davidson, commenced an action in the district court of Dickinson county against E. T. Pulliam, Malinda Pulliam, and Charles Beers, under chapter 92 of the Laws of 1883, to establish a judgment rendered by the district court of Dickinson county; the record of such judgment having been destroyed by fire. This law provides, in substance, that any person desiring to establish such a judgment shall file a petition containing certain averments, (the parties being the same as in the original case,) and notify the parties by personal service of summons, or by the publication of summons, and upon the trial the court may render judgment according to the fact established by the record of such destroyed judgment. Section 5 of the act provides that "the defendant may answer by general denial, or by setting forth such new matter arising subsequent to the decree, judgment, or order which operated in whole or in part to extinguish or set aside the same, or both, as the facts may warrant." To new matter the plaintiff may reply. The issues are tried to the court, who may, in addition to the evidence, refer to his own recollection, etc. Beers filed an answer, alleging, in substance, that, after the plaintiff had obtained the judgment he is seeking to establish of record, he (Beers) had obtained a judgment upon a prior mortgage, and that the land had been sold at judicial sale by the sheriff of the county. It appears from the recitations in the petition in this case that in the judgment sought to be restored there was a finding that Beers was the owner and holder of a prior mortgage on the land against which Davidson was enforcing his mortgage lien. Counsel for plaintiff in error filed a motion to strike Beers' answer from the files. This motion was overruled. The plaintiff filed a reply to the answer of Beers, and at the trial the court finds: "That on the 17th day of January, 1882, a fire destroyed the record of said judgment in this court; that subsequently the defendant Charles Beers sold said premises by virtue of an order of sale issued by the clerk of this court after said fire, on a judgment obtained prior to said fire, and without establishing his judgment of record on a prior mortgage to that of the plaintiff herein. The court finds further that the plaintiff's former judgment be modified so that he recover judgment against said defendants E. J. Pulliam and Malinda Pulliam for the amount of his judgment and costs, without having an order for the sale of said premises, or to have his former lien enforced by reason of said subsequent sale as above set forth." The proper exceptions were saved, and the cause is here for review.

Counsel for plaintiff in error insists that the trial court committed error in overruling his motion to strike the answer of Beers from the files. In his answer, Beers recites the execution of a prior mortgage by Pulliam and wife to T. C. Henry: the assignment of the same to him; that he had brought suit to foreclose it; that Davidson was a party to that action, and had full knowledge of all the proceedings therein; that Beers had obtained judgment; that on the 29th day of May, 1882, the sheriff of Dickinson county, pursuant to the order of said court, sold said premises as provided by law, and that T. C. Henry became the purchaser; and that a sheriff's deed is hereto attached, etc. Now, this answer alleges certain new matter arising subsequent to the judgment of Davidson. This new matter consists in an institution of a suit by Beers, the recovery of a judgment, an order for a sale of the premises, and the execution of a sheriff's deed. All these things occurred subsequent to the judgment of Davidson, and the judicial sale took place after the fire occurred. This answer was fully authorized by the fifth section of the act of 1883, and there was no error in the ruling of the court in this respect.

It is again insisted that the judicial sale made on the Beers judgment is void because there was no record of said judgment, and before it could be enforced it must have been established of record by proper proceedings under the act of 1883. This is the most serious question in the case. It is established by the evidence of Mahan, and the recitations contained in the order of sale, that Beers had before the fire obtained a judgment against Pulliam and wife. It also appears from the order of sale, notice of sale, and from the order confirming the sale, that Davidson was made a party in the action of Beers v. Pulliam and others, in which the judgment was rendered. All these things are matters of record in the district court of Dickinson county. We cannot accept the theory that the legislative act of 1883 is and was the only mode in which the burned contents of records could be established. We suppose that, outside of this statute, proceedings could be instituted and the records supplied. When a judgment has been ordered by the court, and the clerk has failed to enter it of record, the fact that it had been ordered must be established by some memoranda among the papers in the case, and then parol evidence is admissible to show the nature of the judgment so ordered. See a long list of cases cited in 12 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 82. If parol evidence can establish the nature of a judgment that was not made a matter of record, it seems that it ought to be admissible to show the nature of a judgment that was duly entered on the records of the court, when the record was subsequently destroyed by fire. Again, this whole proceeding, both on the part of the plaintiff in error as well as the defendant in error, is under the law of 1883. We do not understand that Beers would have to commence a separate and independent action to establish his judgment; he could do so as a defendant. We are satisfied that there is no material error in the case, and that substantial justice has been done between all the parties. We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

BY THE COURT. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

DEDICATION—EVIDENCE.

The evidence in this case reviewed, and held sufficient to support a finding that the land in question had been dedicated to the public, for use as a cemetery, by grantors of the plaintiff in error, and accepted for such use; and also held, that such dedication by the grantors of the plaintiff in error is binding upon him, especially as he purchased with knowledge of the occupancy of such ground by the public, though there was no reservation of such ground in his deed, nor in the deeds of any of his grantors.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Error from district court, Neosho county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

Cox & Stratton, for defendants in error.

STRANG, C. This action was instituted February 15, 1887, by the above-named defendants, to restrain the plaintiff from interfering with a certain grave-yard in Neosho county, known as "Valley Cemetery." A temporary injunction was allowed, and upon the trial of the case, August 1, 1887, the court found for the plaintiffs below, making the injunction perpetual. Motion for new trial was overruled. There were two questions raised in the record, one arising upon a demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, in which it was claimed there was a misjoinder, and nonjoinder of parties, and also a misjoinder of causes of action. The questions growing out of the action of the court in overruling the demurrer were abandoned by the plaintiff in error before filing his brief, as he says therein in his statement of the case: "The only question, then, to be determined by the court was as to the claim of dedication,—was there a dedication on the part of the owner of the fee, and was such dedication accepted by the public?" The question thus raised the court below answered in the affirmative. We do not see how we can reverse the action of the court in this respect. There is evidence in the case proving or tending to prove both a dedication, and acceptance thereof, for the purpose of a public cemetery. It is conceded that Jarritt, who first settled upon the quarter of land, to which the land taken for a cemetery originally belonged, dedicated at least a portion of the land, now occupied as a cemetery to the public for that purpose, so far as he could do so. He did not own the land in fee, however. He was simply a settler upon the land, which was school land, and the title in the state of Kansas. Jarritt sold his settler's right to the land to one J. A. Auton, who purchased the land of the state, and obtained a patent therefor in 1873. Jarritt settled upon the land in 1867. Auton, having obtained a patent to the land, owned it in fee, and had the power to dedicate the land for a cemetery, or for any other purpose. The public was already using said land for a cemetery, when Auton purchased Jarritt's right to the land, and, after he became the owner in fee, he recognized and ratified the dedication of the original acre for cemetery purposes. J. A. Huston in his testimony says: "I said to Auton that the plat was not large enough; that it was a matter the whole neighborhood was interested in; and he said Jarritt reserved it, and dedicated it as a burying ground." V. Reddick, a witness, testified that he worked for Auton. That Auton instructed him, in setting out the hedge for a fence, to stop when he got to the grave-yard. He says: "I was not to set any further than the grave-yard." There could hardly be any question after that but that there was a sufficient dedication of the first acre of land then used by the public for a cemetery, and no question as to its acceptance by the public for that purpose. Using the ground for the purpose of burying the dead, by the public, constituted an acceptance.

As to the additional acre, the evidence shows that the public were encroaching upon it by burying the dead beyond the limits of the original acre before Auton left the premises. He talked with the people of the neighborhood about it, and said he would sell the land to them. He never objected to the use of the ground as a place of burial for the dead. Auton sold to Clark and Ketchum. He told them there was a burying ground there, but that the land had not been paid for. The public continued to bury the dead of the neighborhood in this cemetery after Clark and Ketchum took possession of the farm. They never objected to the use of the ground for that purpose. While they were in possession there was talk of the people buying both acres of the ground occupied by the cemetery of them. At that time the land was surveyed, staked off, and platted, but the plat was never recorded, and the land was never paid for, nor did they object to its continual use as a cemetery. They sold the farm to Morris & Morris, who occupied it awhile. During their occupancy, the public used the grounds as before, without objection by them. They sold to one Guss, who held the land but a short time, and conveyed to plaintiff in error in 1886. Guss, through whom the title passed to the plaintiff in error, was the surveyor who made the survey of the cemetery land when Clark and Ketchum owned the farm. We think Clark and Ketchum dedicated the second acre to the public as a part of the grave-yard when it was surveyed and staked out, and they permitted the public to use it for burial purposes. It is true they were never paid for the land; but after they had joined in a survey of the land, and it had been staked out and thus, by them, turned over for cemetery purposes, and they sat by and saw the public using it for burial purposes, without objection, the fact that they were not paid therefor would not interfere with the dedication of the ground to the public, and as the public accepted it, and used it with their knowledge, and without any objection on their part, they would have been estopped from saying the ground was not dedicated to the public. But they never raised the question, nor did their grantees nor the successors of their grantees; nor did any one question the right of the public to use and occupy the ground as a cemetery, until the plaintiff in error purchased the land in 1886, about 20 years after the cemetery was started. We think that, whether the land was ever paid for or not, the fact that it was used, a part of it for 20 years, and all of it for many years, as a resting-place for the dead, without objection by any one of the numerous owners of the tract from which it was taken, is sufficient to vest in the public a right, superior to any that the plaintiff herein could get by purchase of said original tract with full knowledge of the existence of the cemetery when he purchased. Permission by his grantors to use and occupy the ground as a cemetery was a waiver or abandonment of their rights, which subordinated them to its use by the public, and the plaintiff, having purchased with knowledge of the occupancy of the public, is bound by it. Boyce v. Kalbaugh, 28 Amer. Rep. 464; Hagaman v. Dittmar, 24 Kan. 42; Giles v. Ortman, 11 Kan. 59; Brooks v. City of Topeka, 34 Kan. 277, 8 Pac. Rep. 392; Beatty v. Kurtz, 2 Pet. 566; *Davidson v. DEVER v. CITY OF JUNCTION CITY et al.

STREET IMPROVEMENT—INJUNCTION—PLEADING.

1. A city of the second class, having authority to improve a street, cannot be enjoined from making such improvement, by the abutting property owner, upon the ground that the work is being defectively performed.

2. Where a petition for an injunction to enjoin a city of the second class from improving a certain street therein alleges, as a ground for the order, that the character of the work is such that it will necessitate a special tax against the abutting property owners to pay therefor, and the ordinance under which the improvement is being made is attached to the petition, as a part thereof, and said ordinance does not provide for any special tax to pay for such improvements, and the petition does not allege that any such tax has been levied, nor any act done indicating that such a tax is about to be levied, held, that the petition in this respect does not state a cause of action.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Geary county; M. B. Nicholson, Judge.

STRANG, C. A temporary order of injunction was allowed in this case by the district judge of Geary county, February 23, 1888. On the 27th of the same month a motion to vacate said injunction was heard, and sustained. The plaintiff complains of the order vacating said injunction, and asks this court to reverse it. There is no pretense in this case that the defendants or either of them has or is about to appropriate any property belonging to the plaintiff. But the plaintiff alleges that the defendant city, and William Fisher, under direction of said city, is engaged in the improvement of one of the streets of said city, and that the work is being defectively performed, because of which he will suffer damage. The city has authority to improve its streets, and, possessing the power to improve them, we do not think the plaintiff can enjoin the city upon the ground that the work is being defectively performed. Plaintiff also says that the work being done by the city is of that character that will necessitate the levying of a tax against the abutting property to pay for the same, and that the city has not taken the necessary steps required to be performed, by the statutes providing for such improvements, as conditions precedent to the making of said improvements, and the assessment of a tax to pay for them, and that therefore the injunction should have been continued. No assessment has been made to pay for the work being done, and no act done that indicates the making of an assessment therefor. But, on the contrary, the ordinance which provides for the improvement, and which is made a part of the plaintiff's petition, makes no provision for any assessment against the abutting property to pay the expense of such improvement. This fact should dispel the fears of the plaintiff that any special tax is to be levied against the abutting property to pay for said improvements. It is recommended that the action of the district judge in vacating the order of injunction be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Feb. 7, 1891.)

PLEADING—DEMURRER—QUIETING TITLE—BURDEN OF PROOF—TAX-TITLES—LIMITATIONS.

1. Where a reply contains a general denial, and that certain tax-deeds are void, and a de-murrer is interposed to it, on the ground that the facts stated therein do not constitute a defense to the matters set forth in the answer, and the demurrer is not directed against the latter defense, it is not error to overrule the same.

2. Where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, a party asks to interplead and sets up title by virtue of certain tax-deeds, and alleges ownership and possession under such deeds, and asks that the title be quieted in him, it is not substantial error for the trial court to hold the burden is upon the party asking relief under the tax-deeds.

3. The plea of the statute of limitations cannot be interposed by the holder of a tax-title, to a note and mortgage not barred at the commencement of the action against the original mortgagor.

4. When the plaintiffs, in a foreclosure suit, attack certain tax-deeds, set up by a party interpleading in the case, and ask that their title be quieted, as against such tax-deeds, they should show some title in the mortgagor, to entitle them to a judgment and decree.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

R. P. Kelley, for plaintiff in error. John Marshall, for defendants in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action begun in the district court of Greenwood county, by Cowles & Eldridge against E. O. Walton, to foreclose a mortgage. The coupon notes and mortgage were executed on the 1st day of January, 1880, and matured in three years. This action was commenced on the 14th day of October, 1887. Service was made upon Walton by publication. On the 5th day of January, 1888, George Ordway, the plaintiff in error, asked to be made a party to the suit, and leave was granted, and, on the 27th of the same month, filed his answer setting forth—First, a general denial; second, his ownership and possession of the land described in the mortgage, and that such ownership was by virtue of tax-deeds duly executed; and, third, the statute of limitations,—that more than five years had elapsed from the time the notes and mortgage became due to the beginning of the action,—and asked that his title be quieted against the mortgage in suit. To this answer, the plaintiffs below replied by general denial, and that the tax-deeds were void, and asked to have title quieted against them. To this reply, Ordway demurred, which was overruled. When the cause came on for trial, the trial court held that the burden of proof was upon Ordway, to which he excepted. Upon the issues joined, a trial was had, and a judgment and decree of foreclosure rendered in favor of Cowles & Eldridge. The court found that the tax-deeds of Ordway were invalid, and gave judgment for the amount of his taxes and costs, and that the same should be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, and, upon the payment of such sums, the title was to be quieted. To this judgment and decree, the plaintiff in error excepted and brings the case here, assigning error.

The first claim made is that the court committed error in overruling his demurrer to the reply of the plaintiffs below. This was not error. The reply contained a general denial, and alleged that the tax-deeds were void, because no notice of the tax-sale of 1881 was published by the county treasurer as required by law. These allegations constituted proper defenses, and the demurrer was properly overruled. Flint v. Dulany, 37 Kan. 332, 15 Pac. Rep. 208.

Second. It is next claimed that the court erred in holding that the burden was upon plaintiff in error. A reference to the answer will show that he alleged that he was the legal and equitable owner of the land, and also in possession thereof, and his ownership was by virtue of certain tax-deeds duly executed by the county clerk of Greenwood county. The deeds were not set out in full, or made a part of the answer. Under the state of the pleadings there was no substantial error in the ruling of the trial court which cast the burden upon the plaintiff in error.

Third. The plaintiff in error insists that the note and mortgage of the plaintiffs below were barred by the statute; that the notes became due January 1, 1883; and that the five years had completely run before he filed his answer. The suit was commenced on the 14th day of October, 1887, and the five years had not elapsed; besides, we do not think Ordway can avail himself of the statute of limitations. He claims under a distinct and independent title in no way derived from the mortgagor. Generally, the plea of the statute of limitations is a personal privilege, and a third party cannot interpose the defense. Baldwin v. Boyd, 18 Neb. 444, 25 N. W. Rep. 580; Wood, Lim. (1st Ed.) § 41; 18 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 710; 7 Walt, Act. & Def. p. 236; Waterson v. Kirkwood, 17 Kan. 9. Walton, the maker of the notes and mortgage, could not successfully plead the statute of limitations, and we do not see by what process of reasoning we could reach the conclusion that Ordway could, even if he had succeeded to the right to the land in question, through Walton, which he did not; he certainly could obtain no greater right than Walton had. We think the statute can only be set up by Walton, or some one holding under him, and, when it is not available for Walton, no other person can take advantage of it. It necessarily follows that, because Walton never had the right, no other person could avail himself of such right.

Fourth. The final error assigned is that no decree of foreclosure should have been entered until the plaintiffs below showed title in the mortgagor. It seems evidence was offered in regard to the title to the mortgaged premises, but did not extend beyond the title from the government to the patentees. No conveyances were admitted in evidence to prove title in Walton, the mortgagor. An examination of the record discloses the fact that the record of certain deeds was offered, but not admitted, for the reason that the proper foundation had not been laid. The interplea of Ordway raised the question of title to the land described in the mortgage. The tax-deeds of Ordway were attacked by the plaintiffs below, and they asked to have the title to the mortgaged premises quieted in them against Ordway; and we think, from the nature of the issues made by the pleading, that the plaintiffs below should have shown title in the mortgagor, before they were entitled to a decree. It is fundamental that a person attacking a tax-deed must show some title to the land in question. Picquet v. City Council of Augusta, 64 Ga. 254; 2 Desty, Tax'n, p. 904.

Again, the title to the mortgaged premises being in controversy, and the plaintiffs asking that the cloud of the tax-title might be removed, they should recover on the strength of their own title, and, under the circumstances of this case, we think the chain should have been complete in the mortgagor. A person should have a reasonably clear title to maintain an action to have a cloud upon his title removed. He must proceed upon the strength of his own title, and not the weakness of his adversary. The real question is, who has the paramount right to the property? Simpson v. Boring, 16 Kan. 248; Lawrence v. Zimbleman, 37 Ark. 643; Hurley v. Street, 29 Iowa, 429; Stephenson v. Wilson, 50 Wis. 95, 6 N. W. Rep. 240. For the failure of the plaintiff in error to show title in the mortgagor, we recommend a reversal of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

RES ADJUDICATA—SETTING ASIDE DEED—FRAUD.

Where, in an action brought to set aside a quitclaim deed to certain real estate claimed to have been obtained by fraud, it appeared upon the trial that the title to the property had been quieted in another, in an action previously commenced and terminated in the same court against the plaintiff in this action, who was a non-resident, and upon whom service had been duly made by publication, held, that the findings and judgment in the former case are conclusive and binding upon the plaintiff below in this case on the question of title to the real estate in question; and, the plaintiff below having had no interest in the property in controversy at the commencement of this action, no fraud could be committed in obtaining a deed to property to which he had no title at the time.

Hallowell, Hume & Gordon, for plaintiff in error. Campbell & Dyer and J. R. Shields, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. John T. Stephens brought this action in the district court of Sedgwick county to set aside a deed, alleged to have been fraudulently obtained by G. T. Oldham, for lot No. 36, on Court street, in the city of Wichita. At one time it seems the plaintiff below had owned the lot in question, but did not pay the taxes assessed against it, and it had been sold for the taxes, and a tax-deed executed to the purchaser. Some time after this the grantee in this tax-deed commenced a suit against Stephens, the former owner of the lot, to quiet title, and on the 22d day of October, 1883, obtained a judgment against him, quieting the title to said real estate as against Stephens, and all persons claiming under him. Stephens being a non-resident of the state at the time, service was made upon him by publication. On the 3d day of January, 1887, Stephens and his wife made a quitclaim deed to Oldham of all their interest in and to the lot, and, on the 18th of January following, this action was commenced by Stephens to set aside this deed, alleging that the same had been obtained by deception as to the title and value of the lot. The claim was made that Oldham, through a brother who lived near Stephens in Jasper county, Mo., represented to Stephens that he had lost the title to said lot by a tax-deed, and that the lot was of little value, being some distance from the business part of the city; that most of the improvements of the city were being built on the other side of the river from where this lot was located; that, relying upon these representations, Stephens made the quitclaim deed, in consideration of $100, $10 of which was paid in cash some time after the delivery of the deed; Oldham assumed the payment of a debt of $40 which Stephens owed, and gave his note for $50; that at this time the lot was reasonably worth $4,000. The answer of Oldham put in issue all of the allegations of the petition, except the agency of the brother living in Missouri. The case was tried to the court, and special findings of fact and conclusions of law made in favor of the plaintiff; and the defendant below brings the case to this court for review.

It is contended by the plaintiff in error that no fraud can be committed against a person respecting property in which he has no interest, where such person simply makes a quitclaim deed; that Stephens showed upon the trial of this action in the court below that at the time of the giving of the quitclaim deed he had no title to the lot. It appears from a record of a judgment in the same court wherein Ida E. Harris was plaintiff, and the defendant in error in this case was defendant, that Ida E. Harris was the owner and in the actual possession of this lot, and that the title to the lot had been quieted in Harris, and against Stephens and all persons claiming under him. This evidence was introduced by the plaintiff himself. If this judgment is to have any force and effect whatever, it seems to us that it is decisive of this case. The court had jurisdiction of the property. The findings and judgment of the court barred Stephens of all right and title to the real estate in controversy. Faith and credit must be given to such a judgment. Venable v. Dutch, 37 Kan. 515; Dillon v. Heller, 39 Kan. 599, 18 Pac. Rep. 693; Commissioners v. Welch, 40 Kan. 767, 20 Pac. Rep. 483. It was said in the last case cited that, "in an action to quiet title to land, a general finding of title in the plaintiff, and consequently of no title in the defendants, is a conclusive and binding decision against the defendants on the question of title, from whatever source it may be derived, and forever stops them from asserting a claim of title which existed at the time of the finding and judgment." Whatever doubts may have existed in the minds of the bench and bar of the state in regard to the force and effect of such proceedings heretofore, the question has been set at rest by a recent decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557. In speaking for the court in that case, Mr. Justice BREWER said: "A state has power to provide by statute that the title to land within its limits shall be settled and determined by a suit in which the defendant, being a non-resident, is brought into court by publication only." Giving faith and credit to the judgment in the case of Harris v. Stephens, the title to the lot vested in Harris before the quitclaim deed was made from Stephens to Oldham, and Stephens parted with nothing by making conveyance. Fraud has been defined to be the unlawful appropriation of another's property with knowledge, by design, and without criminal intent. 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 612. According to the definition, fraud can only be perpetrated on rights; that is, legal rights. Bigelow, Fraud, 14. Having lost all interest in the property in question by a failure to pay the taxes thereon, and a judgment and decree of a court of competent jurisdiction having determined and adjudicated that the plaintiff below had no title to the lot, we fail to see how any fraud could be perpetrated. The judgment of the court below should be reversed.

STATE V. LAWSON.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE.

Where the county attorney files with an information charging violations of the prohibitory liquor law a statement of the testimony taken before him under authority of paragraph 2543, Gen. St. 1889, of sales made by the defendant, and no other specification of the particular violations intended to be given in the evidence is made or filed, the state will be confined in its evidence to the sales thus specified in the statement, and testimony of violations not therein referred to is inadmissible. State v. Whisner, 35 Kan. 271, 10 Pac. Rep. 852.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

Hale & Fife, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and Winfield Freeman, for the State.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an appeal from a conviction for a violation of the prohibitory liquor law. The information charged A. Lawson with three distinct offenses, in three counts, and was verified by the county attorney on information and belief. Prior to the filing of the information, the county attorney, in pursuance of paragraph 2543, Gen. St. 1889, caused a witness to be brought before him, and examined as to his knowledge of violations of the prohibitory liquor law by the appellant, and, in answer to questions, the witness stated that he knew of sales made by appellant to himself and to four other persons. The statement of the testimony so taken was attached to and filed with the information. The names of those mentioned in the statement, as well as of numerous other persons, were indorsed upon the back of the information as witnesses for the state. In the course of the trial several witnesses testified, over objection, to specific sales not referred to in the statement filed with the information; and this is the particular ground of complaint.

The statement by the witness examined before the county attorney, and which is filed with the information, constitutes a bill of particulars, specifying the particular offenses on which the state relies. It is filed for the benefit of the defendant, and gives notice to him of what is intended to be given in evidence. Having filed this statement and specification, the prosecutor is confined in his proof to the offenses particularly specified. If he desires to offer proof of other sales, he could, with the permission of the court, have filed an additional specification or bill of particulars. This question was before the court in State v. Whisner, 35 Kan. 271, 10 Pac. Rep. 852. In respect to this statement, it was there said: "The county attorney clearly had the right, for the benefit of the defendant, to file with his information a bill of particulars, or any sworn statements, showing what specific offenses he intended to charge, when he verified the information. All of this enabled the defendant to prepare his defense, and, after such statements or evidence had been filed with the information, the defendant could not be convicted of any offense not therein referred to or set forth." See, also, Com. v. Snelling, 15 Pick. 321; Com. v. Giles, 1 Gray, 466; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 643. While there seems to be abundant testimony to establish the sales that were particularly specified, we are unable to say from the record that the defendant was not convicted of sales not specified. Only three offenses were charged, and there is testimony of many more than three sales by Lawson; but the state did not elect to rely on any particular sale about which testimony was given; so we cannot say that the conviction was not for sales to McNinney, Pugh, and others, —sales not specified or referred to in the statement filed by the county attorney. For this error there must be a reversal of the judgment and a new trial.

CRAWFORD et al. v. KANSAS CITY, FT. S. & G. R. CO.

APPEAL—AMENDMENT OF RECORD—REVIEW.

A judgment was rendered in the district court, and afterwards a motion for a new trial was made and overruled. Within a year thereafter the case was brought to the supreme court, but the petition in error did not assign the overruling of the motion for a new trial as a ground of reversal. More than four years after the order overruling the motion for a new trial had been made an application was made to amend the petition in error by assigning the making of this order as an additional ground of error. Held, under section 556 of the Civil Code, that the v.25P.no.13—55 amendment was not permissible, and that the order was not reviewable.

Error from district court, Linn county; C. O. FRENCH, Judge.

JOHNSTON, J. This action was brought by plaintiffs in error to recover damages for certain horses and colts alleged to have been killed through the negligence of the railroad company. After they had offered their testimony, a demurrer to the same was interposed by the railroad company, on the ground that the evidence offered did not prove a cause of action in their favor and against the company. The court sustained the demurrer, and rendered judgment for the company. After the rendition of the judgment, a motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and the plaintiffs then instituted this proceeding to secure a reversal, alleging three grounds of error: First, the exclusion of evidence; second, the sustaining of the demurrer to plaintiffs' evidence; and, third, the giving of judgment for defendants, instead of plaintiffs,—but the overruling of the motion for a new trial was not assigned for error. At the submission of the case in this court an application was made to amend the petition in error by adding a new assignment of error upon the action of the court in overruling the motion for a new trial. The amendment was permitted to be filed, subject to such objections as defendants might make, the court reserving its decision on the effect of the amendment until the final disposition of the case.

It is contended that the testimony offered on the trial tended to sustain the cause of action alleged by plaintiffs, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer and taking the case from the jury. This ruling, like all others occurring on the trial, is not available on error, unless a motion for a new trial be made and filed within the time prescribed by law. Gruble v. Ryus, 23 Kan. 195; Norris v. Evans, 39 Kan. 668, 18 Pac. Rep. 818. Nor can any of the points or questions involved, and which were subject to review upon the motion for a new trial, be considered in this court, unless the overruling of that motion is assigned for error. Carson v. Frink, 27 Kan. 524; Clark v. Schnur, 40 Kan. 72, 19 Pac. Rep. 327; Landauer v. Hoagland, 41 Kan. 520, 21 Pac. Rep. 645; City of McPherson v. Manning, 43 Kan. 129, 23 Pac. Rep. 109. We are therefore precluded from reviewing any of the rulings complained of, unless the petition in error may be and is treated as amended in accordance with the application made by plaintiffs. The defendant objects to the amendment and the consideration of the order overruling the motion for a new trial, for the reason that more than one year has elapsed since the order was made. Section 556 of the Civil Code provides that "no proceeding for reversing, vacating, or modifying judgments or final orders shall be commenced unless within one year after the rendition of the judgment or making of the final order complained of," except in cases where the person entitled to such proceeding be under disability. The judgment in the case was rendered in November, 1886, and the petition in error was filed in this court on August 27, 1887. The motion for a new trial was made and overruled after the rendition of the judgment, and on November 16, 1886, while the application to amend the petition in error and assign the overruling of the motion for a new trial as error was not made until January 6, 1891, more than four years after the ruling complained of was made. We think the application to amend was made too late. Such applications are usually allowed as a matter of course, if made within a year after the final order or judgment complained of is given. Even after that time, if the amendment requested related to matters of form only, or the new error assigned was involved in the final judgment or order of which complaint was made, the amendment would ordinarily be permitted upon such terms and conditions as the court might deem just. But where the new assignment of error is not involved in the assignment already made, but states a new and distinct cause of complaint, the amendment cannot be made after the lapse of the period of limitation. It has been held, in cases where the order overruling the motion for a new trial followed the rendition of the judgment, and the petition in error was not filed in the supreme court until more than a year after the rendition of the judgment, but within less than one year after the motion for the new trial was heard and overruled, that the court could not review the judgment or other ruling of the court, except the order overruling the motion for a new trial and such other orders or rulings as are necessarily involved in the ruling upon the motion for the new trial. Osborne v. Young, 28 Kan. 769; Dyal v. Topeka, 35 Kan. 62, 10 Pac. Rep. 161; Bates v. Lyman, 35 Kan. 634, 12 Pac. Rep. 33. The order complained of was not involved in the judgment, nor included in any of the original assignments of error, but was a distinct and independent ground of complaint, and therefore it is barred by the limitation, and not reviewable at this time. See, also, Blackwood v. Shaffer, 44 Kan. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 423; 13 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 746. Nothing further remains for our consideration, and therefore the judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

COSPER V. NESBIT.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—PAROL EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY—LIMITATIONS.

1. Where an ambiguous expression is used in a contract, extrinsic facts and circumstances showing the practical interpretation placed upon it by the parties may be received in evidence.

2. While generally it is the province of the court to construe written contracts, yet, where a term is used in a technical or peculiar sense, the question of what that sense is, or what the intention and meaning of the parties were, may be submitted to a jury upon competent evidence and proper instructions; but, even if the court alone should have given a construction to the term, and it clearly appears that the jury has put upon it a correct construction, and such as the court should have given it, the submission of the question to the jury is not a sufficient ground for a reversal.

3. Under the evidence it is held that certain items of indebtedness claimed by plaintiff in error were barred by the statute of limitations.

Error from district court, Chase county; FRANK DOSTER, Judge.

T. B. Nesbit brought an action against George W. Cosper before a justice of the peace on July 1, 1886, to recover $49.25, alleged to be due on a written contract, of which the following is a copy: "Article of agreement entered into on this 2d day of November, 1882, between T. B. Nesbit, of the town of Bazaar, Chase county, Kansas, of the first part, and Geo. W. Cosper, of the same county and state aforesaid, of the second part, witnesseth: The party of the first part, in consideration of the sum of four thousand nine hundred dollars, to him in hand paid by the party of the second part, agrees to sell all of his farm situate in the town of Bazaar, county and state aforesaid, containing two hundred and forty acres of land, to the party of the second part. The party of the second part, on the 20th day of January, A. D. 1883, pays to the party of the first part the sum of two hundred dollars, and on the 1st day of March, 1883, give a chattel mortgage to the party of the first part on three thousand dollars' worth of stock for the amount of seventeen hundred dollars, said mortgage to be due one year from the 1st day of March, 1883, at 10 per cent. interest, and also the party of the second part agrees to assume the mortgage of $1,750 now on the said farm, and give an additional mortgage of ($1,250) twelve hundred and fifty dollars on said farm; or, if the party of the first part secures a loan of said $1,250 on the said farm, the party of the second part agrees to pay one-half of the expense of obtaining said loan, and assumes said loan. The party of the first part agrees to return all wood and timber now unsold on said farm, except what he wishes for his own use. The party of the first part also agrees to allow the party of the second part to cut fire-wood and make posts on said farm. In witness whereof the said parties hereby set their hands the day and year first above mentioned. T. B. NESBIT. GEORGE W. COSPER. Witness: BELLE WHITE. H. G. WHITE." Nesbit alleged that in pursuance of the contract he secured a loan of $1,250 on the farm sold at an expense of $98.50, and that Cosper had failed to pay one-half of the expense, as he had agreed to do. As a second cause of action Nesbit alleged that Cosper was indebted to him for several items, which in the aggregate amounted to $41.23. After a trial and judgment before the justice of the peace, the case was transferred by appeal to the district court, where it was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of Nesbit for $69.31. Cosper alleges error.

King & Kelley, for plaintiff in error. Madden Brothers, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. The principal controversy in the case arises upon that provision of the written contract in respect to obtaining the $1,250 loan and the expense of securing it. Nesbit sold the farm of 240 acres to Cosper for the stated consideration of $4,900, $200 of which was to be paid in cash; an existing mortgage on the land of $1,750 was to be assumed by Cosper; a payment of $1,700 was to be made on March 1, 1884, to be secured by a chattel mortgage on cattle of the value of $3,000; and for the remainder of the consideration Cosper was to give an additional mortgage of $1,250 on the farm, or, if Nesbit secured a loan of $1,250, Cosper agreed to assume the loan, and pay one-half of the expense of obtaining it. After the making of the contract, which was on November 2, 1882, Nesbit employed an agent to obtain a loan upon the land, and he succeeded in doing so about April 1, 1883. Prior to that time Nesbit had executed a deed for the farm to Cosper, and this, with other papers, had been deposited in a bank, to await the completion of the contract. As soon as the agent employed by Nesbit had procured the money, he made out a written application and mortgage, which were executed by Cosper, and the money was paid over to Nesbit, less the sum of $98.50, which was the expense incurred by the agent in obtaining the loan. The title papers were then delivered, and the contract completed; but, although Cosper had stated that he would pay one-half of the expense, he finally refused to do so, and this action was brought. It is claimed by Cosper that the agreement was that, if Nesbit secured the loan before the execution of the deed, and negotiated the mortgage in his own name, that then he was to assume the loan, and pay one-half of the expense for securing it; but that, as the loan was not secured by Nesbit in that way, and as Cosper executed the mortgage upon the land, and turned the money over to the plaintiff as payment, that the loan was therefore not secured by Nesbit, and hence there was no liability under the contract. Nesbit contends that he was the active agent or instrumentality in securing the loan; that he helped to negotiate it; and that the application and mortgage were executed by Cosper simply because he, Nesbit, had prior to that time executed a deed of the farm to Cosper, and placed the same in a depository, to await the completion of the contract. After the evidence had been submitted the court explained the contract to the jury, and then left it to them to determine the meaning of the words used in the contract, "secure a loan," stating to them that "we must give that expression the same meaning that the parties to the agreement have," and that they might take into account the situation of the parties, their conversations and conduct at and during the making of the contract, as well as their conversations and conduct subsequent to that time, in determining the sense in which the parties used the expression. Two meanings were claimed for the expression; and the court advised the jury what interpretation should be placed upon the contract if it was used in one sense, and what if used in the other. It is claimed that the court erred in submitting to the jury the question of what the parties understood and meant by the expression. In general, it is the province of the court to construe written contracts, but where peculiar expressions are used it may be left to the jury to determine by the aid of extrinsic circumstances and facts what sense was intended by the parties. Where the language of a contract contains an expression which is ambiguous, or one used in a peculiar sense, evidence may be properly received to show what the parties understood and intended by it. The practical interpretation of such an expression of the parties is entitled to great, if not controlling, influence. 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 869, and cases cited in note. The evidence in the record shows that both parties had the same understanding of this expression, and used it in the sense claimed by Nesbit. On two different occasions Cosper admitted his indebtedness for one-half of the expense of obtaining the loan. He knew that Mr. Nesbit had employed an agent to secure the loan; knew that the money was secured by that agent, and at the request of Nesbit. He waited until the agent procured the money, and, at the request of the agent, executed the necessary papers to secure its payment. The mortgage was evidently executed by him because of the fact that during the pendency of these negotiations a deed from Nesbit to Cosper had been executed and placed on deposit. Upon the testimony, which was ample, the jury found specially that the loan was obtained at the solicitation of Nesbit, and the money was in the possession of the agent before Cosper took any steps in the matter. We think no mistake was made in the construction placed upon the contract; and, even if it is such an one as should have been construed by the court alone, it is so clear that a correct construction has been given to it that the submission of the question to the jury is not a sufficient ground for a reversal. Insurance Co. v. Curran, 8 Kan. 10. It was also claimed that the contract was abandoned, and a different one subsequently made. There was a modification of the provision concerning the $1,700 payment, due in March, 1884, but the finding of the jury settled that there was no change in the $1,250 provision in controversy. The instruction requested, that Nesbit's claim for $49.25 was barred by the three-years statute of limitation, was properly refused. The claim arose under the written contract, and was not barred until five years after a cause of action had accrued. Complaint is made about the refusal of the court to permit plaintiff in error to show certain items of indebtedness from Nesbit to him; but these were not mentioned in the contract, were not in writing, and were barred by the statute of limitations. We think substantial justice was done in the case, and that no material error was committed. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

It is error for a trial court to sustain a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, when such evidence establishes a clear prima facie case in her favor. Railroad Co. v. Goodrich, 88 Kan. 224, 16 Pac. Rep. 439; Gardner v. King, 37 Kan. 671, 15 Pac. Rep. 920.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Morris county; M. B. NICHOLSON, Judge.

J. K. Owens, G. N. Elliott, and J. T. Bradley, for plaintiff in error. Miller & Ritchie, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. In March, 1886, the plaintiff, Roseltha A. Parsons, was the owner in fee of the real estate described in her petition filed in the district court. The defendant Cyrus Parsons represented to her that his brother, who, he said, was a rich man in Pennsylvania, would purchase the said property of the plaintiff, and pay her $4,000 therefor. The plaintiff consented to sell for that amount. Afterwards said Cyrus Parsons exhibited to the plaintiff a note executed by the defendant Anson Parsons, payable to the plaintiff on demand, for $4,000, but said he was instructed to hold the note until the deed was executed. The plaintiff then executed a deed to said Anson Parsons for the property, had it recorded, and sent to him. Cyrus Parsons then refused to turn the note over to the plaintiff until she paid a certain obligation signed by himself with Fay Parsons, the husband of the plaintiff. The plaintiff then demanded the note, or that the property be deeded back to her. This demand was made on both of the defendants, and they refused to do either. Fay Parsons, as the agent of the plaintiff, for her made the same demand, which was refused. December 8, 1887, the plaintiff commenced her action to set aside the deed thus obtained from her upon the ground that it was secured through fraud. April 24, 1888, the case was tried by the court, a jury having been waived. Anson Parsons was in default. The court found that due and proper service by publication had been had on him. The plaintiff introduced her evidence, and rested. The defendant demurred to the evidence, and the demurrer was sustained. Motion for new trial was overruled, and case brought here for review.

We fail to discover in the record any reason, in law or in fact, for the action of the district court. The plaintiff alleges that the deed from herself to Anson Parsons was obtained from her fraudulently. We think her evidence establishes a clear prima facie case, and, unexplained, is sufficient to support her right to the relief sought. The evidence shows that Anson Parsons, instead of deeding the property back to the plaintiff, from whom his deed came, deeded it to Fay Parsons, notwithstanding both the plaintiff, and Fay Parsons for her, demanded that it be deeded back to the plaintiff. This action of Anson Parsons, together with the stealthy manner in which it was accomplished, with the other evidence in the case, shows pretty conclusively that the transaction was a scheme on the part of Cyrus Parsons, to which Anson Parsons lent himself for Cyrus' benefit, to get the title out of the plaintiff, and in the name of Fay Parsons, so that a judgment against him and Cyrus could be collected out of the property. The law never uses fraud as a means for the collection of a debt. The demurrer to the evidence should have been overruled. Railroad Co. v. Goodrich, 88 Kan. 224, 16 Pac. Rep. 439; Gardner v. King, 37 Kan. 671, 15 Pac. Rep. 920. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and case remanded for new trial.

SICKINGER et al. v. STATE ex rel. HUTCHINS County Attorney.

INJUNCTION OF LIQUOR NUISANCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence examined, and held sufficient to support the finding and judgment of the trial court as to the defendant Martin Sickinger; but not sufficient to support the finding and judgment against J. M. Anderson, nor against the defendant James Ryan.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Butler county; A. L. REDDEN, Judge.

Dale & Wall, for plaintiff in error. E. H. Hutchins, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an injunction proceeding under paragraph 2533, Gen. St. 1889. The action was in the name of the state on the relation of the county attorney of Butler county. The state alleges that the premises described in the petition was a place where intoxicating liquors were kept for sale; and where such liquors were sold, bartered, and given away in violation of law; and was a place where persons were permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors as a beverage in violation of law; and charged that such place was, in consequence thereof, a common nuisance; and asked that such premises be adjudged a common nuisance; that the place be abated as such; and that the defendants be perpetually enjoined from using, or permitting said premises to be used, as a place where intoxicating liquors are sold, bartered, or given away, or kept for sale, or a place where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquor as a beverage in violation of law. A temporary order of injunction was allowed July 16, 1887. September 1, 1887, the case was tried by the court, which found the allegations of the petition true as therein set forth, and entered a judgment perpetuating the injunction, and for costs against the defendants therein. The petition alleges that the defendant James Ryan was the owner of the building complained of, but we find no evidence in the record connecting him with the building, nor, in any other way, with the case. It follows that the finding of the court below, so far as it relates to Ryan, is not supported by any evidence, and that the judgment as to him must be reversed, with costs.

J. M. Anderson is made a defendant in the petition, and it is alleged that he was a member of the firm of Sickinger & Co.; but there is no evidence to support the allegation. Through all the evidence in the record relating thereto the firm is referred to as Sickinger & Johnson. Neither the counsel nor any of the witnesses refer to Anderson, but they frequently refer to the firm having charge of the building complained of as Sickinger & Johnson. There being no evidence to connect Anderson with the case, the finding of the court as to him is erroneous, and the judgment based thereon must be reversed, with costs.

As to the other defendant, Sickinger, the only question is, does the evidence sustain the finding and judgment of the court below? There is a conflict in the evidence; and, as the trial court passed upon the testimony, and held it sufficient, this court will not undertake to determine the weight of such conflicting evidence. Peacock v. Boyle, 41 Kan. 492, 21 Pac. Rep. 586; Weir v. Eckard, 37 Kan. 696, 15 Pac. Rep. 922.

It follows, then, that if there was evidence to support the finding and judgment of the court as to the defendant Sickinger they should not be disturbed, even though an apparent preponderance of the evidence was against such finding and judgment. State v. Alten, (Kan.) ante, 224; Harrington v. Stone, 39 Kan. 176, 17 Pac. Rep. 853; Weir v. Plow-Works, 36 Kan. 460, 13 Pac. Rep. 791; Stratton v. Hawks, (Kan.) 23 Pac. Rep. 591; Gafford v. Hall, 39 Kan. 166, 17 Pac. Rep. 851; McKinney v. Ward, 39 Kan. 279, 18 Pac. Rep. 196; Railroad Co. v. Kunkel, 17 Kan. 145, and cases there cited, including cases from a large number of the states of this country. The evidence clearly connects Sickinger with the place complained of, as one of the keepers thereof. It also clearly shows that he sold, to be drunk as a beverage, on the premises, Young's extract of malt. Dr. Kuhn testifies that he analyzed the liquor sold, and found it to contain a sufficient quantity of alcohol to render it intoxicating. Says he analyzed some beer, and found it contained about the same amount of alcohol. Dr. Gill says it contained sufficient alcohol to render it intoxicating. E. D. Stratford drank some of it, and says it was intoxicating; that in his judgment it was beer. W. H. Hardin said, "It tasted like beer." R. D. Hyde testified it "tasted some like beer." Smiley, another witness, said it made him "kindersick." Combe, a witness, saw two men at the place complained of, drunk. Dr. Kuhn, a witness on behalf of the state, and Prof. Lovewell, a witness for the defense, united in saying that the article the sale of which was complained of was a malt liquor, and also a fermented liquor. This evidence, of itself, under our statute, makes the material prima facie intoxicating, and greatly strengthens the case of the state. In the face of such evidence, this court cannot disturb the finding and judgment of the court below as to Sickinger, without overruling the cases cited from our own court which are in harmony with the courts of many other states, as will be seen by an examination of the exhaustive citation of authorities in the opinion of Judge BREWER, in Railroad Co. v. Kunkel, supra. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed as to the defendants James Ryan and J. M. Anderson, with costs; and that, as to the defendant Martin Sickinger, the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

BARNETT v. LARK.

SECURITY FOR COSTS—POVERTY OF PLAINTIFF—ACTION IN JUSTICE COURT.

Section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing, in substance, that a plaintiff who has a just demand against a defendant, and who, by reason of his poverty, cannot give security for costs, may maintain his action without a bond for costs, applies to actions commenced before a justice of the peace.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Saline county; S. O. HINDS, Judge.

Wilson & Moore, for plaintiff in error
J. G. Mohler, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. January 30, 1888, John Lark, the defendant in error, plaintiff below, commenced this action before A. WELLINGTON, a justice of the peace of Saline county, under chapter 105, art. 10, § 90, Comp. Laws Kan. 1885, to enforce an alleged lien on the hogs of Barnett, the plaintiff in error, in the sum of $40, claimed as damage to growing crops. On return-day of the summons, on motion of Barnett, the justice ordered that Lark give security for costs. The case was then continued to February 14th, at which time Lark deposited $5, a non-negotiable promissory note for $13, and also gave a bond in the sum of $15. The justice approved the bond, retained the $5, but rejected the note, and the case was again continued to February 28th, at which time, on application of Barnett, the justice ordered that Lark give additional security, which he neglected and refused to do, claiming that by reason of his poverty he was unable to do so, and in lieu thereof filed his poverty affidavit under section 581 of the Code. The justice also rejected this, and, Lark failing to comply with the order, the case was dismissed at his costs, and the justice thereupon rendered judgment against Lark in the sum of $56.05, to which ruling and judgment Lark excepted. A bill of exceptions was made, sealed, and signed, and the case taken to the district court on the petition in error. The district court reversed the judgment of the justice, and rendered judgment against Barnett, the plaintiff in error, for all the costs that had accrued in both courts, amounting to $69.15, and ordered that the case be retained in the district court for trial. Motion for a new trial was made, and overruled by the court, to which the plaintiff in error duly excepted.

Did the justice err in dismissing the action upon Lark's failure to comply with the order requiring him to give additional security for costs? Is the question propounded by counsel for plaintiff in error. We think he did, for the reason that section 581 of the Code applies to actions before a justice of the peace. That section provides, in substance, that in cases where the plaintiff has a just cause of action against the defendant, and by reason of his poverty is unable to give security for costs, an affidavit that such is the fact dispenses with the usual bond for costs. In this case such an affidavit was filed, and there was no showing made against the truth of the affidavit. Section 186 of the justices' act makes no provision for a person to commence an action before a justice of the peace when by reason of his poverty he cannot give security for costs, or make a deposit of money to secure payment of the same; but section 185 of the same act provides that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, which are in their nature applicable to the proceedings before justices, and in respect to which no special provision is made by statute, shall govern proceedings in justice's court. Section 185 of the justices' act has been construed in the following cases: Alvey v. Wilson, 9 Kan. 401; Points v. Jacobia, 12 Kan. 54; Stevens v. Able, 15 Kan. 584; Clark v. Wiss, 34 Kan. 553, 9 Pac. Rep. 281; Israel v. Nichols, 37 Kan. 68, 14 Pac. Rep. 438. From an examination of these cases it will appear that this court has universally held that any provision of the Code in its nature applicable to proceedings before justices of the peace, and in respect to which no special provision is made by statute, must govern in actions pending before justices of the peace; the object of this provision, and the controlling idea in its construction, being to assimilate the mode of procedure before justices to that of the district court. We recommend that the judgment of the district court of Saline county be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

FREEMAN v. HILL.

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—SETTING ASIDE—PLEADING—LIMITATION—APPEAL BY ADMINISTRATOR—BOND.

1. Where an application is made to set aside a judgment rendered upon default at the same term at which the judgment is rendered, and the trial court vacates the judgment and permits the defendant to file an answer asserting the meritorious and valid defense, its ruling in that regard is clearly within its sound judicial discretion.

2. In this state, statutes of limitations are regarded not as statutes of presumption, but as statutes of repose, and a trial court may, in its sound judicial discretion, permit a defendant to file an answer out of time, pleading the statute of limitations.

3. Executors, administrators, and guardians who have given bond in this state, with sureties, according to law, are not required to give an undertaking on appeal or proceedings in error. Civil Code, § 577.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Marshall county; E. HUTCHINSON, Judge.

W. H. H. Freeman, for plaintiff in error.
E. A. Berry and John V. Coon, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. On November 14, 1885, W. H. H. Freeman commenced his action against Samuel Hill before a justice of the peace of Marshall county to recover $75 upon an appeal-bond executed by Ed. W. Waynant, as administrator of the estate of J. B. Waynant, deceased, as principal, and Samuel Hill, as surety. On December 1, 1885, he filed an amended bill of particulars claiming $185, setting up three causes of action, the second and third causes being new. Hill, by his attorneys, made a motion to strike out causes 2 and 3, because they were not stated in the first bill of particulars, or in the summons. The justice sustained the motion. The case was then tried before the justice and decided in favor of Hill. Freeman appealed to the district court. On April 1, 1886, he filed in the district court a petition alleging three causes of action, one on the bond, one for attorney's fees, and one for a pump to be taken out if not satisfactory. At the August term of the district court for 1886, no answer having been filed, Freeman moved for judgment upon the pleadings for $185. This was granted. Soon afterwards, and at the same term, the judgment was set aside upon the application of Hill, and on the 7th day of September, 1886, Hill filed an answer pleading, among other things, the statute of limitations. On the 2d day of September, 1887, Hill obtained leave to amend his answer. To this answer, Freeman filed his reply. Trial had before the court with a jury. A verdict was returned in favor of Hill, and judgment was entered accordingly. Freeman excepted and brings the case here.

It is claimed by him that the trial court erred in setting aside the judgment rendered upon default, and also erred in allowing Hill to file an answer pleading the statute of limitations. The application to set aside the judgment was made at the same term at which the judgment was rendered. The action of the court in that matter rested, to a very great extent, in its sound judicial discretion. Subsequently, an answer was filed, and the parties had a trial before a jury. Under such circumstances, a reviewing court will not interfere with the vacation of a judgment by the trial court, unless it appears that the trial court has abused its power. This is not shown. Spratt v. Insurance Co., 5 Kan. 155; Filnt v. Noyes, 27 Kan. 351. There was no error in permitting Hill to plead the statute of limitations. In this state, such statutes are favorably considered. Taylor v. Miles, 5 Kan. 498. In that case, it was said that, "when the statute has run its full time, the effect is to leave the parties in possession of just what they had before, nothing more and nothing less; and neither party has a right of action against the other. The injured party has lost his remedy." At one time, the decisions of the courts were largely in favor of regarding the statute of limitations as a statute of presumption, but now they are generally considered, as in this state, as statutes of repose. Sibert v. Wilder, 16 Kan. 176. Under some of the decisions, where statutes of limitations were regarded as statutes of presumption only, an answer pleading such statute was not considered meritorious, or treated with favorable consideration. In this state, however, as the statutes of limitations are statutes of repose, such a ruling does not apply. The court may allow a party to file his answer out of time, whether he pleads payment or the statute of limitations. It is a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and, unless that discretion is abused, its ruling will not be reversed.

It is also urged that the instructions of the trial court were erroneous, and therefore that the plaintiff was denied a fair trial. The trial court instructed the jury to disregard the evidence introduced under the first cause of action, and also stated to the jury that the plaintiff had not shown any facts to entitle him to recover thereon. Section 577 of the Civil Code reads: "Executors, administrators, and guardians who have given bond in this state, with sureties, according to law, are not required to give an undertaking on appeal or proceedings in error." Section 185 of civil procedure before justices reads: "The provisions of an act entitled 'An act to establish a Code of Civil Procedure,' which are, in their nature, applicable to the jurisdiction and proceeding before justices, and in respect to which no special provision is made by statute, are applicable to proceedings before justices of the peace." The bond executed by Waynant, as administrator, and by Samuel Hill, as surety, cannot be regarded as a statutory bond. It cannot be considered good as a common-law bond, because Waynant, as administrator, had the right to appeal without giving any undertaking. Therefore no benefit was obtained by the execution of the bond, and no injury or damage resulted from its execution to the plaintiff or to any one else.

Again, the action in which the bond was given has never been disposed of, and is still pending before the district court of Marshall county. At the December term of the district court of Marshall county for 1880, Waynant made a motion to dismiss the action brought against him by Freeman, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction. The court granted this motion, but its ruling was reversed by this court. Freeman v. Waynant, 25 Kan. 279. The mandate of this court was sent to the court below, and filed May 14, 1881, but nothing seems to have been done with the case since that time. Upon the facts disclosed, plaintiff could not recover upon the bond, the first cause of action. It is not shown by the record that all the evidence is preserved, and therefore we cannot say from the record, as presented, that the court committed any error in the other instructions referred to. If the plea of the statute of limitations was supported by sufficient evidence, the instructions given by the trial court stated correctly the law. A claim is made that, as the affidavit to the answer alleged, Hill was a non-resident of the state at the time the answer was filed; therefore, that the causes of action of plaintiff were not barred. This, however, depends upon the evidence presented to the court, all of which is not shown to be in the record. If the claims of plaintiff were barred by the statute before Hill became a non-resident, the point presented is without force. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Feb. 7, 1891.)

BOARD OF EQUALIZATION—RECORDS—VALIDITY OF PROCEEDINGS.

1. The fact that the county clerk recorded the proceedings of the board of equalization in a journal containing also the proceedings of the board of county commissioners will not invalidate the action of the board of equalization.

2. After the board of equalization had convened, they temporarily suspended action from time to time, and acted as a board of county commissioners, and the record of such action is included with their proceedings as a board of equalization; and, in the record of the proceedings of the board of equalization, the members of the board are sometimes designated as the "board of county commissioners," and again as the "board." But the entire record indicates that the action of the commissioners in equalizing the values of property was taken as a board of equalization. Held, that the irregularities mentioned are not such as could have misled any taxpayer, nor such as will destroy the validity of their proceedings in equalizing the values of property within the county.

Error from district court, Wabaunsee county; R. B. SPILLMAN, Judge.

J. B. Barnes, for defendants in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an action to enjoin the collection of taxes levied against the plaintiffs in error for the year 1886 upon a herd of cattle that were kept in Maple Hill township, Wabaunsee county. After the cattle had been listed and assessed by the township assessor, the board of equalization met and increased the valuation of all cattle within the township 15 per cent., except those of the plaintiffs in error, the valuation of which was increased 25 per cent. All the taxes levied on the cattle were tendered by the plaintiffs in error to the county treasurer, except the sum of $34.45, which is claimed to be illegal on account of an unwarranted increase in the valuation by the board of equalization. The objections to the action of the board are not that it acted without the giving of statutory notice, nor that the valuation placed upon the cattle was unjust or unequal, as compared with that placed on other cattle within the county, but they are of a more technical and unsubstantial character. Complaint is made that the proceedings of the board of equalization were recorded in one of the journals of the board of county commissioners, and that the report of the proceedings of the board of equalization on the journal of the board of county commissioners does not create or constitute a record of the board of equalization. And another objection is that the county commissioners, in equalizing the property of that township, were acting as a board of county commissioners, and not as a board of equalization. The county clerk is made clerk of the board, and is required to keep a record of the proceedings and orders of that board. He is not required to keep a record in a particular form, nor to record the proceedings in any particular book or journal. The report of the proceedings in the present case was recorded in one of the journals provided by the county, and in a portion of which were kept the proceedings of the board of county commissioners. This fact will not invalidate the action taken by the board of equalization. Possibly it would have been more formal and satisfactory to have kept a separate and independent journal for the proceedings of the board of equalization; but it is not essential to the legality of their action. It is sufficient if a true and permanent record is made by the clerk of the proceedings of the board, regardless of whether it is transcribed in an independent book, or one which is in part devoted to other purposes. The objection that the commissioners were not organized as a board of equalization at the time the valuation of plaintiffs' property was changed cannot be sustained. In the record of the proceedings it appears that the commissioners convened as a board of equalization on June 7th, as required by law, and that they adjourned from day to day until June 15th, when they completed the work of equalization and adjourned sine die. It appears from the report of their proceedings that the work of the board was suspended several times between the time of convening and the final adjournment, for the transaction of business as a board of county commissioners; and the record of these matters is also recorded with the proceedings of the board of equalization. Then, again, in the report of the proceedings made by the county clerk, there is some confusion of terms in designating the members of the board. They are referred to as the "board of equalization," sometimes as the "board of county commissioners," and again simply as the "board." It is true that the board of equalization and the board of county commissioners are distinct tribunals, with different functions and duties, and the confusion of terms in the report of the county clerk is in this respect informal and irregular, but we think not to the extent of defeating their action in equalizing the property of the township, or the taxes levied upon the valuation which they made. The record showing the equalization complained of is found within what is entitled "Proceedings of the Board of Equalization, Wabaunsee County," and, taking the record altogether, the change made in the valuation of the cattle in Maple Hill township was manifestly the act of the board of equalization. The records of these tribunals are not always kept with care and precision, and courts are inclined to treat the reports of their proceedings with liberality and indulgence so far as form and regularity are concerned. In the present case, the board was regularly convened, pursuant to a legal notice, and had complete jurisdiction, as such board, to change and equalize the values of cattle within the township to the extent which they did. Neither the interruptions in the work, as a board of equalization, in order to perform some of the functions of a board of county commissioners, nor the fact that the record which was kept of the proceedings of the board of equalization included some of the business done as a board of county commissioners, could mislead any tax-payer, and we do not think that these, or any of the irregularities mentioned, should destroy the validity of their proceedings. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

HOLDERMAN v. POND.

COURTS—JURISDICTION—TORTS COMMITTED OUTSIDE OF STATE.

An action for the conversion of certain corn and corn-stalks, grown and standing upon land in the Indian Territory, leased in violation of law and the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Nation, brought by a citizen of this state against a person residing in such territory, but personally served with summons, cannot be maintained in this state.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Labette county; GEORGE CHANDLER, Judge.

Leroy, Neale & Son and H. G. Webb, for plaintiff in error. F. M. Smith, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action brought in justice court in Labette county by J. W. Pond against Marion and Mary Holderman, on the 12th day of March, 1885, upon the following bill of particulars: "The plaintiff, for his cause of action against the defendants, says that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of one hundred and ninety dollars, upon an account for 700 bushels of corn, at 25 cents per bushel, $175.00; and for 60 acres of corn-stalks, at 25 cents per acre, $15.00. Said defendants took and converted the same to their own use, and said amount is still due. Wherefore, plaintiff prays judgment against the defendants for one hundred and ninety dollars, with 7 per cent. interest, from January 1, 1885, and costs of suit." The case was taken to the district court and there tried, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and against Marion Holderman, for $209.88. No service seemed to have been made upon the other defendant. The plaintiff in error filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he brings the case here for review. From the special findings of the jury, it appears that the land upon which the corn in question grew was situated in the Cherokee Nation, in the Indian Territory, and, at the time of the alleged conversion, was fully matured, but ungathered; and that the defendant purposely caused his stock to be driven to the field where said corn was standing, to have them feed upon it. It further appears from the evidence that this land had been leased by the defendant to a firm, of which the plaintiff was a member, and that he had succeeded to the interest of the firm in such lease; that, at the time of the making of the lease and the alleged conversion of the crop, the plaintiff was a resident of Kansas, and the defendant, who was a "squaw-man," resided in the Indian Territory.

It is contended by the plaintiff in error that, at the time of the alleged wrong, no jurisdiction had been accorded to any court outside of the limits of that country, unless one of the parties be an inhabitant of that country, and the other an inhabitant outside thereof, either as a plaintiff or defendant, and, in that case, exclusive original jurisdiction was then given to the nearest United States district court; that an action of such a character as this cannot be maintained in this state.

Laying aside the question of the right of the plaintiff below to waive the tort and recover as upon an implied contract, which seems to be well settled upon reason and authority, can the courts of this jurisdiction give the plaintiff below a remedy for a wrong committed in the Indian Territory, when there is a question as to whether there was a remedy there? The primary right of the plaintiff below to recover rested upon a tort committed where the remedy was confined to the nearest United States district court, which had exclusive original jurisdiction. Could the plaintiff below, "upon the theory of the implied promise, and its invention," recover in this jurisdiction for a wrong committed where the jurisdiction is restricted to the federal court, if indeed any remedy existed at all? We think the tort charged, and the right and remedy growing out of such tort, must be determined by the law of the territory where the wrong was committed. The rule is well settled that if there is no right to recover for an alleged injury, in the state or territory where it is said to have been committed, there can be none in any other state; and, if the state in which the alleged injury is committed has declared the consequences and defined the liability therefor, that law must govern. Campbell v. Rogers, 19 Law Rep. 329. By the seventh article of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Nation, proclaimed August 11, 1866, (14 U. S. St. at Large, p. 800,) it is provided that the United States district court, the nearest to the Cherokee Nation, shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all civil and criminal cases. We think this provision of the treaty settles the jurisdiction of this case. Section 2103 of the Revised Statutes of the United States makes void all contracts for the leasing of land in the Indian country, unless executed in the manner therein provided, and approved by the secretary of the interior. The lease between Pond and Holderman was in violation of this law, and conferred no rights upon Pond to cultivate the land. He was there without authority. The question naturally suggests itself whether or not, under such a state of facts, he could have maintained an action in any form against the defendant below in the Indian Territory. If he could not there, he should not be permitted to do so here. He can obtain no greater rights here than he had there. In order to maintain an action founded upon an injury to person or property, the act which is the cause of the injury or damage, and the foundation of the action, must be actionable or punishable at least by the law of the place where the injury was done. Cooley, Torts, 471; Whart. Conf. Laws, § 478; Holland v. Pack, Peck, (Tenn.) 151; Le Forest v. Tolman, 117 Mass. 109; Smith v. Condry, 1 How. 28; McLeod v. Railroad Co., 58 Vt. 727, 6 Atl. Rep. 648; Carter v. Goode, 50 Ark. 155, 6 S. W. Rep. 719. In the latter case, Goode sued Carter in Arkansas, to recover damages for an injury to a mule. It was proved upon the trial that the injury was committed in the Cherokee Nation, where Carter and Goode were at the time residing; that they were citizens of Arkansas, and had no permit to reside in the Indian country; that, at the time the injury was inflicted, the mule was trespassing in Carter's inclosure, which Goode knew it was in the habit of doing; and that Goode had no redress whatever for the injury, and that the act was not punishable in the Indian Territory. The court held that the action could not be maintained, because the act which caused the injury was not punishable or actionable by the law of the place where it was committed. As the plaintiff below had no permit or license to lease the land where the corn was raised, and there being grave doubts whether he had any right to recover for the alleged conversion of this property in the Indian Territory, where the tort was committed,—and, if such right did exist, the jurisdiction was vested in another court,—we think it follows from such a state of facts that the trial court had no jurisdiction. We recommend a reversal of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

SWARTZ v. NASH et al.

ELECTION CONTEST—SETTLING BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MANDAMUS.

When a bill of exceptions, containing over 200 pages of written matter, purporting to contain all the proceedings in a contested election, is presented to the contest court for settlement and signature, and the attorney who presents it declares his willingness to supply any omission or make any addition to it that may be suggested by the trial court, so as to make it speak the truth, and the trial court refuses to consider it, or to make any suggestions as to omissions or amendments, and refuses to settle it or sign the same as prepared, they can be compelled by mandamus to settle and sign a true bill of exceptions in said case.

Commissioners' decision. Original proceeding in mandamus.

A. M. Mackey and J. K. Beauchamp, for plaintiff. S. B. Bradford, John H. Pitzer, and William O'Connor, for defendant.

SIMPSON, C. An alternative writ of mandamus issued from this court on the 30th day of November, 1890, reciting that it was represented to the court that prior to the 25th day of November, 1889, one W. H. Swartz was duly declared elected to the office of county commissioner of the third commissioner district of Stevens county. That on the said 25th day of November, 1889, J. W. Spoon, as contestor, filed with the county clerk of said county a notice of his intention to contest the election of the said W. H. Swartz to said office of county commissioner. That thereupon the said T. B. Nash, as probate judge of said county, selected as associate judges for the trial of said contest R. H. Chism and George H. Storms, and that they constituted and were the contest court for the trial of said action. That they proceeded with the trial of said case from time to time until the 3d day of March, 1890, when said court rendered a decision in said contest adverse to the said W. H. Swartz, to which decision the said contestee at the time duly excepted. That said contestee immediately filed with the clerk of said court a motion to vacate said decision, and grant him a new trial, which said motion was overruled on the 14th day of March, 1890, to which ruling the contestee duly excepted. That the said contestee, immediately upon the refusal of the court to grant a new trial, presented to the court a bill of exceptions in due and legal form, and requested the court to sign the same as required by law; but that said court refused to settle a bill of exceptions in said court, and adjourned the court sine die. That the said contestee was and is desirous of having a bill of exceptions settled and signed in said case, in order that he may have the same reviewed in the proper court upon a petition in error. That, unless the said contest court is required to settle and sign a bill of exceptions in said case, the contestee is without adequate remedy at law, and will suffer great damage and loss. The contest court was commanded to convene at the office of the probate court in said county at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon on the 10th day of November, A. D. 1890, and then and there proceed to settle and sign such bill of exceptions as may be tendered by the contestee, or show cause before the court on the 20th day of November, 1890, why performance as herein commanded has been delayed or refused. To this writ the defendants answered on the 28th day of November, 1890, admitting that on the 14th day of March said Swartz, by his attorney, presented to said contest court a pretended bill of exceptions, and requested them to settle and sign the same, and that they refused to do so for the following reasons: First. That said bill of exceptions so presented did not fully and truthfully set forth and recite the matters and things therein contained, and that they called the attention of the attorney presenting the same to the defects, errors, and misstatements and omissions in said pretended bill of exceptions, and suggested wherein said pretended bill of exceptions should be amended to make it speak the truth, and informed the attorney, if he would make such amendments as were suggested, that they would sign the bill of exceptions, and that the attorney refused to make the amendments. That afterwards, on the same day, the attorney reduced to writing a pretended statement of the corrections and amendments suggested by the court, but attached thereto an instrument in writing, the nature of which was unknown to the court at that time, and asked these defendants to sign the same; whereupon the court asked the attorney if he presented that instrument as his bill of exceptions, to which he answered "it was none of the court's business, but is mine as attorney for Swartz." The said Swartz and his attorney not having made a true bill of exceptions, and refusing to make the amendments suggested, and it being apparent from the insolent and contumacious demeanor of said attorney that said corrections would not be made, and that Swartz and his attorney did not want a bill of exceptions settled and signed that would speak the truth in reference to said trial, and such court having no other business before it, adjourned sine die. Second. They allege the pendency of another action between the same parties for the same cause of action before the district court within and for the county of Stevens, in the thirty-second judicial district of this state, and that said action was pending at the time of the commencement of this action, and is still pending. On the issues raised by the alternative writ and the answer, a trial was had before this court on the 7th day of February. The material facts appearing at the trial are that on the 14th day of March, 1890, the attorney of Swartz appeared before the contest court with a bill of exceptions that was identified on the trial as the one offered, and presented it to the court, and requested them to settle and sign the same. This bill of exceptions consisted of over 200 pages of written matter, and purported to contain everything connected with said case. Two amendments were suggested by the opposing attorney, and these were immediately inserted in the bill of exceptions. The contest court still persisted in the contention that the bill of exceptions was not a true one, but declined to suggest wherein it was deficient, and refused to make any additional suggestions as to amendments, corrections, or omissions of important and material matter. The court stated that they were not compelled to sign any other than a true bill, and finally on that day adjourned sine die. They reconvened on the 10th day of November,—the day designated in the alternative writ,—and the identified bill of exceptions was again presented to them, with an offer on the part of the attorney who presented it to draft and incorporate into the bill any suggestions, amendments, or corrections; but none were made, and the court refused to sign because it was not a true bill. They made no effort at that time to perfect the bill of exceptions. The bill was then left with them or their attorney for examination. Subsequent to this, they prepared a statement enumerating the defects and omissions in the bill of exceptions presented, and this statement constituted their answer to an alternative writ of mandamus that had prior to the commencement of this action been issued out of the district court of their county, but subsequently withdrawn. This statement of omissions and defects in the bill of exceptions presented was by them introduced as evidence on the trial of this action.

It is made the statutory duty of a court to settle and sign a bill of exceptions. If the bill is not a true one, the court should correct it, or suggest the correction to be made. Section 303, Civil Code. We hold it to have been the plain duty of the contest court in this case, when the bill of exceptions was presented to it, to have correctly settled and signed it. If the bill as presented was defective in any respect, the defect should have been remedied then and there. It is a clear legal right belonging to any party, when a case is decided against him, to have a bill of exceptions settled and signed by the court embodying all the pleadings, evidence, and rulings; and it amounts to an absolute denial of legal right and of justice for a trial court to arbitrarily refuse to settle a true bill of exceptions. It is true that a trial court is not required to draft a lengthy bill of exceptions, or perform clerical work of moment; but, when a bill is prepared that is claimed to embrace the whole proceedings, it is their duty to carefully examine it, and correct it, if need be, so as to make it speak the absolute truth. The power of the trial court to make such alterations, erasures, and additions in a prepared bill of exceptions presented for signature as may be necessary to make it speak the truth is undoubted, and has been declared by this court. But the trial judge has no right to fold his arms, and say that the bill of exceptions is not true, and yet not point out wherein it is defective, and refuse to settle and sign it because it is not true. It is as much a part of the duty of the trial court to settle as it is to sign a bill of exceptions. By settlement, we mean to make it recite the absolute truth as to all of the proceedings in the action. All these things are clear deductions from the statutory command to trial courts to settle and sign bills of exceptions. The trial court cannot, by mandamus, be compelled to sign a certain bill of exceptions, or any particular bill of exceptions; but when a bill is presented, and they refuse either to settle or sign it, or to suggest amendments, or to require certain parts to be stricken out, they can be compelled by mandamus to settle and sign a bill of exceptions. This is the prayer and command of the alternative writ in this case. The objection that any other suit is pending in the district court of Stevens county by the same parties for the same cause of action is obviated by showing from the records of said court that all the papers in the action were withdrawn by both parties by leave of the court, and without prejudice. We recommend that a peremptory writ be issued, the question of costs being reserved for further investigation and future consideration.

BITMAN et al. v. MIZE.

SHERIFFS—FAILURE TO EXECUTE PROCESS—EVIDENCE.

An execution reciting a judgment rendered October 14, 1886, is not supported by proof of a judgment entered October 14, 1885, and a sheriff is not liable to amercement for failure to serve and return such execution in 60 days.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Harper county; J. T. HERICK, Judge.

Finch & Finch and S. S. Sisson, for plaintiff in error. Brand & Loug, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an application to amerce C. D. Nelson, sheriff of Barber county, for failure to return an execution issued out of the district court of Harper county in the case of Bitman, Taylor & Co. vs. W. O. Mize, within the time prescribed by law. The application was heard by the court January 26, 1887. Plaintiffs introduced their evidence and rested their case. The defendant, Nelson, demurred to the evidence of the plaintiffs, which demurrer was sustained, and judgment was rendered against the plaintiffs for costs. Motion for new trial was overruled. The plaintiffs bring the case here for review. Among other alleged errors the plaintiffs assign for error the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer of the defendant to their evidence. Was the action of the court in this respect erroneous? We think not. The court based its action on the ground that the execution in the hands of the sheriff was not supported by any judgment, and was therefore void; and, being void, the sheriff was under no legal obligation to execute and return it. The execution offered in evidence recites a judgment obtained in the district court of Harper county on the 14th day of October, 1886, while the judgment introduced to support said execution was obtained October 14, 1885.

The question is, was there such a variance between the execution, and the judgment introduced to support it, as will excuse the sheriff, or save him from amercement? We think there was. This is a statutory proceeding, and its character penal, and strict compliance with the law must be observed in its enforcement. The record in this case shows there was but one judgment in the Harper county court between Pitman, Taylor & Co., as plaintiffs, and W. O. Mize as defendant, and that was dated October 14, 1885. There being no judgment in said court between said parties bearing date October 14, 1886, it follows that the clerk of the district court of said county had no authority to issue the execution in question in this case. If the clerk had no authority to issue said execution it was void, and the sheriff was under no obligation to respect it in any way. In Cutler v. Wadsworth, 7 Conn. 6, the execution recited a judgment rendered on the fourth Tuesday of February, and the record showed a judgment rendered on the second Tuesday of February. It was held that such execution was void, and that the officer to which it was committed was not bound to execute it. In Rider v. Alexander, 1 D. Chip. 267, it was held that where the execution recited a judgment entered at one term, and the record produced to support said execution showed a judgment entered up at another term, such execution was irregular, and all proceedings had under it were void. The law certainly will not require a sheriff, under penalty of amercement, to do a thing which, when done, would be void. In Fulmer v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 42 Kan. 551, 22 Pac. Rep. 561, it is held that, where a plaintiff is seeking to amerce a sheriff for his neglect or failure in returning an execution, the execution to sustain such a proceeding must conform strictly to the judgment rendered. See, also, Fisher v. Franklin, 38 Kan. 251, 16 Pac. Rep. 841. A number of errors were assigned upon the rejection of testimony by the court below, but we think it unnecessary to review them. None of the rejected evidence could in any way have reconciled the variance between the judgment and the execution. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

BY THE COURT. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

RAPID TRANSIT RY. CO.

INJURIES TO PERSON ON RAILROAD TRACK — DECLARATIONS — RES GESTÆ.

1. Where, in an action by an administrator against a railway company for negligently killing his decedent, it appeared that the decedent was passing along the double track of the defendant's road, in a westerly direction, within the limits of a city, and discovered a train coming towards him, and, to avoid said train, stepped from the track upon which he was walking to the one immediately north, and, before he had taken more than two or three steps, was struck and killed by the engine of a train going west, and the accident did not occur in a public street of the city, and the train was not running at an unusual rate of speed, or in violation of any ordinance of the city, and a demurrer was sustained to the evidence by the trial court, held, that it was not error.

2. Declarations, to be admissible as part of the res gestæ, must be contemporaneous with the principal facts which they serve to qualify or explain. State v. Montgomery, 8 Kan. 351, followed.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Wyandotte county; HON. O. L. MILLER, Judge.

Warner, Bean & Hagerman and N. H. Loomis, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This action was brought by Henry N. Tennis, as administrator of the estate of John S. Tennis, deceased, in the district court of Wyandotte county, to recover the sum of $10,000 damages, on account of the alleged negligent killing of the decedent. The record discloses that John S. Tennis was killed under the following circumstances: On the afternoon of August 30, 1887, he was walking on the railroad track of the defendant, in a westerly direction, in Kansas City, some 200 feet from a coal-chute, where engines took on coal. At the point in question there was a double track, located upon a fill, the south side of which sloped downward some 20 or 30 feet to a stream called "Jersey Creek;" the other side of the fill was a few feet above the natural surface of the ground. The general direction of the road was east and west, but west of the coal-chute some distance the railroad curved towards the north. Just prior to the fatal accident the decedent was observed walking westward upon the track used for east-bound trains. A west-bound train was standing at the coal-chute, taking on a supply of fuel. It appears that the deceased was within 30 or 40 feet of this train when it was coaling. About the time he reached a point 200 feet west of the coaling place, an east-bound train came around the curve in front of him. In the mean time the train which had been standing at the coal-chute started westward. To avoid the east-bound train the deceased stepped from the south to the north track, and had not taken more than two or three steps before he was struck and instantly killed by the train going west. The train was running at the rate of 12 miles an hour. The road had been in operation something over a month before the accident. It was admitted upon the trial that the accident complained of did not occur in a public street of the city, and no claim was made that the rate of speed at which the train in question was running was in violation of any ordinance. The case came on for trial on the 23d day of March, 1888, before the court and jury, and upon the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff the defendant interposed a demurrer to the evidence, on the ground that no cause of action had been proved, which was sustained by the court; and the plaintiff below brings the case to this court, alleging that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence, and also in sustaining an objection of the defendant to a question asked by the plaintiff of one of the witnesses, as to what statement the engineer made in regard to the accident.

The first and principal contention of the plaintiff in error is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence; that where the injury occurred was a sort of thoroughfare, where men, women, and children had been in the habit of walking; that the train on the north track was being run at a wanton and reckless rate of speed, and that the decedent was run over and killed without any notice or warning whatever. The defendant in error insists that the testimony of the plaintiff showed that Tennis was a trespasser upon the defendant's right of way, and the negligence of the deceased was the direct cause of his death; that there is nothing in the evidence to show willfulness or wantonness upon the part of the railway company; and that the demurrer was properly sustained. Was the decedent killed under such circumstances as to indicate that his death resulted from negligence? If so, the demurrer should have been overruled. The law of this jurisdiction has been settled that a railroad company has the exclusive right to occupy, use, and enjoy its railway track; and such exclusive right is absolutely necessary to enable it to properly perform its duties; and any person walking upon a track of a railway, without the consent of the company, is held in law to be there wrongfully, and, therefore, to be a trespasser; and, in case of an injury happening to such person so trespassing upon it from the movement or operation of the cars of the company over it, he is without remedy, unless it be proved by affirmative evidence that the injuries resulted from culpable negligence after the deceased was noticed upon the track. Mason v. Railway Co., 27 Kan. 83.

We do not think the evidence indicated that the public had acquired any right to the railroad track as a thoroughfare, with the consent of the railway company. The road had been in operation but a short time, and it could hardly be contended that the use of the track had been acquired by prescription. The settled policy of the law is to make the track of a railroad, which is exclusively the road-way of the company, and upon which cars are operated by steam and kindred agencies, clear of all obstruction which might impede the free and exclusive use of the track, for the purpose for which it was constructed. There seems to be sound reason for this policy. It is stated by Mr. Justice PAXSON in the case of Mulherrin v. Railroad Co., 81 Pa. St. 366: "We hold these corporations to a strict line of responsibility whenever passengers are injured by accidents to their trains. It follows that we should be equally emphatic as to their control of their tracks. Except at crossings, where the public have a right of way, a man who steps his foot upon a railroad track does so at his peril. The company have not only a right of way, but such right is exclusive at all times and for all purposes. This is necessary, not only for the proper protection of the company's rights, but also for the safety of the traveling public. It is not right that the lives of hundreds of persons should be placed in peril for the convenience of a single foolhardy man, who desires to walk upon the track. In England it is a penal offense for a man to be found unlawfully upon the track of a railroad. It would add materially to the public safety were there a similar law here." The law would have a different application where a railroad track was laid in a public street. The rights of the public and the railroad company, respecting the use or the same, would be mutual. Railway Co. v. Phillips, 112 Ind. 59, 13 N. E. Rep. 132. It is claimed that the place where the decedent was killed was almost a public thoroughfare, and made so by people passing up and down the track; and that it was gross negligence for the defendant to run its trains at such a high rate of speed as to endanger the lives of persons walking upon its road. Admitting that such was the case, still a duty rested upon the decedent to keep a sharp lookout for trains from both directions. He must have known that trains passed over the line at frequent intervals. He certainly knew of the train at the coal-chute, and the direction in which it was going. He could see the condition of the fill in front of him, and determine whether it was a safe place to venture or not. The evidence was to the effect that he saw the east-bound train coming around the curve, and stepped from the south to the north track, but a few feet in front of the west-bound train. We think the engineer of this train had the right to assume that the decedent would get off the track in time to avoid danger, and there would not be willfulness in letting his train move on. We think the fact that he did leave one track and pass to the other strengthened the engineer in this assumption, that the man would avoid the danger from the approaching train, and there would be no necessity for his giving any signals or stopping his train. Again, the evidence clearly indicated that the decedent stepped but a few feet in front of the moving train; that he had taken but two or three steps before the engine struck him. A signal would have been of no avail, and the train could not have been checked in time to prevent the accident. It is now the settled rule in this and other states, where the plaintiff seeks to recover for injuries on the ground of defendant's negligence, that, if the ordinary negligence of the plaintiff directly or proximately contributed to the injury, he cannot recover, unless the injury was intentionally or wantonly caused by the defendant. Railway Co. v. Adams, 33 Kan. 427, 6 Pac. Rep. 529, and authorities there cited. Whenever persons undertake to use a railroad track as a footway, they are supposed to do so with full knowledge and understanding of its dangers, and they assume the risk of all its perils. Railroad Co. v. State, 62 Md. 479; McLaren v. Railroad Co., 8 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 219; Railroad Co. v. Goldsmith, 47 Ind. 43; Railroad Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 702; Railroad Co. v. Jones, Id. 442; 1 Thomp. Neg. 453, 459; Morrissey v. Railroad Co., 126 Mass. 377; Railroad Co. v. Monday, 49 Ark. 262, 4 S. W. Rep. 782; Williams v. Railroad Co., 72 Cal. 120, 13 Pac. Rep. 219; Railroad Co. v. Hummel, 44 Pa. St. 378. In a recent case decided by the supreme court of California, where the decedent, while walking along a railroad track without license, was run into and killed a distance of 150 yards from a crossing behind him, from which direction the train was coming, the engine was in a reversed position, and there was no head-light or cow-catcher on the tender; the bell was not rung, nor was the whistle blown at the crossing, though provided for by statute. Had such signals been given, decedent would probably have heard them, and escaped injury. He was not seen by the engineer until after the accident. It was held that the decedent was a mere trespasser, to whom the company owed no duty, and therefore it is not liable. Toomey v. Railroad Co., (Cal.) 24 Pac. Rep. 1074. The rule has been stated by Judge Cooley, in his book on Torts, p. 660: "The general duty of a railway company to run its trains with care becomes a particular duty to no one until he is in a position to have a right to complain of the neglect. The tramp who steals a ride cannot insist that it is a duty to him. Neither can he, when he makes a highway of the railway track, and is injured by the train." It was held in Iowa that a railroad company did not owe to trespassers upon its track such care that an engineer was required to look out for them; but, after discovering them, it would be negligence not to use every means to avoid inflicting injury. Masser v. Railroad Co., 68 Iowa, 602, 27 N. W. Rep. 776. We think, under the facts in this case, and the great weight of authorities, the demurrer to the evidence was properly sustained.

It is next contended that the court erred in sustaining an objection to a question asked one of the witnesses for the plaintiff, as to what the engineer said about the accident. The transaction was complete. The train had run a little more than the length of itself, and stopped, and was standing some little distance from where the man was struck, and the witness stated that some five minutes after he walked across to the place; and he was asked if he had any conversation with the engineer, which was objected to and sustained. To have made the statement of the engineer admissible the declaration attempted to be drawn from him must have constituted a part of the res gestæ; that is, the statement must have been connected with, and part of, the transaction in question. Any statement the engineer might have made would have been concerning a past and completed transaction, and hence would have been incompetent evidence against the railway company to prove the manner and cause of the decedent's death. The fact that the statement was made in five minutes after the accident would not render the evidence admissible, if the conversation referred to a past occurrence, and not connected with the res gestæ. "There must be concurrence in point of time between the act and the declaration; otherwise it is but a narrative of what has been, or an assertion of what will be, done." State v. Montgomery, 8 Kan. 351; Swenson v. Aultman, 14 Kan. 273; State v. Pomeroy, 25 Kan. 350; Jenkins v. Lewis, Id. 479; Railway Co. v. Fray, 35 Kan. 700, 12 Pac. Rep. 98; Dodge v. Childs, 38 Kan. 529, 16 Pac. Rep. 815. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

HENTIG v. SOUTHWESTERN MUT. BEN.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Feb. 7, 1891.)

— ESTABLISHMENT OF LIEN.

1. An action against a mutual life insurance association and a person holding an insurance certificate in such association, to enforce an attorney's lien for services for the holder of such certificate, cannot be joined with an action on an official bond given by the officers of the association, under chapter 131 of the Session Laws of 1885.

2. In a petition against an assessment insurance association to establish an attorney's lien, it is necessary to allege that the funds upon which a lien is claimed were a part of the proceeds of the assessment made on account of the death of the person named in the certificate, upon which the judgment had been rendered where-in the services had been performed, or allege that the company had funds sufficient to pay the claim out of the surplus fund of the company.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

F. G. Hentig and E. A. Austin, for plaintiff in error. Johnson, Martin & Keeler, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This action was commenced in the district court of Shawnee county to enforce the payment of an attorney's lien. As a first cause of action, the claim is made in the "amended and consolidated" petition that one George P. White held a certificate of membership in the Southwestern Mutual Benevolent Association on the life of his wife, who had died, for the sum of $2,500; that the plaintiff, who was a practicing attorney, had made a contract with White, whereby it was agreed between them that the plaintiff was to collect said certificate, and for his services was to have a sum equal to 50 per cent. of the amount of said certificate; that he sued the insurance company, and obtained a judgment thereon for $1,360 on the 26th day of July, 1886; that on the 17th day of November, 1885, the insurance company had money in its hands due and owing the said George P. White, and the plaintiff gave a notice to the company in writing that he claimed a lien upon the money in its hands due White, to the amount of $1,250, for his fees; that he filed a copy of said notice with the clerk of the district court; that the insurance company afterwards settled with White, without his knowledge, by an assignment of the judgment to J. W. Brown, one of the defendants, who caused a satisfaction to be entered of said judgment. For a second cause of action, the plaintiff declares upon a bond given by the insurance company, under chapter 131 of the Session Laws of 1885; and, as a breach of the bond, says "that they failed, neglected, and refused to proper payment and disbursement make of the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars, which came into their hands, to the legitimate purposes of the association, but caused the same to be paid to George P. White and J. W. Brown." The action is against the association and the bondsmen and George P. White, but no service was made upon him. A demurrer was interposed to this petition on the ground that several causes of action were improperly joined, and that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff in error brings the case here, and asks a reversal of this ruling of the court below.

A number of errors are assigned to the rulings of the court prior to the filing of the last amended petition. It is not necessary for us to pass upon them, because the plaintiff, in filing his pleading and complying with the order of the court, waived any right to complain of the order. Having filed his "consolidated and amended petition," no substantial right of his has been thereby prejudicially affected. Lindh v. Crowley, 26 Kan. 47.

Can the cause of action for an attorney's lien be united with an action on the bond given by the association, under chapter 131 of the Session Laws of 1885? This court has held that the bond given is an official bond, and not a corporation bond. The promise is made for the officers, and not the association itself. Association v. Lemke, 40 Kan. 664, 20 Pac. Rep. 512. The giving of this bond is a statutory requirement, and constitutes one separate and distinct transaction, and is in no way connected with the transaction out of which the claim of the plaintiff arose, in which he claims an attorney's lien. His contract with White, his suit against the association, and his effort to obtain a lien grew out of one transaction; but the liability on the official bond is an entirely different transaction. Each cause of action attempted to be stated in the pleading did not arise out of the same transaction or the same thing done. One was the failure of White to make proper compensation to his attorney, and the neglect of the association, after notice given, to pay the amount claimed; all growing out of the contract made with White for certain services. The other is the official liability of certain persons in giving a bond that certain officers of an insurance association will faithfully perform what will be required of them during their terms of office. It is quite apparent that each cause of action arose out of entirely different transactions. It will be seen, too, at a glance, that the several defendants are not charged in the same character. The defendants in each cause of action must be the same; that is, all the parties must be affected by each cause of action. The language of section 83 of the Code is: "But the causes so united must all belong to one of these causes, and must affect all of the parties to the action, except in actions to enforce mortgages or other liens." The first cause of action in this case does not affect the bondsmen, who are alleged to be liable in a representative character. It is one of the prerequisites to the uniting of different causes of action that all of the causes of action must affect all the parties to the action. Pomeroy's Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 479; Bliss, Code Pl. § 123; Harsh v. Morgan, 1 Kan. 293. We think the plaintiff failed to state facts sufficient in his first cause of action. The allegation that the association had money in its hands due White, at a certain time, was not sufficient to require the defendants to answer. It appears from the petition that one of the defendants was an insurance company, organized on the mutual plan, and the only way it had of raising funds to pay a particular certificate was to make assessments upon the members when a death occurred; and there is no allegation in the petition that the sum of money on hand was derived from an assessment made on account of the particular certificate sued upon in the original action against the association. The officers of the association could only be required to pay the particular loss out of the funds derived from the assessment made on account of it, unless it was shown that they had a surplus fund in the treasury of the association out of which it could be paid. The officers of such societies are trustees of the funds of the association, and should be held to a strict account of each particular fund. We think the demurrer was properly sustained.

It appears from the record that no service was made upon the defendant George P. White. We think he is a necessary party in that branch of this action in regard to the establishment of the plaintiff's right to an attorney's lien, and would suggest that service should be made upon him before further action is taken in the case. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CHICAGO, K. & N. RY. CO. v. CITY OF MANHATTAN et al.

RAILROAD AID BONDS—DEPOT FACILITIES—LIMITING ISSUE.

Section 5, c. 99, Sess. Laws 1885, (paragraph 797, Gen. St. 1889,) does not control or limit the amount of bonds to be issued under the provisions of chapter 67, Sess. Laws 1886, (paragraph 1305, Gen. St. 1889,) authorizing cities of the first and second class to issue bonds for the purpose of aiding railroad companies in securing depot grounds and terminal facilities.

Original proceeding in mandamus.

M. A. Low, J. D. McFarland, and John E. Hessin, for plaintiff. Sam Kimball, for defendant.

HORTON, C. J. This is an original action of mandamus to compel the mayor and council of the city of Manhattan to issue to the Chicago, Kansas & Nebraska Railway Company $15,000 of bonds of that city. The action is submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, which shows that on the 17th day of June, 1887, a petition was presented to the mayor and council of the said city of Manhattan, signed by more than two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of said city, praying that an election be held to vote upon the question of issuing the bonds; that the mayor and council acted upon the petition, and ordered the election; that proclamation was made; that on the 5th day of July, 1887, the election was held; that the returns of the votes cast at the election were canvassed, and by the canvass it was ascertained and declared that the proposition to vote the bonds had carried by a majority of 22 votes; that the election was held, and the bonds voted, under and pursuant to chapter 67 of the Laws of 1886, commonly known as the "Terminal Facilities Act;" that all of the provisions and conditions of the act were duly complied with; and that afterwards the plaintiff demanded of the defendants that they issue the bonds, which was refused. The assessed value of all taxable property within the city of Manhattan, as shown by the assessment books and records in the office of the county clerk of the county of Riley, for the year 1886, is the sum of $594,000; for the year 1887, the sum of $607,400; for the year 1888, the sum of $723,640. The defendants refused to issue the bonds upon the grounds—First, that the house and senate journals of 1886 show affirmatively that no law was at that time passed entitled "An act to authorize cities of the first and second class to issue bonds," etc., known as "House Bill No. 301;" and, second, that, if they issue the $15,000 of bonds voted at the election, the bonded indebtedness of the city would then exceed 10 per cent. of the value of the taxable property within the city, and that, by virtue of section 5 of chapter 99 of the Laws of 1885, cities of the second class are prohibited from issuing bonds in excess of that amount. Paragraph 797, Gen. St. 1889. The title of the act of 1886 in the enrolled bill on file in the office of the secretary of state reads: "An act to authorize cities of the first and second class to issue bonds for the purpose of aiding railroad companies in securing and paying for lands for right of way, depot grounds, and terminal facilities." The body of the act embraces cities of the second class, as well as cities of the first class.

Upon the authority of State v. Francis, 26 Kan. 724, it must be held that the title of the act of 1886 was properly agreed to, and that the act was properly passed and approved. In that case it was decided, among other things, that "the enrolled statute on file in the office of the secretary of state is very strong presumptive evidence of the regularity of the passage of the statute, and of its validity; and it is conclusive evidence of such regularity and validity, unless the journals of the legislature, clearly, conclusively, and beyond all doubt, show that the act was not passed regularly or legally." The serious question in this case is whether the limitation of the bonded indebtedness of a city of the second class to 10 per cent. of the assessed value of its taxable property, as prescribed by section 5, c. 99, of the Session Laws of 1885, (paragraph 797, Gen. St. 1889,) limits the amount of the aid that may be extended to a railroad company under chapter 67, Sess. Laws 1886, (paragraph 1305, Gen. St. 1889.) In 1872 the legislature of the state passed an act to incorporate cities of the second class, and to repeal former acts. Section 40 of that act reads: "At no time shall all the bonded indebtedness of any city of the second class exceed twenty per cent. of the assessed value of all the taxable property within said city, as shown by the assessment books of the year previous to the one on which the last issue of bonds was made." In 1885 the legislature amended said section 40 so as to read: "At no time shall the bonded indebtedness of any city of the second class exceed ten per cent. of the assessed value of all the taxable property within said city, as shown by the assessment books of the year previous to the one on which the last issue of bonds was made: provided, bonds issued for improvements for which a special tax is levied upon the property improved shall not be included in estimating said bonded indebtedness: and provided, further, that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the issuing of bonds to refund existing bonded indebtedness." The act of 1872 made no provision for cities of the second class to subscribe for stock to any railroad company, or to issue bonds for the purpose of aiding any railroad company. An examination of the various provisions of the act of 1872, and the amendments thereto, renders it doubtful whether that act was intended to apply to any bonds except those referred to or issued under that act. We need not decide this question at this time. Chapter 67, Sess. Laws 1886, is the latest statute, and is complete in itself. It covers the entire subject-matter therein referred to. It contains a limitation upon the amount of bonds to be issued to any railroad company. This is as follows: "That no city of the first class shall extend aid under this act to any one railroad company to a greater amount than thirty thousand dollars, and no city of the second class shall extend aid under this act to any one railroad company to a greater amount than twenty thousand dollars: provided, that aid shall not be extended to any railroad under this act which has received aid from the same city under any former act." We think, therefore, that section 5, c. 99, Sess. Laws 1885, does not control or limit the provisions of said chapter 67, Sess. Laws 1886. State v. Studdt, 31 Kan. 245, 1 Pac. Rep. 635; State v. Commissioners, 35 Kan. 150, 10 Pac. Rep. 535; Quincy v. Jackson, 113 U. S. 332, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544; Com. v. Commissioners, 40 Pa. St. 348; Amey v. Allegheny City, 24 How. 364. Upon a careful consideration of all the statutes referred to, we are of opinion that the reasons of the defendants for the refusal to issue the bonds voted are not sufficient in law. The peremptory writ of mandamus will be issued as prayed for. All the justices concurring.

PRACTICE—SERVICE OF AMENDED PETITION.

1. Under section 136, a plaintiff who is compelled to file an amended petition by an order of the court, such petition being challenged by a motion directed against it, is not required to serve a copy of the amended petition on the defendant.

2. A defendant who files a motion directed against the petition of the plaintiff is bound to take notice of the ruling of the court on said motion.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Harper county; J. T. HERICK, Judge.

SIMPSON, C. This action was commenced in the district court of Harper county on the 29th day of September, 1886, upon an alleged contract for services that Stevens claims that Cross employed him to perform. On the 14th day of October Cross filed a motion to require Stevens to amend his petition, and state whether or not the contract was a written or verbal one. At the time the motion was filed, we think the record shows that the court was in session, and continued for some time, but no one called the motion. At the January term, 1887, the attorney of Stevens called the attention of the court to the motion, and it was sustained, and leave was given Stevens to amend his petition within 10 days from the 5th day of January, with leave to Cross to plead to the amended petition within 10 days. At the time this motion was called to the attention of the district court and the order made to file an amended petition, neither Cross nor his attorneys were present. Stevens caused an amended petition to be filed on the 7th day of January, 1887. The April term of the court passed by, and at the June term, Stevens produced his witness. A default was entered, and judgment rendered in favor of Stevens for $663 and costs. Neither Cross nor his attorneys had knowledge of the rendition of such judgment until a day or two before the 7th day of July, but on that day Cross filed a motion in said action to set aside said judgment, and for leave to file an answer to the amended petition. This motion was supported by the affidavits of Cross and Hatton & Ruggles, his attorneys, showing that none of them had knowledge or notice that their motion to compel Stevens to amend his petition had been sustained, or that the plaintiff had obtained leave to amend his petition. The motion of Cross to compel an amendment to the petition of Stevens was noted on the motion docket in these words: "Oct. 14, 1886. George B. Stevens vs. George D. Cross. Motion to require plaintiff to state in his petition whether contract or agreement was in writing or verbal. HATTON & RUGGLES." On the margin of the motion docket there was an entry in the handwriting of the judge of the court, as follows: "Jan. 5, 1887. Sustained. 10 days given to file amended petition; 10 days to defendant to plead." A somewhat similar entry was made by the clerk in the "minute docket," but no journal entry was made of the ruling on the motion. Pending the motion to vacate and set aside the final judgment, Stevens filed a motion for a nunc pro tunc entry to be made on the journal of the court, showing that the motion of Cross to the petition had been sustained, and leave given to file an amended petition, and 10 days allowed within which to plead to the amended petition. The court sustained the motion for the nunc pro tunc order, and overruled the motion to vacate and set aside the judgment. Exceptions to these rulings were saved, and we are asked to review them.

The first proposition of counsel for the plaintiff in error is that a copy of the amended petition should have been served on Cross, and this was not done, and hence Cross had no notice or knowledge of the disposition of his motion. That the only records of the district court that impart notice are an appearance docket, journal, the judgment, and execution dockets. That the entry on the motion docket, or the minute docket of the clerk, does not bind them. They also rely on section 136 of the Code, which provides that "the plaintiff may amend his petition without leave at any time before the answer is filed, without prejudice to the proceedings; but notice of such amendment shall be served on the defendant or his attorney, and the defendant shall have the same time to answer or demur thereto, as to the original petition." This section has no application to the facts presented by this record. In this case a motion was directed against the petition that was sustained by the court, and leave given to file an amended petition within a limited time. The amendment was not a voluntary one, as is contemplated by this section of the Code; and we do not believe, under all the circumstances of this case, that the plaintiff was required to serve notice of the filing of the amended petition. The motion was filed by Cross. It primarily was the duty of his attorneys to call it up for discussion and ruling. If they neglected to do so, the attorneys of Stevens had the right to have it disposed of. They waited for more than a reasonable time before doing so, no attention being paid to it by Cross or his attorneys. They could not indefinitely prolong a case by directing a motion against the petition of the plaintiff, and then absenting themselves, and require notice to be given of its disposition. The power of the court to make its journal speak the truth, and to show the action of the court upon any question, has been so often discussed and maintained that there can no longer be any doubt, but that whenever by mistake, accident, or omission an order has not been entered on its journals, or has been improperly transcribed, or defectively stated, it can be entered or corrected either at the term or at any subsequent term, so that what actually did occur shall truthfully appear. It is clear to us that the court below did not commit error in requiring the nunc pro tunc order to be entered on the journal of the date when the order was made and noted on the motion docket. There was delay in urging the motion; there was negligence in not inquiring about its final disposition. That, in our judgment, excludes any equitable consideration of the motion to vacate and set aside the judgment rendered at the July term against the plaintiff in error, and we feel certain that the court below committed no error, under all the facts of this case, in overruling it. We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

MEIBERGEN v. SMITH, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Feb. 7, 1891.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

When the instructions of the trial court embody the law applicable to the facts, although stated with much verbiage and with frequent repetitions, there is no cause for reversal.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Error from district court, Russell county; S. O. HINDS, Judge.

Robinson & Lawrence and H. L. Pestana, for plaintiff in error. R. G. Hays and W. G. Eastland, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. The material facts are that one M. A. Neff was a merchant possessing a stock of merchandise at Lucas, Russell county, Kan.; that on the 21st day of January, 1888, the defendant in error, as sheriff of that county, levied upon and took possession of such stock of goods by virtue of several writs of attachment against Neff. The plaintiff in error at once replevied the goods, claiming that he had purchased the same in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, before the levy of the attachments. His claim is that one J. W. Huff, president of the Bank of Downs, had a chattel mortgage for $2,400 that was the first lien on said goods; that Huff had taken possession of the goods under and by virtue of the terms of his chattel mortgage; and that he had purchased from Huff. Neff was indebted to various non-resident wholesale merchants in a large sum. The value of the stock of merchandise when Huff took possession was about $3,000. The case was tried to a jury, and answers to special interrogatories, and a verdict, returned as follows:

Findings of fact: "Question 1. Did the plaintiff, Meibergen, at the date of the purchase of the stock of goods in question, know of any indebtedness of M. A. Neff to either Schuster, Hingston & Co., R. L. McDonald & Co., Donald Bros., Kirkendall, Jones & Co., Julius Kuhn, or Englehart, Winning & Co.? Answer. Yes. Q. 2. If question No. 1 is answered in the affirmative, state to which of the above-named parties said Meibergen knew said M. A. Neff was indebted at the time of his said purchase. A. Julius Kuhn. Q. 3. What was the actual value of the said stock of goods in question at the time plaintiff, Meibergen, bought the same of Huff? $3,000? A. Three thousand dollars. Q. Did Neff transfer the goods to Huff for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding his creditors? A. Yes. Q. Did Meibergen, when he purchased said goods, know of the fraudulent intent of Neff? A. Yes. Q. Were the facts and circumstances surrounding Meibergen, when he purchased said goods, sufficient to put a reasonable prudent man upon inquiry as to Neff's fraudulent intent? A. Yes. Q. Did Meibergen, at the time he purchased these goods, know whether Neff was in debt to anybody except small debts in town? A. Yes. Q. Did Meibergen, when he purchased these goods, know of sufficient facts and circumstances to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry as to whether Neff was in debt to any person, except small debts in town? A. Yes."

Verdict: "Hartog Meibergen, Plaintiff, vs. James E. Smith, Sheriff of Russell County, Kansas. We, the jury, duly impaneled and sworn in this cause, do upon our oaths find that at the commencement of this action the defendant was entitled to the possession of the goods in controversy, and that the actual value of said goods was $3,000; and we do further find that the value of the special ownership of the defendant therein was the sum of $2,269 39-100. FRANK HULETT, Foreman."

A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and the case brought here for review. Two principal questions are discussed by counsel for the plaintiff in error.

1. The first is that the special findings of the jury are not supported by the evidence. The stock of merchandise, which is the subject-matter of this litigation, had been owned by Neff for some months at Lucas, but before that time he had been located at Delhi, and prior to his residence at Delhi he had lived at Downs, where J. W. Huff and the plaintiff in error reside, and where the bank of which Huff is president is located. Huff claims that he loaned Neff money to the amount of $2,800 between October 1, 1887, and December 8, 1887. The only written evidence about this indebtedness is a chattel mortgage given by Neff to Huff on the 15th of January, 1888. This mortgage recites that it was given to secure one note, dated October 10, 1887, for $300; one note, dated November 2, 1887, for $300; one note, dated November 15, 1887, for $1,000; one note, dated November 28, 1887, for $500; and one note, dated December 8, 1887, for $700. Huff claims that he never loaned Neff any money until after Neff moved to Lucas; that he loaned the money on the personal note of Neff, and did not take or demand security. Huff also swore that all these loans were made to Neff at Downs, and that on each of these occasions he paid Neff in currency; did not check it out of the bank; and there is no check or record in the bank or in his private books or papers showing these payments to Neff. A witness testified that he had a talk with Huff at Downs on or about the 15th day of December, in which he asked Huff about the financial standing of Neff; was told by Huff that he knew nothing about it, as Neff did his business at the other bank, (meaning the First National Bank of Downs.) This was after Huff had loaned Neff money, as he claims. Huff and the plaintiff in error went to Lucas on the 17th day of December, stayed with Neff all day, and told the landlord of the hotel at which they stopped that they were traveling salesmen from Chicago. On January 13th, Huff went to Lucas, and, after being there a day or two, telegraphed to plaintiff in error to come. Meibergen goes to Lucas, and is informed that Huff is taking a chattel mortgage, and he wants the plaintiff in error to help invoice the goods; he being a merchant of large experience, while Huff has no knowledge of such goods. The invoice is completed, a chattel mortgage executed by Neff to Huff, that is witnessed by plaintiff in error, and then Huff takes possession, and sells at a loss of several hundred dollars to plaintiff in error, who sends for his son and puts him in charge. There is some evidence tending to show that, at the times Huff claims to have loaned Neff money at Downs, Neff was not away from home, and that, at one of the dates fixed by Huff at which he had personally delivered the money to Neff at Downs, he (Huff) was absent attending court at Mankato. There is some direct and much circumstantial evidence tending to show that the plaintiff in error knew that Neff had many creditors, was practically insolvent, and unable to pay his debts, at the time he purchased the stock of goods from Huff. Indeed, there is abundant evidence tending to sustain the special findings of the jury, and to support the general verdict. Of course, it is largely circumstantial, as the common experience of the profession is that direct proof of commercial fraud is hardly ever produced either before court or jury. Huff's dealing with Neff is not conducted with ordinary business prudence. His loans to Neff of large sums of money, the loans following each other so speedily without security or a demand for security, are not in accordance with business methods. No explanation is offered as to how the proceeds of the loan were disposed of. The knowledge of the loans are confined to Huff alone, so far as the record discloses. He claims to have been making these loans on individual account, and carries about his person large sums of money with which to accommodate Neff whenever he calls upon him. These, probably, are some of the many considerations that controlled the verdict of the jury, and operated on the mind of the court; and they appear to us such strong and natural inferences from the special acts and general conduct of the parties that we deem these and other established facts sufficient to sustain the special findings and the general verdict.

2. The next cause for reversal urged is that the trial court erred in giving to the jury the following instruction, (No. 13.) "That if you find from the evidence that Neff sold, or pretended to sell, the goods in question to J. W. Huff on a pretended or fictitious indebtedness, and that the same was done for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding Neff's creditors, and that Meibergen knew of such fraudulent intent, and bought with such knowledge, or if you should find from the evidence and surrounding circumstances that Meibergen was in a situation that a reasonably prudent man should or would have known of such fraudulent intent, then Meibergen cannot recover in this action. Meibergen could not blind his eyes to the facts and circumstances which surrounded him, and protect himself by the claim that he had no actual or express knowledge of such fraudulent intent. If facts and circumstances came to the knowledge of Meibergen as should have excited the suspicions of and put a prudent man upon inquiry, and that such inquiry would have led to a discovery of the fraudulent intent of Neff in selling said goods to Huff, the law holds Meibergen to be possessed of all such knowledge, in respect to such transaction or fraudulent intent, as such inquiry might have developed. And, if you find from the evidence that Meibergen bought the goods at a price much less than their actual value, then it is for you to say whether or not this fact, together with the other circumstances which came to the knowledge of Meibergen as shown by the evidence, were not sufficient to arouse the suspicions of a reasonably prudent man in his situation, and put him upon inquiry as to why Neff and Huff were selling said goods at a sacrifice." While this instruction is somewhat verbose, and frequent repetitions of the same principle are indulged in, still, stripped of its verbiage, it contains the essence of the law applicable to the state of facts presented by the record. We cannot reverse this case for the errors suggested and urged. We are disposed to think that justice has been done, and that there has been no such serious departure from established rules as compels a new trial. We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

DOUDNA et al. v. HARLAN.

TAX-TITLE—ADVERSE POSSESSION—TAX-SALE—REDEMPTION BY MINORS.

1. A tax-deed valid upon its face starts the statute of limitations provided in paragraph 6995 of the General Statutes of 1889 to running when recorded in the proper county, and, after said statute has fully run in its favor, such deed cannot be overthrown by an action begun thereafter, except by showing that the land was not subject to taxation when listed therefor, or that the taxes have been paid, or the land redeemed, as provided by law.

2. When lands are advertised to be sold for taxes, and at the time of the sale no one bids the amount of the taxes and costs thereon, and the land is bid off by the county treasurer for the county, held, that such "bidding off" constitutes a sale of said land under our statute relating to tax-sales.

3. Paragraph 6977, Gen. St. 1889, provides "that lands of minors, or any interest they may have in any land sold for taxes, may be redeemed at any time before such minor becomes of age, and during one year thereafter." Held, that the right of redemption conferred by this paragraph applies only to lands that belong to minors and lands in which minors have an interest at the time they are sold for taxes.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Labette county; GEORGE CHANDLER, Judge.

F. M. Smith and J. H. Crichton, for plaintiff in error. Case & Glasse, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. Action of ejectment for the possession of lots 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, in block 38, in the city of Chetopa, Labette county, Kan. Defendant admits possession in herself, and alleges that she is the owner of the lots in dispute by virtue of a tax-deed and other conveyances. The case was submitted to the court below without a jury upon the following agreed statement of facts, November 2, 1887: "(1) Before the sale in September, 1875, hereinafter mentioned, the title of the property in controversy in this suit was perfect in Willoughby Doudna, the husband of the plaintiff, Ruth A. Doudna, and the father of the other plaintiffs. (2) Said property was sold for taxes in September, 1875, for the taxes thereon for the year 1874, costs, penalties, and expenses, and was, by the county treasurer of Labette county, at such sale bid off to and for said county. (3) Said Willoughby Doudna died intestate on November 4, 1878, leaving a widow, said Ruth A. Doudna, and four children, who were then minors; and the younger died in March, 1886. The other three children are the plaintiff above named, Mrs. Mattie Bennett, now 23 years of age; Hosea W. Doudna, now 16 years old; and Oliver R. Doudna, now 14 years old. (4) In the month of July, 1880, Lee Clark purchased and took an assignment of the tax-sale certificate of said property on said tax-sale of September, 1875, and in said month of July procured tax-deeds therefor, the records of which, including date of recording, may be used in evidence instead of originals, as hereinafter stipulated; and thereafter he and his wife sold and conveyed said property to one J. L. Van Note, and Van Note and his wife thereafter sold and conveyed said property to said defendant, Emma J. Harlan. The records of these conveyances, including date of recording, may be used in evidence instead of originals. (5) Defendant, Emma J. Harlan, since the purchase of said property improved same to an extent left for further inquiry and determination, if necessary to an adjustment of the rights of the parties to this suit. She is now in the possession of the property, and has been in the possession thereof since this suit. (6) In October, 1886, said plaintiff paid to the county treasurer of said county, for the purpose of redeeming said property, except lot 13, from tax-sale of September, 1875, the sum of $114.60, and received from the treasurer of said county the redemption certificate, which is to be introduced in evidence, to speak and show for itself, and for all purposes for which it is competent. The payment of said money was for and on behalf of said minors, and the money is still in the hands of the treasurer of said county. (7) Said property was no part of the homestead of said Willoughby Doudna nor of his family. That Exhibit A, hereto attached, contains the levies of the taxes for general county purposes and poor and incidental funds for the year therein described and set forth. (8) Said lots 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, and lots 14, 15, and 16, comprise the north-west quarter of said block 36; and in the summer and fall of 1881 said Van Note built a house on lots 15 and 16, and a barn on 12, 13, and 14; and in February, 1882, completed the building of an iron fence in front of all said lots, and part way on each line of said lot 9, and part way on west line of said lot 16, and a wooden fence around balance of said quarter block. This house was burned down in February, 1884." It was likewise admitted on the trial of the cause that more than five years had elapsed from the time of the recording of the tax-deeds under which the defendant claims and the commencement of this action, and that at the time of the sale of the property therein described the plaintiffs had no interest therein other than that Ruth A. Doudna was the wife of Willoughby Doudna, and the other plaintiffs were his children, he then being alive.

The court, upon said statement of facts, found for the defendant, and adjudged that she recover her costs. The plaintiffs objected to the findings of the court, and moved for a new trial, which motion was overruled.

The first contention of the plaintiff in error is that the tax-deed relied upon by the defendants in error is void, and therefore never operative as a transfer of title. Coupled with this is the further contention that, said deed being void, it never did and could not set the five-years statute of limitations to running, and therefore the trial court should have set aside the tax-deed in controversy, and found for the plaintiff in error. In support of this position counsel cite the case of Richards v. Thompson, 43 Kan. 214, 23 Pac. Rep. 106. An examination of that case shows that the tax-deed involved therein was void on its face. It is well settled that a deed void on its face will not set the statute to running. The defect in the deed in that case is patent. The deed itself, and the record thereof, carry with them the evidence of their invalidity, of which the grantee and those who claim under him must take notice; and the five-years statute of limitations prescribed in paragraph 6995 of the General Statutes of 1889 will not run in favor of such a deed. But the defect which renders a deed invalid may not appear upon its face. It may be ascertainable only upon an examination of the proceedings antecedent to the issuance of the deed or the sale. Such a deed carries with it a presumption in favor of the regularity of the conditions precedent thereto, and in such a case our understanding is that it is sufficient to set the statute to running in its favor. In this case it is not insisted that the land was not subject to taxation at the time it was listed. It is admitted the tax was not paid before the sale, and that the land was not redeemed according to law, before the deed was issued. But it is claimed that, as the tax upon which it was sold was in excess of the amount that the commissioners were by law allowed to levy, they had no power to levy the tax upon which the sale was had, and that a deed following a sale on a tax that the commissioners were without jurisdiction to levy could not start the statute of limitations to running in its favor. If there were no question of the statute of limitations involved in the case the showing might be sufficient to avoid the deed. But this court has settled the question, as presented here, against the plaintiff in error, in the case of Edwards v. Sims, 40 Kan. 235, 19 Pac. Rep. 710. In that case Mr. Commissioner SIMPSON, writing the opinion for the court, says: "We have noticed all the objections urged against the tax-deed, and, it not being pretended that the taxes were paid, the land redeemed, or that it was not subject to taxation at the time it was listed, it becomes to us a matter of positive duty, in obedience to the law-making power of the state, to apply the limitation contained in section 141 of the tax law to the facts as shown by the record; and the result is that none of the matters alleged against the deed can be considered by the court, because the deed had been recorded for more than five years before the commencement of this action against the assigns of the tax purchaser for the recovery of the land, and at that time the bar of the statute is complete." In Jordan v. Kyle, 27 Kan. 190, it is held that, "where the land is taxable, and the taxes have not been paid, or the land redeemed as provided by law, and the tax-deed is executed by the officer authorized by law, is regular on its face, contains a perfect description of the land conveyed, and has been of record more than five years before December 3, 1879, the date of the commencement of the suit against the tax purchaser, the bar of the statute of limitations fully attached to said tax-deed before the action was brought." In Maxson v. Huston, 22 Kan. 643, the court held that "a tax-deed regular on its face, containing a perfect description of the land conveyed, and of record the time prescribed by the statute of limitations, is protected by said statute from impeachment by evidence that the description of the land on the assessment roll and in the sale certificate is fatally defective." In this case, Justice BREWER, in promulgating the opinion of the court, very pertinently says: "If the proceedings must be so regular as to make a valid sale before the statute of limitations will start to run upon a tax-deed good upon its face, then the statute has but little virtue in these cases as a statute of repose; for upon a valid sale a valid deed can be compelled, and the statute will rarely be invoked except in cases where it is not needed." See, also, as bearing upon this question: Barr v. Randall, 35 Kan. 126, 10 Pac. Rep. 515; Mack v. Price, 35 Kan. 134, 10 Pac. Rep. 521; Sanger v. Rice, 43 Kan. 580, 23 Pac. Rep. 633. We are referred by counsel for plaintiff to the case of Kemper v. McClelland, 19 Ohio, 327. In that case, however, there was no question of the statute of limitations, and we have no doubt that the court properly avoided the tax-deed, because of the excess of tax upon which the sale was had. If, however, the deed had been valid upon its face, and the five-years statute had run in that case, as in this, the question would have been analogous to the one in the case before us, and the decision would have been different. The tax-deed under which the defendant claims being valid on its face, and having been of record more than five years before the commencement of this action, and it being admitted that the land in controversy was subject to taxation when listed, that the taxes were not paid, and the land not having been redeemed as provided by law, the action to avoid the deed cannot be maintained.

The plaintiff next complains that "the court erred in finding that the bidding off of the lots in controversy by Labette county was a sale." The contention of the plaintiff is that, when the county bids off property at a tax-sale, it does not become a purchaser, but simply bids off property, and holds it until someone pays the taxes and penalties thereon, and takes an assignment of the bid from the county; and that in such case there is no sale of the property until it is assigned by the county to the party paying the county the taxes, penalties, and costs thereon. We do not think this position is tenable. There is but one sale mentioned in the statute, and that very clearly refers to the bidding off of the property at the time it is advertised to be sold for the taxes. Nor do we think it any less a sale, because it is bid off by the treasurer for the county, than when bid off by some person for himself or some other individual. The "bidding off" of the property by the treasurer in the name of the county and for the county has been constantly treated as a sale by the bench and bar of the state. If the county is not a purchaser when property is so bid off, who is the owner in the mean time? The former owner has lost his title, except so far as he has the right of redemption. No third party has obtained any interest therein as yet, and there must become person, natural or artificial, in whom the ownership of the property rests. Besides, if the county has obtained no interest in the property bid off, how can it transfer by assignment any interest therein? We think the county becomes a purchaser at the tax-sale, when, in the absence of other bids equal in amount to the taxes, penalties, and costs against the property, the treasurer bids the property off in the name of the county; and that the redemption period commences to run from the date thereof. Stevens v. Casady, (Iowa,) 12 N. W. Rep. 803.

The third complaint is that the court erred in not permitting the minor plaintiffs to redeem. Paragraph 6977, Gen. St. 1889, so far as it relates to this question, reads as follows: "The lands of minors, or any interest they may have in any lands sold for taxes, may be redeemed at any time before such minor becomes of age, and during one year thereafter." It will be seen that the lands that may be redeemed by minors are lands of said minors sold for taxes, or lands in which minors have some interest when they are sold for taxes. The lots in controversy in this case were not the lands of the minor plaintiffs herein when they were sold, but were the lands of their ancestor, Willoughby Doudna. Nor did the minor plaintiffs in this case have any interest in the lands in controversy at the time they were sold for taxes. We do not think it will do to say that the lands sold for taxes in which minors may subsequently obtain an interest may be redeemed by said minors at any time during their minority and during one year thereafter. If that were the law, then, by a series of transfers, the right of redemption might be prolonged indefinitely. The ancestor, before the right of redemption expired, could transfer the land to his minor child, who, before his right of redemption expired, could transfer to a second minor, and so on without end. The Iowa supreme court has settled the question, so far as that state is concerned, and we believe the construction placed upon the Iowa statute by the court of that state in Stevens v. Casady, supra, was in accord with the meaning of both the statute of that state and of our own. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

BREACH OF WARRANTY—DAMAGES.

1. Shaw & Co., dealers in flaxseed, and Smith, who desired to raise a crop of flax, entered into a contract that Shaw & Co. should furnish and deliver to Smith flaxseed to sow and to raise a crop from it, which crop Shaw & Co. were to purchase from Smith, upon certain terms and conditions stated in the contract. The flaxseed was not present at the time the contract was made. Afterwards, Shaw & Co. furnished and delivered to Smith the flaxseed, which appeared to be good, and which the parties believed to be good, but which in fact was worthless. Smith prepared his ground and sowed the flaxseed, but it did not germinate, and he lost all his time and labor in procuring the seed, and in sowing it, and in preparing the ground for it, and also lost the use of his ground. Held, under such circumstances, that a warranty may be implied upon the part of Shaw & Co. that the flaxseed should be sufficient for the purpose of sowing it and raising a crop from it.

2. And also under the foregoing contract, and the circumstances of the case, held, that Shaw & Co. cannot recover on the contract for the agreed price of the flaxseed, and Smith may recover for all losses necessarily sustained by him by reason of the worthlessness of such seed.

Error from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought before a justice of the peace of Cowley county on January 31, 1887, by G. B. Shaw & Co. against Yates Smith and James W. McClellen, for the recovery of $12, and interest, upon the following instrument in writing, to-wit: "Cambridge, April 30, 1886. On or before the first day of October, 1886, we promise to pay to the order of G. B. Shaw & Co., at their office in Cambridge, twelve dollars, for value received, with interest after maturity, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid. This note is given in part consideration of the sale to Y. Smith of eight bushels flaxseed, by said G. B. Shaw & Co.; and, as a further consideration thereof, we agree to plant 14 acres with said seed, to cultivate, harvest, and clean the same in proper and careful manner, and deliver to G. B. Shaw & Co. at Cambridge, Kansas, on or before the 1st day of December, 1886, the whole crop raised therefrom, at a price mentioned below, per bushel of 56 lbs., for pure and prime flaxseed; flaxseed not pure and prime to be inspected and graded subject to the rules of the St. Louis Merchants' Exchange. And should we sell or trade, or attempt to offer to sell or trade, such crop to any other person or persons than said G. B. Shaw & Co., or order, then the note hereto attached shall immediately become due and payable; and the said G. B. Shaw & Co., or their assigns, are hereby authorized to enter any building or premises without any legal process whatever, and seize and remove such crop whatsoever (and in whosesoever possession) the same may be found, and to pay me the balance on demand, after the amount due upon said note has been deducted, together with all costs and expense incurred, where seizure is necessary; price to be paid per bushel, on basis of pure, to be 35 cents less than St. Louis market price on day of delivery. YATES SMITH. JAMES W. MCCLELLEN." Afterwards the case was taken on appeal to the district court, where the case was tried before the court and a jury, with the result hereafter stated. The plaintiffs' bill of particulars simply set up the foregoing instrument, and asked judgment thereon for $12, and interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from October 1, 1886. The defendants' amended answer thereto and cross-petition alleged that the flaxseed for which the instrument sued on was given was purchased by Smith, for the purpose of sowing it and raising a crop; that it was warranted by the plaintiffs to be good, but that it was worthless; that he (Smith) sowed it, but that it did not germinate; and that he lost his time, labor, and use of his ground; and that he was damaged thereby in the sum of $150. And he asked judgment for that amount, and costs of suit. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs for the sum of $90, and judgment was rendered accordingly; and the plaintiffs, as plaintiffs in error, bring the case to this court for review.

It appears from the evidence that the facts of the case are substantially as follows: The plaintiffs, G. B. Shaw & Co., were dealers in flaxseed at Cambridge, in said Cowley county. Smith went to their place of business about April 20, 1886, and found Joseph Fraley, their agent, in charge. Shaw & Co. did not have any flaxseed on hand, but they were about to order some. Smith told Fraley to order eight bushels for him, for the purpose of sowing it and raising a crop. Fraley told Smith that they would furnish the flaxseed upon the conditions substantially as set forth in the foregoing instrument. Afterwards the flaxseed arrived, and Fraley gave notice to Smith. Smith then, on April 30, 1886, went to Cambridge and received the seed, about 8 bushels in amount, inclosed in sacks, from Fraley, and took it home and sowed it upon about 12 acres of ground. The seed appeared to be good, and Fraley and Smith believed it to be good, but in fact it was not good, and it did not germinate; and Smith lost all his time and labor in procuring it, and in preparing the ground for sowing it, and in sowing it, and he got no crop, and lost the use of his ground. And upon these facts the jury found in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs, and assessed the defendants' damages at $90, as aforesaid. The only questions now involved in the case are as follows: (1) Under the contract between the parties, and under the circumstances of the case, was there any such implied warranty on the part of Shaw & Co., respecting the sufficiency of the flaxseed for the purposes of sowing it and raising a crop, that the plaintiffs may be defeated in their action on the aforesaid written instrument? (2) If so, then under such contract and warranty and circumstances, may the defendants, Smith and McClellan, or rather Smith, recover damages for Smith's losses, necessarily occasioned by reason of the worthlessness of the flaxseed? (3) And, if so, then what is the measure of Smith's damages? The maxim of the common law, chveat emptor, is the general rule applicable to purchasers and sales of personal property so far as the quality of the property is concerned; and, under such maxim, the buyer, in the absence of fraud, purchases at his own risk, unless the seller gives him an express warranty, or unless, from the circumstances of the sale, a warranty may be implied. In the present case no express warranty was given, and the question then arises, was there any implied warranty? At the time when the contract for the purchase and sale of the flaxseed was entered into, such seed was not present so that it could be inspected by the purchaser, and, when it arrived and was delivered to him, the defect in the seed was not apparent, and was probably not discoverable by any ordinary means of inspection, and it was not discovered until after it was sowed, and when it failed to germinate. When the original contract for the purchase and sale of the flaxseed was made, the flaxseed was purchased and sold for the particular purpose, known to both the buyer and the seller, of sowing it in a field, and of raising a crop from it; and therefore this purpose was a part of the contract, and demanded that the seed should be sufficient for such purpose. It, in effect, constituted a warranty on the part of the seller that the seed should be the kind of seed had in contemplation by both the parties when the contract was made. The purchaser had to rely upon the seller's furnishing to him the kind of seed agreed upon, and the seller, in effect, agreed that the seed furnished should be the kind of seed agreed upon. The entire contract when made was executory, and it was to be executed and performed afterwards, and to be performed in parts and at different times. The seller was first to furnish the seed, and he did so in about 10 days after the contract was made, and of course the seed was to be a kind of seed that would grow. The purchaser was afterwards to sow it and to raise a crop, and afterwards the purchaser was to sell, and the seller was to buy, the crop, upon certain terms and conditions expressed in the contract. We think there was an implied warranty on the part of the seller that the seed should be sufficient for the purpose for which it was bought and sold. Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. Law, 262, 38 N. J. Law, 496; Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61; White v. Miller, 7 Hun, 427, 71 N. Y. 118; Whitaker v. McCormick, 6 Mo. App. 114. We also think that the purchaser may recover damages from the seller for all the losses necessarily sustained by the purchaser, by reason of the worthlessness of the flaxseed furnished by the seller. See the authorities above cited, and also the following: Passenger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634; Flick v. Wetherbee, 20 Wis. 392; Ferris v. Comstock, 33 Conn. 513; Randall v. Raper, El. & El. 84. And it is not claimed that the purchaser in the present case recovered for more than the foregoing losses. The claim is that the purchaser had no right to recover at all, and that the seller had the right to recover on the instrument sued on. No other questions are presented. We think no material error was committed in the case, and the judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Sedgwick county; C. REEN, Judge.

Adams & Adams, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. On the 22d day of August, 1887, this action was commenced in the district court of Sedgwick county, by the Wichita Mercantile Company against J. H. Mann on an open account to recover the sum of $812.71. An order of attachment was issued and levied upon a stock of groceries, fixtures, delivery wagon, safe, pony, etc., belonging to Mann. A receiver was appointed to take charge of and dispose of the attached property. On the 19th of September, 1888, the plaintiff in error asked to be made a party to the suit, and be permitted to file an interplea, claiming to have a valid and subsisting lien on the property attached by virtue of a chattel mortgage executed by J. H. Mann to L. A. Anderson, and by him assigned to the plaintiff in error. Leave was granted to answer, and the bank set up its claim to the property attached under this mortgage, executed by Mann to Anderson on the 7th day of May, 1887, and filed the same day in the office of the register of deeds of Sedgwick county. The property was described in the mortgage as follows: "All of the stock of groceries, queen's-ware, flour, canned goods, meats, lard, syrup, vinegar, tobacco, cigars, etc.; one Mosler, Bauham & Co. iron safe; one Ludlow delivery wagon; one Texas pony, buckskin color; four show-cases,—one six-foot oval front, two three-foot oval front, one three-foot square front; one Enterprise coffee-mill; one platform scale, (Fairbanks;) three counter scales; all the fixtures belonging to the stock of groceries bought this day from L. A. Anderson; also all goods added to said stock from this date, situated in a frame building on East Oak street, number 728, owned by S. J. Custater." The consideration expressed in the mortgage was $407. Fifty dollars had been paid upon said debt, leaving a balance due of $373.28. The note was made payable at No. 728 Oak street, in Wichita. The Wichita Mercantile Company denied that the bank had any claims to the property; that the mortgage in question was void as against the mercantile company, and was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Mann. The case, under the issues joined, was submitted to the court, and a finding was made that the mortgage was void, and judgment was rendered for the mercantile company. The Sedgwick City Bank brings the case here for review.

It seems from the evidence the mortgage was given for the balance due Anderson for the purchase price of the stock of goods and fixtures, and was for a valid consideration. The only theory upon which it could be held void was based on the fact that Mann was permitted to go on and sell the stock of goods at retail. The mortgage did not contain any provision for an accounting for the proceeds of the sale, and the claim is that there was an agreement outside of the mortgage permitting the mortgagor to sell in the ordinary course of business, and account for the proceeds of the sales from time to time. The evidence clearly indicates that the mortgage was given in good faith; and it appears from the evidence of the mortgagee that the mortgagor was to pay on the debt, out of the sale of the grocery stock, all the money he could spare out of the business, once a month or oftener. This, we think, brings the case within the rule laid down in the case of Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 128: "Where a mortgage is given on a stock of goods, with a stipulation for possession thereof by the mortgagor, and by agreement outside the mortgage the mortgagor is permitted to continue disposing of the goods in the ordinary course of business, and to use a portion of the proceeds thereof in the support of his family, paying the remainder over in discharge of the mortgage debt, the whole transaction is not thereby, as matter of law, rendered fraudulent and void as against creditors and subsequent purchasers, but will be upheld or condemned, according as the arrangement is entered into and carried out in good faith or not." See, also, Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612; Muse v. Lehman, 30 Kan. 514, 1 Pac. Rep. 804; Howard v. Rohlfing, 36 Kan. 357, 13 Pac. Rep. 566; Whitson v. Griffiths, 39 Kan. 211, 17 Pac. Rep. 801. The mortgage described certain property outside of the stock of goods, consisting of a pony, wagon, scales, counters, etc., and we see no reason why the mortgage should not have been upheld as to the specific personal property described. We do not think the mortgage was void because it contained a clause which purported to extend the lien of the mortgage over subsequently acquired property. Having been given in good faith, it would cover the property actually in existence at the time the mortgage was executed; and, as to such property, we think the mortgage should have been upheld. Yates v. Olm- sted, 56 N. Y. 362. We recommend a reversal of the judgment.

CITY OF KANSAS CITY v. BRADBURY.

DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS—NOTICE OF DEFECT—INSTRUCTIONS—SPECIAL FINDINGS.

1. Where a city is sued for injuries resulting from a defect in a sidewalk, it must appear either that the city had notice of the defect or that it was a patent defect and had continued so long that notice might reasonably be inferred, or that the defect was one which, with reasonable and proper care, should have been ascertained and remedied. Jansen v. Atchison, 16 Kan. 358, and cases there cited.

2. An incorporated city, which negligently leaves one of its sidewalks out of repair, by reason whereof a person, without fault or negligence on his part, is injured, is liable to such party in damages for the injury so sustained. Ft. Scott v. Brothers, 20 Kan. 455; Gould v. Topeka, 32 Kan. 485, 4 Pac. Rep. 823.

3. If a city carelessly and negligently permits defects to exist in one of its sidewalks, no matter how caused, after notice thereof to the city, or for so long a time that notice is presumable, then it becomes liable, if a person is injured thereby without fault or negligence on his part. City of Atchison v. King, 9 Kan. 550.

4. If the instructions of the court cover the entire ground, and inform the jury upon all matters necessary for their determination, and inform them correctly, this is sufficient.

5. Either party has a right to a written finding of the jury upon any material question of fact involved in the case, but where a verdict is returned for the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries, and the trial court refuses to submit to the jury, at the instance of the defendant, "what sum the plaintiff is entitled to recover, on account of money paid out for medicine and the services of a physician," held, such refusal is not a sufficient ground for the reversal of the judgment, if the evidence of the plaintiff as to the expenses for medicine and medical attendance is uncontradicted, and therefore undisputed.

Error from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

On the 27th day of January, 1887, Mary J. Bradbury commenced her action against the city of Kansas City, to recover $10,000 for personal injuries alleged to have been received by her on the 29th day of August, 1886, on Seventh street, in that city, by reason of a loose board or plank in the sidewalk upon that street flying up, tripping, and throwing her down. Trial had at the September term of the court for 1887, before the court, with a jury. The court instructed the jury as follows: "The plaintiff in her petition alleges, in substance, that the defendant is a municipal corporation, and that it was the duty of defendant to keep the streets in repair and safe, one of its streets being, as alleged, called 'Seventh Street,' in the original city of Armourdale, now a part of defendant city, Kansas City, Kan.; that the said defendant, the city, failed to construct a sidewalk in said street of sufficient scantling and boards, and that the work was unskillfully performed, and that both in material and workmanship it was insufficient, unsafe, and dangerous for public travel, and that said defendant knowingly permitted said sidewalk to be and remain out of repair in allowing boards on said sidewalk to become loose and unfastened; and further alleges that on or about the 29th day of August, 1886, while plaintiff was walking on said sidewalk, in the exercise of ordinary care and caution, unfastened boards in said sidewalk, tipped up under her feet, causing her to fall with violence upon said sidewalk, by reason of which she received the injuries complained of, to the damage of plaintiff, as she alleges, in the sum of ten thousand dollars. The defendant, answering the petition, denies each and every allegation thereof, except that defendant is a municipal corporation as alleged, which defendant admits. And the defendant for a further answer says that the injuries of plaintiff, if any, she received by the want of care and negligence of plaintiff directly contributing thereto. Second. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, and she must make out her case by a preponderance of the evidence. By 'preponderance of evidence' is not meant the mere greater number of witnesses upon the one side or the other, but that evidence which is most convincing and satisfactory to the minds of the jurors. In determining upon which side the preponderance of the evidence is, the jury may take into consideration the opportunities of the several witnesses for seeing and knowing the things about which they testify; their conduct and demeanor while testifying; their interest, if any, or want of interest, if any, in the result of the suit; the probability or improbability of the truth of their several statements, in view of all the other evidence and other facts and circumstances appearing upon the trial; and from all the circumstances determine the weight or preponderance of the evidence. The jury are the sole judges of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. Third. If the jury believe from the evidence that any witness has willfully and corruptly testified falsely concerning any material matter in dispute, they may disregard the whole or any portion of the evidence of such witness. There is no inflexible rule interposed between the witnesses and the jury, requiring the jury to accept or reject all the testimony of any witness. Fourth. Before the plaintiff can recover a judgment in this action, it must appear by a preponderance of the evidence (1) that the plaintiff, Mary J. Bradbury, was injured as the result of a defect in the sidewalk on said Seventh street, in the defendant city, as set out in her petition; (2) that said city or its officers were negligent in permitting said sidewalk to remain in said unsafe condition at the time said plaintiff was injured. To charge the defendant with negligence, it must appear that the proper officers of said city had notice of the unsafe condition of said sidewalk in time to have prevented the injury to said plaintiff by falling on said defective sidewalk, (if you find she was so injured,) or that, by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care and diligence, they could have known of the unsafe condition of the sidewalk. Fifth. You are instructed that it is not necessary that the defendant city should have had actual notice of the unsafe and dangerous condition of the sidewalk, if you find that the sidewalk was unsafe. If you find that said condition of said sidewalk existed a sufficient length of time before the injury to plaintiff to have enabled the defendant city or its officers and agents, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, to have known of the existence thereof, and remedied the same, then the law implies a notice to the defendant city of the existence of the condition. Sixth. The city is liable not only for injuries occasioned by negligently constructing defective sidewalks on its streets, or by causing such defects in them after they are constructed, but also for negligently permitting them to remain in a dangerous or unsafe condition, no matter how such condition was caused. Any person traveling upon a street has a right to use any portion of the street or sidewalk for that purpose, not already otherwise in use, and a person traveling upon a street or sidewalk of a city has a right to assume that such street or sidewalk is in a safe condition, and to act upon that assumption, relying upon the belief that the city has performed its duty and placed and maintained such street or sidewalk in a safe condition. If the jury find from the evidence that said plaintiff is entitled to recover herein for the injuries complained of in her said petition, she will be entitled to a verdict for an amount which shall be full compensatory damages for the loss of time from the performance of her usual and ordinary labors and duties, the expenses necessarily incurred for medicines and medical attendance, and for the physical pain which has resulted from the injury up to the time of the commencement of the action; and, if you find from the evidence that said plaintiff is still disabled from such injury, such further damages as appear from the evidence to be the natural and probable result of such injuries, taking into consideration the permanency or probable duration of the same, not exceeding in all the sum of ten thousand dollars. Seventh. In order for the plaintiff to recover in this action, she must satisfy the jury from the evidence that she received her injuries, (if you find she received any injuries) from defects in the sidewalk of the defendant city, at the place and of the character and in the manner set out in her petition, and that such defects were of a character that they could be discovered by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence. Eighth. By reasonable and ordinary care and diligence is meant that degree of care and prudence which an ordinarily careful and prudent man would be expected to use under similar circumstances."

At the instance of the defendant, the court instructed the jury as follows: "First. Municipal corporations are bound to keep their streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe and suitable condition of repair only for public travel by night and by day. Accidents may happen notwithstanding the utmost care and diligence, and the corporation does not warrant against accidents. The amount of care and diligence to be reasonable may vary with the circumstances of each case, but in all cases they must be relative to the risk to be reasonable care and diligence. When this is done, the corporation has performed its duty to the public. Second. The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care and diligence in traveling along the sidewalk to avoid accidents, and this care and diligence increases or diminishes with the circumstances of the case. For instance, if the night was dark when traveling on the sidewalk, it would be a duty to exercise more care and caution than in open day; and, if you find from the evidence that plaintiff did not exercise care and caution commensurate with the surrounding circumstances, and such want of care materially contributed to the injury, then the plaintiff cannot recover. Third. In the absence of express notice to the defendant city or its officers of the defects which caused the injury sustained by plaintiff, the plaintiff cannot recover, unless it is shown from the evidence that the time that the sidewalk was out of repair (if you find from the evidence that it was out of repair) was so long that the city defendant ought to have known of it and repaired it before the accident, or that the officers of the city were guilty of negligence in not knowing of it and repairing it before the accident. Fourth. Evidence of the existence of loose boards other than the one upon which the plaintiff tripped is not competent for your consideration for any purpose except as it may tend to show the want of the exercise of due care on the part of the defendant, which would have led to the discovery on its part of the fact that the board upon which plaintiff tripped was loose at the time of the injury."

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed her damages at $2,300. They also made and returned the following special findings of fact: "(1) Was there any defect in the sidewalk on Seventh street where it is claimed the plaintiff sustained the injury? If so, what was the defect? Make full specifications. Answer. Yes; a loose plank. (2) If you find there was any defect in the sidewalk where plaintiff was injured, how long was such defect in the walk before the happening of the accident to the plaintiff? A. About six months. (3) When the sidewalk was constructed, was it constructed with reasonably good and sufficient material in all respects, and with reasonable good and sufficient workmanship? A. No. (4) Did the city, defendant, have any notice of the defect in the sidewalk, if you find there was any defect? If so, what officer of said city defendant had such notice? A. There was no notice, except implied notice. (5) How did the accident happen to the plaintiff? From what cause did plaintiff fall on the sidewalk, if you find she did so fall upon it? A. By unfastened board tipping up. (6) Was the cause of the fall of plaintiff on the sidewalk a loose plank tipping up and throwing her down? A. Yes. (7) Did the defendant, the city of Kansas, have notice that the board upon which plaintiff tripped was loose at the time of the injury? A. Yes. (8) How many nails were in the board upon which plaintiff tripped? A. There were none. (9) What were the dimensions of the posts and of the stringers, and the thickness of the boards in the sidewalk, at the place of the injury? A. Posts, 4x4; stringers, 2x4; planks, 2x6, and 2x8, and 2x12. (10) How long had the board upon which the plaintiff tripped been loose at the time of the injury? A. Six months. JOHN RILEY, Foreman."

The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. It excepted and brings the case here.

Allen & McGrew and Scroggs & Gibson, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) This was an action brought by Mrs. Mary J. Bradbury against the city of Kansas City to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused on the night of the 29th of August, 1886, by reason of the unsafe and defective condition of a sidewalk on Seventh street, in that city. It was clearly established by the evidence that Mrs. Bradbury was tripped up and thrown down by a loose board or plank in the sidewalk, and thereby severely and permanently injured. There is no evidence in the record tending to show any contributory negligence upon her part, and the principal question of fact for the determination of the jury was whether, prior to the injuries complained of, the defects in the sidewalk were known to the officers of the city having charge of the streets, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence upon their part. The jury found specially that the sidewalk was defective where Mrs. Bradbury was injured, and that the defects in the sidewalk had existed about six months before she was injured. The jury also found that the sidewalk was not properly constructed.

It is contended that the board or plank of the sidewalk which caused Mrs. Bradbury to fall was loose for only a short time before her injury. An instruction was asked by the city to the effect that "if the jury believed from the evidence the sidewalk upon which the plaintiff fell and was injured was in a reasonably safe and suitable condition of repair at the time of alleged injury, save and except the loose board that flew up and tripped the plaintiff, they should find for the defendant." An examination of the record shows there was evidence supporting the findings of the jury, and therefore we cannot say that there was no proof to sustain the judgment. In this view, the instruction was properly refused. All questions of fact in such a case are for the jury to decide, not the court.

It is also contended that the trial court committed error in refusing various other instructions prayed for. The instructions given sufficiently covered the ground. The facts of the case were in a very narrow compass. Other and further instructions would not have been beneficial, unless the court had explained to the jury what it meant when it referred to "the proper officers of the city having notice of the condition of the sidewalk." The court undoubtedly meant the officers of the city having charge of the repairs of the streets, but the city did not ask the court to define "the proper officers," and the instruction cannot be said to have been erroneous or misleading. The objection to the order in which the evidence was admitted is not well taken, because in such matters a court has some discretion. A trial court may even open a case for the purpose of receiving further evidence. West v. Cameron, 39 Kan. 736, 18 Pac. Rep. 894; State v. Sowders, 42 Kan. 312, 22 Pac. Rep. 425, and cases there cited.

It is further contended that the court erred in refusing to submit to the jury the following questions: "Question. What sum do you find, if any, that the plaintiff is entitled to on account of money paid for medicine and the services of a physician? Q. What damage do you find, if any, for the plaintiff for loss of time from the performance of her usual labors and duties?" The court very properly might have submitted the first question. A similar question was submitted in City of Salina v. Trosper, 27 Kan. 544.

Either party has a right to a written finding upon any particular question of fact involved in the case. Railway Co. v. Reynolds, 8 Kan. 623; Bent v. Philbrick, 16 Kan. 190; City of Wyandotte v. Gibson, 25 Kan. 236. But an examination of the record shows that no material error was committed in the refusal to submit the first question, and no error whatever in refusing to submit the last one. The evidence as to expenses for medicine and medical attendance was uncontradicted. Mrs. Bradbury testified upon that matter. Her evidence was not controverted. As to the last question, there was no positive or specific statement by any witness of the value of the services of Mrs. Bradbury. She testified that she was a nurse, but did not state what her daily, weekly, or monthly wages were. Therefore there was no evidence offered upon which to submit the last question. Upon the record presented to us, we cannot perceive any error occurring upon the trial prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, and therefore the judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

SOUTHERN KANSAS RY. CO. v. SANFORD.

CARRIERS—EJECTION OF TRESPASSER.

1. Removing a trespasser from a train of cars while the train is in motion, when the train is moving very slowly, is not negligence or wantonness per se.

2. In cases of ejection of trespassers from trains in motion, the question of negligence or wantonness is usually a question of fact for the jury.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioner's decision. Error from district court, Johnson county; J. P. HINDMAN, Judge.

George R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. A. Smith Devenney, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This action was brought by the defendant against the plaintiff to recover damages for an injury which he alleges was inflicted upon him by the agent of the plaintiff in ejecting him from its train of cars on October 11, 1887. The defendant was a passenger on the plaintiff's train from Kansas City west, on the evening of that day. When the conductor in charge of the train demanded his ticket he did not produce any, and refused to pay fare, and was put off of the train. At some time, either while being put off the train or after he was off, his ankle was sprained, and this action was brought to recover damages therefor. The case was tried by the court and a jury, and a verdict for the plaintiff therein returned for $150, $100 compensatory damages and $50 as punitive damages. Motion for new trial was overruled.

The undisputed evidence in this case clearly shows that the defendant twice failed to produce a ticket, when his ticket was demanded by the conductor,—once before reaching the station at Argentine, and again before reaching Holliday; and each time he not only refused to surrender his ticket, but refused to tell where he was going, simply saying, in response to the inquiry of the conductor as to where he was going, "I guess I know where I am going." The first time he refused to surrender his ticket or tell where he was going the conductor directed him to get off the train at the next station, Argentine, which he failed to do. The defendant thus ceased to be a passenger on the plaintiff's train, and became a trespasser thereon, and especially so after he had the second time refused to surrender his ticket or tell where he was going, so the conductor could fix the amount of his fare, and the conductor had the right to put him off, at a station or between stations, only so he did not put him off at a dangerous place, nor use any more force than was necessary to eject him, or put him off with a wanton disregard of the consequences of his ejection. Lillis v. Railway Co., 64 Mo. 464; Railroad Co. v. Van Houten, 48 Ind. 90; Stone v. Railroad Co., 47 Iowa, 82; Hibbard v. Railroad Co., 15 N. Y. 456; Frederick v. Railroad Co., 37 Mich. 342; Railroad Co. v. Gants, 38 Kan. 621, 17 Pac. Rep. 54, and cases there cited. Was the defendant ejected at a dangerous place? This question must be answered in the negative. He was put off near the station, in sight of the depot, where the ground was level and smooth, he himself testifying: "I had pretty good footing from there on. I could see all before me. Pretty good road where I came." That is, it was a pretty good road from the place where he was put off to the depot. There is nothing in the record that shows that the conductor assaulted the defendant, or used violence, or any more force than was sufficient to eject him. The evidence shows there was very little resistance. The defendant was led or pushed out of the car, and put off of the platform onto the ground, without much fuss or force. We think the evidence clearly shows that the defendant was at the time just enough under the influence of liquor to make him somewhat stupid when left to himself, and more or less contrary when aroused; unable to offer much resistance, and certainly not able to remember afterwards much about what transpired. Was the conductor guilty of negligence or wantonness in putting the defendant off, under all the circumstances of this case? A strong preponderance of the evidence shows that the train was standing still when the defendant was put off. The conductor says the train was standing still. The defendant also says it had stopped when he was put off. It is true that he says, in answer to a leading question in his examination in chief it was moving. But, having testified both ways, his evidence must be taken more strongly against himself, and, under ordinary circumstances, his evidence against himself would outweigh the evidence of a mere witness in his behalf, contradicting him on this point. All the witnesses agree that the train stopped outside the switch, to allow the brakeman to turn the switch, and again, after it had run in on the switch, to let the brakeman get on. And it must be remembered that this stop was within 200 or 300 yards of the depot, where the train must stop again. Mr. Hodges, a passenger on the train, says the train was in motion when the defendant was put off. He says the train had stopped inside the switch; but he says it had started up again before the defendant was put off. He also says that the first thing he saw in connection with the ejection of the defendant was the conductor setting down his lantern and pulling the bell-rope to stop the train. That immediately thereafter he went out upon the platform at the rear end of the car to see what the train was stopping for; and, while there, he heard a noise inside, as though made by a shuffling of feet, and went into the car, and as he went in the conductor and the defendant were going out of the front end of the car; and that he did not see or hear anything further. He did not go out again, but says the train was in motion. The evidence also shows that the conductor stepped off from the platform onto the ground with the defendant. Under such a state of facts the ordinary mind would not long hesitate in reaching the conclusion that the train was standing still when the defendant was ejected; that he was put off after the train had run in on the switch, and stopped, and before it had again started. It is hardly within reason to believe that, having stopped outside of the switch, where the conductor says he would not put the defendant off because it was not a good place, and then, having run in on the switch and stopped, where it was a good place to put him off, that he waited until after his train had started to run up to the depot, not 300 yards away, and then pulled the bell-rope, and slowed his train up, and put him off. Under such circumstances, it is much more in consonance with reason to believe that Hodges was mistaken about the train being in motion when the ejection occurred, especially as he is directly contradicted on this point by the conductor and the defendant himself; and that the train was in fact standing still when the defendant was ejected.

But counsel for defendant remind us that the jury found for the defendant, and that, with no special finding in the case, the general verdict is conclusive upon all questions upon which there was a conflict in the evidence. We concede this, though reluctantly, under the evidence in this case, and are therefore confronted with the question, was it negligence or wantonness per se for the conductor to put the defendant off from the train while it was in motion? As there is no finding of the jury as to how fast or how slow the train was moving when the ejection was made, we must, to sustain the verdict and judgment in this case, say that it is negligence or wantonness per se for a conductor to remove a trespasser from a train in motion, no matter how slow it is running. In the case of Railroad Co. v. McCandless, 33 Kan. 366, 373, 374, 6 Pac. Rep. 587, this court held that "stepping from a train of cars in motion, to a stationary platform, or to the stationary ground, which is more dangerous, is not negligence per se;" and cited in support of that position: Railroad Co. v. Smith, 59 Tex. 406; Doss v. Railroad Co., 59 Mo. 27; Filer v. Railroad Co., 49 N. Y. 42; Banking Co. v. McCurdy, 45 Ga. 288; Railroad Co. v. Kilgore, 32 Pa. St. 292. The court also said in that case that "the same rule obtained in getting on a train while in motion," and cited Swigert v. Railroad Co., 75 Mo. 475, and Eppendorf v. Railroad Co., 69 N. Y. 195. It is held in that case that "the question of negligence in such cases is usually a question of fact for the jury, although sometimes, and under some circumstances, it may be a question of law for the court." So, where a trespasser is removed from a train of cars by the agents of the company operating the train, while a train is in motion, we think the question of negligence, of wantonness, of the amount of force used, and of the character of the place where the ejection took place, are usually questions of fact for the jury. Where the evidence shows the train at the time of the ejection is moving very slowly, it is not negligence or wantonness per se to put a trespasser off of the train. In this case the plaintiff below could not have recovered, except upon the theory that it was negligence or wantonness per se for the conductor to put him off of the train while it was in motion. It is difficult to say whether the court intended to instruct the jury that it is negligence or wantonness per se to remove a trespasser from a train of cars while in motion, because of the fact that the court coupled so many other conditions with the element of motion of the train in its charge. But we have no doubt the jury were led by the charge to believe that the plaintiff below had a right to recover if he was put off of the train while it was in motion, without regard to the rate of its speed. This is apparent from the verdict, since the evidence clearly shows that there was no other element of negligence or wantonness in the case; and to that extent we think the instructions misleading and erroneous. We also think some of the instructions refused should have been given. They stated the law correctly, and the matter was not covered properly by the instructions that were given. If it ever is a question of fact for a jury to say whether it is a wanton wrong to put a trespasser off of a train while in motion, then this case is such a one, for the evidence clearly shows that the train was moving very slowly, if moving at all, while the ejection occurred. The court should have submitted it as a question of fact, coupled with proper instructions in relation thereto, for the jury to say. If they should find the train was in motion when the defendant was removed therefrom, whether or not the train was moving at such a rate of speed as to render the removal dangerous. For the reasons herein given it is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

HENDRYX v. KANSAS CITY, F. S. & G. R. Co.

CARRIERS—EJECTION OF TRESPASSER.

1. Where a person clandestinely enters a box-car of a freight train of a railroad company, to beat his way over the road, he becomes a trespasser on said train, and the only duty the company owes him is not to wantonly injure him.
2. It is not error to sustain a demurrer to the evidence, in a case against a railroad company to recover damages for injuries inflicted by the train, resulting in the death of the person injured, when the evidence fails to show any negligence on the part of the company which contributed to the injury.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Bourbon county; C. O. FRENCH, Judge.

Ware, Bliddle & Cory, for plaintiff in error. Wallace Pratt and Charles W. Blair, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for injuries received by the plaintiff's intestate, through the alleged negligence of the defendant in operating its train of cars, from the effects of which he died. The defendant was, on the 27th day of August, 1886, running its train of freight-cars south over its line from Pleasanton to Ft. Scott. At Pleasanton the deceased, Willie Hendryx, went into a box-car of said train, to steal a ride to Ft. Scott. There was one other person in the car with him, called in the evidence in this case a "tramp." At Hammond station, six miles north of Ft. Scott, the hind brakeman of the train closed the doors of the car, while the boy and his companion were still in the car. From Hammond the train ran to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas junction near Ft. Scott, where it stopped a short time, and then pulled up a short distance, and stopped again. After pulling up, Willie Hendryx was found on the track in the rear of the train, seriously injured. He was taken home to Pleasanton, where, notwithstanding he was carefully nursed and properly attended by physicians, he died on the 12th of September, 1886. The evidence in the case consisted wholly in an agreed statement, and the depositions of two witnesses, who also got onto said cars at Pleasanton, and rode to Ft. Scott. There was no conflict in the evidence; not a single question of fact was contested in the whole case. The defendant demurred to the evidence of the plaintiff, and the court sustained the demurrer, and entered judgment for the defendant. Motion for new trial was heard and overruled.

There is but one question in the case, and that grows out of the theory of the plaintiff as to the cause of the death of the plaintiff's intestate. The plaintiff claims that when the brakeman shut the doors of the car at Hammond the deceased became alarmed, and in his fright attempted to climb out of the window in the end of the car to the ground, and, in so doing, fell, and was run over and injured. Plaintiff says the shutting of the doors of the car by the brakeman, with deceased and his companion in the car, was such an act as rendered the defendant guilty of negligence in connection with the injury of said Willie Hendryx, and liable in damages therefor. The undisputed evidence shows the deceased was a trespasser on the defendant's train. The only duty, then, that the company owed him, was not to wantonly injure him. Toomey v. Railroad Co., (Cal.) 24 Pac. Rep. 1074; Mason v. Railroad Co., 27 Kan. 83; Railroad Co. v. Rollins, 5 Kan. 167; Pierce, R. R. 330; Palmer v. Railroad Co., (Ind.) 14 N. E. Rep. 70; Railroad Co. v. Lindley, 42 Kan. 714, 22 Pac. Rep. 703; Railroad Co. v. Sanford, 44 Kan. —, ante, 891; Railroad Co. v. Gants, 38 Kan. 621, 17 Pac. Rep. 54; Railroad Co. v. Pointer, 14 Kan. 37; Taylor v. Clendinning, 4 Kan. 524; Hibbard v. Railroad Co., 15 N. Y. 456; Stone v. Railroad Co., 47 Iowa, 82; Railroad Co. v. Van Houten, 48 Ind. 90. The only act on the part of the railroad company that is complained of was the closing of the doors of the car in which deceased and companion were at the time by the brakeman of the train. What evidence is found, in such act on the part of the brakeman, of any malice towards the deceased? Or of any wanton or reckless disregard of his rights? In what manner did the closing of such doors place the deceased in danger? The car was empty. He did not freeze nor smother therein. He could not have been afraid of his companion, because he had ridden past several stations, at each of which the train had stopped, before the door was closed, and still remained in the car. He knew the train would stop at Ft. Scott, where he was going. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the doors of the car were locked or otherwise fastened on the outside, and nothing to show that the deceased could not have readily opened them from the inside, and stepped out, whenever he desired to. There is nothing to show that he did not so leave the car, there being no evidence to show how he got out of the car. His companions suffered no injury in getting out of the car, so far as the record shows. And there is not a word of testimony tending to show that deceased was injured in any way while getting out of the car. He was found in the rear of the train, on the track, injured. But how he came to be there no one knows. The theory of the plaintiff below is that he was alarmed when shut in the car, and attempted to get out of the window in the end of the car, and fell, and the train, or part of it, ran over him. There is no evidence, however, to support this theory, unless it can be said that the bare fact that the doors of the car were closed by the brakeman supports it. The deceased may, so far as any evidence shows, have emerged from the car through the door, and, after getting out upon the ground, have slipped, and fell under the train, and, as he got on the car while the train was in motion, he may have jumped from the car, out of the door, while the train was in motion, and been carried off his balance by the motion of the train, and fallen under the cars, and thus been hurt. But it is idle to speculate as to how he emerged from the car, or how he was hurt. It is enough to say that there must be some evidence of wrong on the part of even a railroad company before it may be mulcted in damages. There is no evidence that the brakeman knew that any one was in the car. It is true, a witness said the brakeman knew; but later, when he disclosed the source of his knowledge, it turned out to be a mere inference of his. He said also that he did not see the brakeman look into the car. We think the evidence in this case barren of anything showing any wrong on the part of the company or its agents, and that there was, therefore, nothing to submit to a jury. It follows that the demurrer to the evidence was rightfully sustained. It is recommended that the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CHALLISS V. ATCHISON UNION DEPOT & R. CO.

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—LOT ABUTTING ON VACATED STREET.

Where a portion of a street in a city of the first class is vacated, pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 582 of General Statutes of 1889, and a lot abutting thereon condemned, and the perpetual use thereof acquired by a union depot and railroad company for the maintenance of a union depot, the portion of the vacated street situated in front of the lot so condemned becomes, as it were, an accretion or appurtenant of the lot, and passes with the same to the company. Railroad Co. v. Patch, 28 Kan. 470.

Error from district court, Atchison county; ROBERT M. EATON, Judge.

Action of injunction brought by the Atchison Union Depot & Railroad Company against Luther C. Challiss, in the district court of Atchison county. After hearing the testimony, the court made the following findings of fact and conclusions of law:

"FINDINGS OF FACT.

"(1) That the said plaintiff, the Atchison Union Depot & Railroad Company, on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1889, was, and for more than ten years prior thereto has been, a depot and railroad company, duly chartered, organized, and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Kansas. (2) That at the institution of this suit it was, and for more than ten years prior thereto had been, the owner in fee-simple of the north half of block 22 in the city of Atchison, state of Kansas, and the fee-simple owner of the south 30 feet of lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, block 23, in the city of Atchison, and during all said time used and occupied the same for railroad and depot purposes. (3) That on the 1st day of October, A. D. 1888, it became necessary that said plaintiff should acquire the north one hundred feet of lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, in block 23, city of Atchison, for its uses and purposes as such union depot and railroad corporation, and, being unable to agree with the owners thereof as to the price it should pay therefor, it duly applied to the board of county commissioners of Atchison county, Kansas, to lay off and condemn so much of said lots as was deemed necessary by the said plaintiff for its uses and purposes aforesaid. (4) That said board of county commissioners, upon said application, did, after having given due notice as provided by law, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1888, proceed to lay off and condemn the north one hundred feet of lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, in block 23, in the city of Atchison, as aforesaid, and did ascertain and determine the value of said one hundred feet of lot one, in block 23, aforesaid, to be the sum of $19,330, and did award L. C. Challiss, as the supposed owner of said north one hundred feet of lot one, block 23, the said sum of $19,330, the appraised value of said lot, and all interest right, title, and claim of the said L. C. Challiss therein or thereto. (5) That the said board of county commissioners did thereafter duly embody in a written report, and duly filed the same in the office of the county clerk, Atchison county, state of Kansas, their said appraisal and assessment of damages, which said report was duly filed, and all proceedings thereunder were duly had in accordance with the provisions of law in such cases made and provided; and, within due and proper time, the said plaintiff did deposit with the treasurer of Atchison county, Kansas, for the use and benefit of the north one hundred feet of said lot one, in block 23, the said sum of $19,330, the amount awarded by said commissioners, and caused a copy of said report to be filed with the said treasurer in due time and with the register of deeds, as by law made and provided. (6) That within ten days of the time of the filing of such report with the county clerk of said county, the said defendant, L. C. Challiss, claiming to be the owner of said north one hundred feet of lot one, block 23, as aforesaid, took an appeal from the award of said county commissioners to the district court of Atchison county, state of Kansas, by filing the necessary bond and undertaking for such appeal, and caused said appeal to be duly filed in said district court. (7) That Third street in the city of Atchison, between blocks 22 and 23, as originally laid out and dedicated by the Atchison Town Company, a corporation, was eighty feet wide, and the same had been opened for public travel, and on the 15th day of January, A. D. 1889, the city council of the city of Atchison, in the state of Kansas, being satisfied that the interests of the public would be subserved thereby, and to enable the plaintiff to build and erect a union depot in the city of Atchison for the accommodation of the citizens of said city, passed an ordinance entitled 'An ordinance vacating certain portions of Third street in the city of Atchison,' whereby and by the terms of which said ordinance all that portion of Third street beginning at the south line of Main street, and running thence south between said two blocks 22 and 23 in the city of Atchison aforesaid, was vacated and abandoned as a public street and thoroughfare, and such ordinance was duly passed and approved by said city council, and duly published. (8) That the interest of the public and the accommodation of the citizens of the city of Atchison made it necessary that said portions of said Third street referred to in said ordinance should be vacated, and the same should be abandoned as a public street and thoroughfare, and the said plaintiff, at the institution of said suit, had the consent and authority of the city of Atchison to close up said portions of said Third street so vacated as aforesaid. (9) That, immediately upon the passage of said ordinance, said defendant, L. C. Challiss, assumed to take possession of said portions of said Third street, so vacated as aforesaid, by building a fence around the same, to the middle of the street, thus inclosing a strip of ground in said city forty feet wide, and one hundred feet deep. (10) After the said L. C. Challiss had appealed from the award of said commissioners, and after the institution of this action, and on, to-wit, the 23d day of February, A. D. 1889, the said L. C. Challiss demanded of the county treasurer of Atchison county, Kansas, the payment to him, as owner of the said north one hundred feet of lot one, in block 23, aforesaid, the sum of $19,330, the amount of the award so made by said commissioners as the value of said north one hundred feet of lot one, in block 23, and the said county treasurer of Atchison county paid to the said L. C. Challiss the amount of such award, and he duly received and receipted therefor. (11) At the time of the passage of the ordinance hereinbefore referred to, William C. Challiss was the fee-simple owner of record of said north one hundred feet of lot one, in block 23, and thereafter, and after the institution of this action, L. C. Challiss obtained from said W. L. Challiss a quitclaim deed, whereby the said William L. Challiss conveyed to L. C. Challiss all his right, title, and interest in and to said lot 1, in block 23, city of Atchison aforesaid. (12) At and prior to the commencement of this suit the said L. C. Challiss threatened to retain forcible possession of said lot one, in block 23, and said portion of said Third street so as aforesaid inclosed by him with a fence, and threatened to prevent the plaintiff from entering into the possession thereof for the purpose of occupying the same for railroad and depot purposes. (13) That as soon as the said L. C. Challiss appealed from the award of said commissioners as aforesaid, and after the payment and deposit of said sum of $19,330 with the county treasurer as aforesaid, the said plaintiff company duly executed a bond with sufficient surety, approved by the county clerk, to pay all damages and costs which said company might be adjudged to pay by said district court of Atchison county, state of Kansas, which said bond was in due form, and duly and properly executed."

"CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

"(1) At the institution of this suit, said plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property mentioned and described in plaintiff's petition as against the said defendant, to-wit: The north one hundred feet of lot one, in block 23, in the city of Atchison, aforesaid, together with all that portion of Third street which had been vacated by said city of Atchison under the provisions of said ordinance hereinbefore referred to, and the part which the said defendant had inclosed with the said fence. (2) The plaintiff is entitled to a perpetual injunction enjoining and restraining the defendant from interfering with it in the use, occupation, and possession of said north one hundred feet of lot one, block 23, city of Atchison, together with said portion of Third street so vacated as aforesaid, as prayed for in said petition. (3) Plaintiff is entitled to judgment against said defendant for costs."

Motion for new trial was filed and overruled, and judgment given against the defendant in accordance with the conclusions of law. L. C. Challiss brings the case to this court for review, and asks a reversal.

JOHNSTON, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The record sufficiently shows that at the time of the condemnation proceedings, Luther C. Challiss was the owner of lot 1, in block 23, in the city of Atchison. The perpetual use of this lot, or the north 100 feet of the same, has been acquired by the company for the purpose of maintaining a union depot for the use of the railroads entering the city of Atchison, and for the convenience and accommodation of its citizens. Any question of the regularity of the condemnation proceedings has been set at rest by the action of Challiss in first appealing from the award of damages; and, second, by an acceptance of the $19,330 that was awarded and deposited by the company with the county treasurer as compensation for the property appropriated. Prior to the deposit and payment of the award, the city council vacated that portion of Third street on which lot 1 fronted, and Challiss claimed that in consequence of the vacation the title to that portion of the street passed to him, and not to the company which had acquired the abutting lot. The court held that Challiss was not the owner nor entitled to the possession of the vacated portion of the street in front of the lot in question, and granted an injunction restraining him from interfering with the company in the use and occupation of the same. The statute in relation to the vacation of streets in cities of the first class provides that "whenever any street, avenue, alley, or lane shall be vacated, the same shall revert to the owners of real estate thereto adjacent on each side, in proportion to the frontage of such real estate, except in cases where such street, avenue, alley, or lane shall have been taken and appropriated to public use in a different proportion, in which case it shall revert to adjacent lots or real estate, in proportion as it was taken from them: provided, that when, in the opinion of the council of any such city, it is necessary to reopen such street, avenue, alley, or lane, they may order the same opened, without expense to the city." Gen. St. 1889, par. 582. We think the court ruled correctly in excluding the plaintiff in error from the use and occupation of the disputed premises. The fee of the street was never in him, and hence, in a strict sense of the term, there was no reversion. The fee of the streets is in the county for the use of the public, and the control of the same has been placed by the legislature in the city. Aside from the accommodation of the general public, the streets afford access and frontage to the property which abuts thereon; and these rights are incidental and appurtenant to such property, and pass by any conveyance or by condemnation of the same. By the condemnation proceedings, the company acquired the perpetual use of the lot,—a use which in its nature practically excludes any other use or occupancy. Through the appropriation of the lot, the company acquired the incidental and appurtenant rights in the street, and, upon the legal vacation of the street, that portion situated in front of lot 1 temporarily became, as it were, a part of the lot, and passed to the company. The status of the vacated portion of the street cannot now be regarded as an open question in this court, and we need only follow a former decision, wherein substantially the same question was considered and determined. Railroad Co. v. Patch, 28 Kan. 470. In that case, Patch was the owner in fee of certain lots in the city of Topeka, and the city council passed an ordinance vacating the street in front of her lots. Afterwards, the railroad company appropriated the lots through condemnation proceedings, and the report of the commissioners showed that they appraised the lots by name, without any survey or indication of what was embraced within the designation. The owner of the fee contended that, as the street vacated was not named in or covered by the commissioners' report, it became her property upon the passage of the ordinance vacating the street, and she asked for an injunction restraining the company from occupying such part of her property; while one contention of the company was that it passed to the adjacent lot-owners, and became in fact a part and parcel of the lots, and was therefore covered by and embraced within the condemnation of the lots. The court did not at that time determine whether, upon the vacation of the street, it reverted to the original proprietor or passed to the adjacent lot-owners. The latter view has since been adopted by this court. City of Belleville v. Hallowell, 41 Kan. 192, 21 Pac. Rep. 105. In the Patch Case it was held that, if it passed to the adjacent lot-owner, then it became something in the nature of an accretion to and would pass in any conveyance of the lot, and that the statute providing for the vacation of the street was only a temporary cession of the street for public use, which might be resumed at any time whenever, in the opinion of the council, it was necessary to reopen the same. Justice BREWER, who delivered the opinion of the court, stated that, if the theory that the vacated street passed to the adjacent lot-owner was adopted, "it would seem from the proviso to the section we have quoted that there was no absolute cession of the property to such adjacent lot-owner, but only a provisional and temporary giving up of the public use; for the lot-owner takes it subject to the right of the city to reopen it without expense. In other words, the city permits the lot-owner provisionally and temporarily to hold and occupy the portion of the vacated street in front of his lot. Under these circumstances we think it fair to consider that it becomes, as it were, a part of the lot,—something in the nature of an accretion to it; and, if so, then any conveyance of the lot takes with it this attached portion of the vacated street." Following the rule of that case, which is decisive of this, we must hold against the contention of the plaintiff in error. The fee of the street not being in the owners of the adjacent lots, as in Massachusetts, the case of Harris v. Elliott, 10 Pet. 25, and some other cases cited, do not apply here. Something is said against the validity of the vacation of the street, but it follows from the decision made that the private rights of plaintiff in error are not so infringed as to warrant him in raising that question. Neither is he authorized to appear in behalf of the public; and hence we will not enter upon a consideration of the validity of the vacation ordinance, nor the right to use the vacated portion of the street for the contemplated purposes. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

SPIDLE v. McCracken.

ELECTIONS—RETURNS PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE—BALLOTS.

The returns of the election officers are prima facie evidence of what they purport to show with regard to the number of the votes cast and for whom cast, although the ballots themselves, when properly identified, are still better evidence. But whenever it is shown that the ballots have been wrongfully tampered with they lose their controlling character as evidence; and when there is nothing but discredited ballots to contradict the election returns the returns themselves will be held to be conclusive.

v.25p.no.13—57

Error from district court, Ness county; V. H. GRINSTEAD, Judge.

J. G. Ibach, for plaintiff in error. Smith & Berry, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. It is urged strenuously by the defendant in error that "the paper filed with the petition in error in this cause, which purports to be the proceedings of an election contest court, and upon which the plaintiff in error relies for a hearing of his alleged grievances, is without any legal or valid authenticity or the legal attributes that entitle it to be considered by this court;" but, passing over the question thus presented, and without deciding it, and to the merits of the case, and considering "the paper filed with the petition in error" for all that it is worth, it does not affirmatively show, nor does it appear, that any material error was committed either by the district court or by the contest court. This "paper" shows, among other things, that Jacob B. Spidle, I. L. McCracken, and others were competing candidates for election to the office of county commissioner from the second commissioner district of Ness county at the general election held in November, 1888. That the returns of that election from the several election boards show that the following persons received the following number of votes for that office, to-wit:

	Highpoint Franklin Johnson
	Tp.	Tp.	Tp.	Total.
J. B. Spidle.....	31	100	11	142
I. L. McCracken...	83	81	41	156
Walker.....	..	35	1	36
McClanish.....	..	20	47	67
Beck.....	..	..	1	1

That Spidle contested the election as between himself and McCracken. That the contest court before which the contest was tried was composed of S. E. Nicholson, probate judge, and H. M. Kelson and J. R. Berry, as the associate judges. That at the trial ballots claimed by Spidle to be the original ballots voted at such election were introduced in evidence, which showed that the following number of votes were cast for the following named persons, to-wit:

	Highpoint Franklin Johnson
	Tp.	Tp.	Tp.	Total.
J. B. Spidle.....	29	118	11	158
W. S. Beck.....	3	..	1	3
Walker.....	10	32	1	43
McClanish.....	14	17	47	78
McCracken.....	84	24	41	149

Other evidence, however, was introduced, tending to show that the ballots cast in Franklin township had been tampered with and altered, and that the aforesaid ballots, as introduced in evidence, did not show the actual votes of the people in Franklin township. The finding of the contest court upon this subject is as follows: "The sealed envelope enveloping said ballots cast at said election at said Franklin township district was torn open, and said ballots tampered with, by some unauthorized person after said sealed envelope and ballots were filed with and in the custody of the county clerk of said Ness county; and that, when said ballots were tampered with as aforesaid, and by the same person, the name of the contestee, I. L. McCracken, was erased from seven of said ballots, and the name of the contestor was written thereon instead; and the name of A. J. Walker was erased from three of the said ballots, and the name of the contestor written thereon instead; and the name of said Chas. McClandish was erased from three of said ballots, and the name of said contestor written thereon instead. * * * It is therefore considered by the court that the said ballots cast at the said election in said Franklin township on the 6th day of November, 1888, are not competent or sufficient evidence of right or title as between the said Jacob B. Spidle, contestor, and said I. L. McCracken, contestee, to said office of county commissioner. It is further considered that the poll-books and returns aforesaid of said Franklin township district are prima facie and the best evidence of right and title as between the said contestor, Jacob B. Spidle, and the contestee, I. L. McCracken, to said office of county commissioner. It is further considered and adjudged that said contestee, I. L. McCracken, was on said 6th day of November, 1888, at said election in the districts of Johnson, Franklin, and Highpoint townships aforesaid, and he is hereby declared, elected to said office of county commissioner for the second commissioner district within and for Ness county, Kansas, for the next regular term thereof." Upon these and other findings the contest court found in favor of McCracken and against Spidle, and rendered judgment accordingly; and to reverse this judgment Spidle took the case to the district court upon petition in error, where the judgment of the contest court was affirmed; and to reverse the judgment of both courts Spidle has brought the case to this court.

We think there was sufficient evidence to sustain the findings and judgment of the contest court, and no material error is shown to have been committed by such court. The court had the returns of the several election boards before it, and also what purported to be the original ballots cast in each township, including Franklin township; and heard all the testimony with regard to the election in Franklin township and elsewhere, and with regard to the original counting of the ballots by the election board in Franklin township; and heard evidence showing that Spidle and others were present at such original counting in Franklin township, and that such counting at that time seemed to be correct, and no objection was made thereto; and the ballots, as finally presented to the contest court, seemed to have been changed and altered. That the returns of the election officers are prima facie evidence of what they purport to show with regard to the number of the votes cast and for whom cast has frequently been held by this court, and has been so held by every other court to whom the question has been presented; and, in the absence of any contradictory evidence, they are conclusive. It has also been held by this court in the case of Dorey v. Lynn, 31 Kan. 758, 760, 3 Pac. Rep. 557, and in other cases, that, whenever the ballots cast at an election can be properly identified, they are the best evidence, and much better and more reliable than a mere abstract or summary of the same made by the election officers; but whenever it is shown that they have wrongfully been tampered with, as has been shown in the present case, they lose their controlling character as evidence. Hudson v. Solomon, 19 Kan. 177, 188; Coglan v. Beard, (Cal.) 2 Pac. Rep. 737. And where there is nothing else than discredited ballots to contradict the returns, the returns will be held to be conclusive. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

EXECUTION OF CONTRACT—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

To establish a contract for the leasing of real estate, where the negotiations are conducted entirely by letters through the mails, and the plaintiff proposes to lease certain land for five years, and give security for the payment of the taxes, and the defendant replies that he can have the same for three, and there is no unqualified acceptance of such proposition, and no security furnished for the payment of such taxes, held, that it is not a completed contract, and the plaintiff is not entitled to a specific execution of the lease.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Humphrey & Humphrey, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. Prior to the 15th day of February, 1888, John Brill, one of the defendants in error, owned the N.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , and the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , and the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , of section 8, township 12, range 7 east, in Davis (now Geary) county, containing 440 acres. The plaintiff in error desired to rent said land, and on February 8, 1888, wrote to Brill, who lived at Green Haven, N. Y., proposing to lease the land for the term of five years, and in payment, as rental, agreed to construct a fence so as to inclose the whole tract, and pay the taxes assessed against it during the continuance of the lease, reserving the right to remove the fencing at the expiration of the lease, and that he would furnish security for the payment of the taxes which might be assessed against the land. In answer to said letter, Brill wrote the plaintiff on the 15th day of February, 1888: "You can have the land as written to me for three years. I wish to sell it, and shall try and sell it to you, if I should see you." Upon the receipt of this letter, Erickson had a lease prepared for the period of three years, which he signed and transmitted to Brill for his signature, but did not furnish any security for the payment of the taxes. This lease was never returned to the plaintiff in error. Upon the strength of Brill's letter, Erickson inclosed the land, and, on the 18th of April following, turned his stock upon it. John and William Wallace, the other defendants in error, resided on adjoining land, and, it is claimed, knew that Erickson was fencing this land. On the 23d of April, after the plaintiff in error had completed his fence, and put his stock, consisting of 175 head, in the inclosure, the Wallaces went upon the land, and drove all the stock therefrom, and threatened to fight the plaintiff in error, and retained possession of the land until restrained by the temporary order of the judge of the district court. This action was commenced to enjoin the defendants from interfering with the plaintiff's possession or control over the land claimed to have been leased, and for a mandatory order requiring the Wallaces to remove their stock and property from the land, and that John Brill be decreed, by the judgment of the court, to execute and deliver to the plaintiff a lease to the lands, containing the terms and conditions upon which it is claimed he agreed to rent the same to the plaintiff. Brill answered by general denial, and further alleged that he never received any acceptance of his offer to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had never given security for the payment of the taxes, as proposed by him in his first letter. John Wallace answered that he was the owner of the land in question, and William Wallace set up the defense that what he did in the premises was done as the agent of John Wallace. Upon the final hearing of the case, the district court found against the plaintiff, and refused to grant him any relief; and he brings the case to this court for review.

The facts are not disputed. There is but one question in the case: Was the plaintiff entitled to the relief asked? We must answer this in the negative. As we view the facts, the plaintiff made a proposition to lease the land for five years, and to furnish security for the payment of the taxes. The defendant Brill proposed to rent it for three. This letter was dated on the 15th of February, and, judging from the date of Erickson's letter, should have reached him by the 22d, and, according to the plaintiff's own evidence, was not answered until the 1st of March; and the moving consideration, so far as Brill was concerned,—the security that the taxes would be paid,—was not furnished; and it does not appear from the letter that the proposition was fully complied with. There was no completed contract between the parties. We do not think, upon this state of facts, the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the specific execution of the lease claimed. An offer of one party, assented to by the other, will constitute a contract. But the assent must comprehend the whole of the proposition. It must be exactly equal to its extent and terms, and must not qualify them with any new matter. Therefore a proposal to accept, or an acceptance of an offer, on terms varying from those proposed, amounts to a rejection of the offer. "If, in answer to a proposal to grant black acre, a person replies that he is ready to close the matter, and will take white acre, there is no acceptance. Neither is there an acceptance where executory proceedings on each side are involved in the proposal, and the party professing to accept introduces a variance, and formulates his adoption of the offer with conditions and qualifications which essentially alter some of the constituents or materially vary the effect." Eggleston v. Wagner, (Mich.) 10 N. W. Rep. 37; Burkhalter v. Jones, 32 Kan. 5, 3 Pac. Rep. 559; Baker v. Johnson Co., 37 Iowa, 188; Hamlin v. Wistar, (Minn.) 18 N. W. Rep. 145; Bentz v. Eubanks, 41 Kan. 28, 20 Pac. Rep. 505. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

STATE v. BEATTY.

COMPETENCY OF JUROR—HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE.

1. A person called to serve as a juror in a criminal case, who shows by his answers to questions touching his qualifications to serve as a juror that he has formed and entertains an opinion, with reference to the guilt or innocence of the accused, that would require evidence to remove, is not a competent juror in the case, and it is error for the trial court to overrule a challenge for cause directed against him.

2. At the trial of a person charged with murder, it is error for the trial court to allow the wife of the deceased to testify to a conversation she had with a person who claimed to be an attorney for the accused, the conversation not occurring in the presence or hearing of the accused.

Shepard, Grove & Shepard and A. N. Cherry, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and George E. McMahon, for the State.

SIMPSON, C. At the March term, 1890, of the district court of Harper county, the appellant, James M. Beatty, was convicted of murder in the first degree for the unlawful killing of one James W. Hutchinson. The material facts developed at the trial are that on the morning of July 24, 1889, the dead body of James W. Hutchinson was found on the floor of his house, situate in the city of Anthony. He had been killed by being struck in the back by several bullets, or pieces of bullets, that had entered his vital organs, tearing and lacerating them, producing probably instantaneous death. The shot had been fired through the south window of the room in which he had been sitting upon a chair convenient to a table on which there was a lighted lamp. The lower half of the sash of the window had been removed, and a light screen or netting had been fastened over the opening. This netting was torn and powder-burned, and the right side of the window-frame was burned and blackened by powder. Parts of the gun-wadding adhered to the body, and other parts were scattered around the room in which the body was found. It seems that a muzzle-loading gun had been used, and that the muzzle had been held close to the screen or netting at the time the fatal shot was fired. The deceased had been seen and conversed with by his neighbors on the preceding evening. A light had been observed after dark in this room. An explosion as of a heavily loaded gun had been heard by his neighbors between 9 and 10 o'clock the night before, and immediately after the shot the light in his room disappeared. The wife and four children of the deceased were, at the time of his death, absent from home on a visit to their friends in the state of Iowa, and he was consequently occupying the house alone. Hutchinson, at the time of his death, was 29 years old. He had been married 12 years, and was dependent on his daily labor for the support of his family. He had been a resident of Anthony for four years, and was a quiet, inoffensive man. The appellant, James M. Beatty, had a wife and four children. He was a section boss on one of the railroads, and also owned a quarter section of land in Harper county. His wife had gone to the state of Iowa in the preceding February with some of her children, and the remainder had followed her in June. There is some evidence tending to show that Beatty did not intend to live with her again. After the departure of his wife, the wife of the deceased did washing, baking, and mending for Beatty, and for some time in June he took his meals at the house of the deceased, still sleeping at his own. It appears from the evidence of the wife of the deceased that the appellant talked to her several times about going to the state of Iowa with him; that he told her that he had parted with his wife forever; that her husband did not treat her right; that she had to work too hard; that if she was his woman she would not have to work so much; that he could do better by her than her husband had done; that he had furnished her money to buy tickets for her trip to Iowa, and gave her funds with which to buy a trunk and a hat, and had instructed her to tell her husband that this money was sent to her by a brother in Iowa; but the woman strongly denies that any other improper language ever passed between them, or that any improper relations existed. The killing occurred shortly after 9 o'clock p. m. The appellant is shown to have purchased a pistol on the 22d of July, and some musket caps. Later on, the same day, he purchased powder. He was in a deep railroad cut on that day firing the pistol. On this day the appellant boxed some of his household goods and shipped them to Iowa, and sold the balance to a second-hand dealer. On the morning of the 23d of July, he stated to a neighbor that he had stayed all night with Hutchinson, the deceased, and that Hutchinson appeared down-hearted and despondent. On the 23d the appellant is seen with an old musket that he said had not been in use for 9 or 10 years. He goes to a hardware store and purchases a box of cartridges. The next morning this box is found in his room, 10 cartridges being missing, and 8 wounds were found on the body, produced by bullets. Early in the morning, after the body was found, footprints were discovered leading from a railroad track towards the house of the deceased. They were first observed at a point north-east of the house. They were traced west, making a circle around to the south side of the house, the side from which the fatal shot was fired. This peculiarity was noticed in one of the tracks: The upper had been torn from the sole of the right shoe near the toe, and extending formed a lip which made a distinct impression at each step where the ground was soft. These tracks were again traced going west from the south side of the house of the deceased. From the length of the stride, it seemed as if the person who made the tracks had been running, and had, on reaching the railroad track west of the house, plunged over the track into a pool of water formed by an embankment, while a few feet on either side was dry and hard ground. The tracks followed neither railroad track nor street, but ran across a piece of ground from which the surface had been removed, and which, on account of a recent rain, was soft, with little pools of water scattered through it. Some of the parties who had discovered and traced these tracks observed that one of the shoes of appellant had the marked peculiarity heretofore spoken of. Later in the day his shoes were taken, compared with these tracks, and it was found that the shoes fit the tracks precisely. A shirt was found hanging behind a door in the appellant's house. It was damp, and had plainly visible the butt of a gun impressed on the left breast, as if it had been held in the act of shooting. The gun used at the time of the shooting was a muzzle-loading one, and paper had been used for wadding, and small portions of it had adhered to the body, and were found scattered through the room where the body of the deceased was found. Several pieces of the wadding were collected, and found to be a portion of a newspaper called the "Wichita Eagle." On the day of the killing, a small roll of cotton batting, around which was wrapped a Wichita Eagle of a date a year prior, was found in the house of the appellant. A portion of this newspaper had been torn away, and, in, smoothing and straightening these parts of the wadding found in the room of the deceased, it appeared that they were taken from the newspaper around the cotton batting. These are some, if not all, of the most important circumstances that tended to fasten the guilt on the appellant, and are a sufficient statement to afford an easy comprehension of the questions we are required to discuss and determine.

1. The first contention of the appellant that we shall notice arises on this state of facts: The appellant was arrested on the 24th day of July, 1889. His preliminary examination, lasting several days, was concluded on the 9th day of August, and on the 18th day of September the county attorney filed an information against him, charging the appellant with the killing of John W. Hutchinson. On the 2d day of October the appellant waived an arraignment, and entered a plea of "not guilty" to said information. On the 8th day of January, 1890, the county attorney, by leave of the court, amended the information by substituting the word "James" for that of "John," a mistake having been made in the information as to the first name of the deceased, it being James instead of John, as stated in the information. The application to be allowed to make this amendment was made in the presence of counsel for the accused, but he was not personally present in court when leave was given and the amendment made. The journal of the court recites that, at the time the amendment was allowed, the trial court ordered that a copy of the amended information be served on the accused, which was done on the 8th day of January, 1890, at 2:20 o'clock P. M. of said day. On the 10th day of January, 1890, at the hour of 9:30 o'clock A. M. the appellant was arraigned and required to plead to the amended information, this being less than 48 hours after the service of the copy. The accused, by his counsel, objected to an arraignment at this hour,—9:30 o'clock A. M.,—for the reason that 48 hours had not elapsed since the service upon him of a certified copy of the amended information. The trial court overruled the objection, and required the accused to plead. This he refused to do, and the court ordered a plea of not guilty to be entered on his behalf. On this state of facts the appellant bases two assignments of error, the first being that it was error to grant the application for leave to amend the information without his personal presence in court, and the second is that he could not be required to plead until after the 48 hours had expired from the time of the service of the certified copy of the amended information; and hence there is no arraignment and plea to support the verdict and judgment of conviction. Section 72 of the Code of Criminal Procedure permits an amendment to the information, either in form or substance, at any time before the defendant pleads, without leave of the court. The information may be amended on the trial as to all matters of form, at the discretion of the court, when the same can be done without prejudice to the rights of the defendant. The section further prescribes that no amendment shall cause any delay of the trial unless for good cause shown by affidavit. The occasion for this amendment was the discovery that a mistake had been made in the first name of the deceased; that it was James instead of John. This amendment was made on the 8th day of January, and the first trial commenced on the 10th. After it had progressed for days, the sickness of a juror caused the discharge of the jury, and a continuance of the case until the March term following. At this term the trial was had from which this appeal was made. We do not believe under such circumstances that the allowance of the amendment was such an error, if error at all, that affected any substantial right of the appellant. It was one of form rather than substance. It is unlike the case cited by counsel for appellant, (Nutt v. State, 63 Ala. 180,) because in that case a mistake was made in the last name of the deceased. Here it was only in the first name. The court has ample power to allow such an amendment before the trial, nor is it necessary that the accused be personally present in order to give validity to such action. Under section 207 of the Criminal Code, as construed in the case of State v. Myrick, 38 Kan. 238, 16 Pac. Rep. 330, "no person charged with a felony can be tried unless he be personally present during the trial." This probably means during every step and stage of the trial. This amendment was not made during the trial. If it had been, a different question might have been presented. It does not seem to us, by any fair construction of our Criminal Code, the personal presence in court of the accused is necessary to give validity to an amendment of the information against him, when such amendment is made before and not during the trial. On the other question it appears that the defendant appeared, waived an arraignment, and entered a plea of not guilty to the original information. There is no complaint anywhere in the record that a certified copy of the original information had not been served upon the appellant for a period of 48 hours before he waived arraignment and pleaded. The question then presented is this: Was the amendment to the information of such a nature that a certified copy of the amended information should have been served? We have already stated that we regard this amendment one of form, rather than of substance. It was the correction of a mistake made in the first name of the deceased, and, in the very nature of things, it could not have resulted in misleading, surprising, or in any other manner affecting the substantial rights of this appellant. It did not change the nature of the offense, or could not in any way operate to the prejudice of the accused. It could not have been a good cause for delay, as no postponement or continuance of the cause was asked for on account of it. Hence we cannot see that a certified copy of the amended information was required to be served on the accused. It is true the court below ordered it to be served, and it may be that this was done more as a matter of convenience to the attorneys of the accused than as a matter of right to him personally. No error is predicated on the mistrial at the January term, and, as a matter of fact, the trial upon which conviction was had was not commenced until two months after the service of a certified copy of the amended information upon the accused. It is true that the trial court demanded an arraignment and plea on the amended information, but, without the amended information changed the nature of the offense charged, or departed in some other substantial or material respect from the original, so as to plainly affect some substantial right of the accused, we are of the opinion that the waiver of arraignment and the plea to the original information are sufficient to create the issue and support the conviction.

2. The second cause of complaint is that the trial court erred in overruling the challenge for cause made by the accused to the jurors Alphin, Kerke, Green, and Ashlock. One of these jurors remained on the panel, and all the others were peremptorily challenged by the appellant, and he thereby unjustly exhausted three of his peremptory challenges. It is said that the jurors Alphin, Green, and Ashlock testified on their voir dire examination that they had formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused that would require evidence to remove. We quote the answers of Alphin to some of the questions propounded: "Question. Have you formed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant? Answer. I think I have. Q. Have you that opinion now? A. Well, I hardly know. If what I heard should turn out to be true, yes, I have. * * * Q. Well, nothing has occurred to change your mind as yet? A. No, sir. Q. It will require something to change your mind? A. Why, yes; there would something new have to come up. Q. Different from what you have heard? A. Yes. Q. Then it would require evidence, would it not, to change the opinion you have? A. I expect, if it was different from what I have heard." The juror Green stated, while he had expressed no opinion, that there was an impression on his mind produced from reading accounts of the murder in the newspaper, and from what he heard, at the time it occurred, as to the guilt of the accused, that would require some evidence to remove. He also stated that, according to the general opinion and the press, the accused was guilty. These two men were twice challenged for cause by the accused, but each challenge was overruled, and they were finally challenged peremptorily by the accused. The degree of fixity of the opinion touching the facts in issue, as tending to disqualify the juror who entertains it, varies considerably in the reported cases. In most courts of last resort it is held that an opinion does not disqualify, if it is based on rumor or newspaper statements, and the juror says, upon oath, that he can give an impartial verdict on the evidence. In some states this rule has become statutory. But if a juror have an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, even if based solely upon newspaper reports, so fixed as to require evidence to remove it, he is not competent, although he may believe that he can render an impartial verdict on the evidence. It is said by Justice VALENTINE, in the case of State v. Miller, 29 Kan. 43, that "every person charged with a criminal offense in Kansas has a right to be tried by an impartial jury. Const., Bill of Rights, § 10. Now, is a juror who possesses an opinion with respect to the guilt or innocence of the accused, and who has 'no doubt' as to the correctness of his opinion, an 'impartial' juror? And is a juror who, having such an opinion, and who would continue to entertain the same until it should be removed by evidence, an impartial juror? Suppose that this opinion was that the defendant was guilty, then would it be possible for the juror to presume that the defendant was innocent, until the contrary was proved? Would he not rather presume that the defendant was guilty, until the contrary was proved? Section 228 of the Criminal Code requires that every defendant in a criminal prosecution shall be 'presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved.' Would the juror, in the case supposed, be competent under this section? Besides, section 205 of the Criminal Code provides that 'it shall be a good cause for challenge to a juror that he has formed or expressed an opinion on the issue, or any material fact to be tried.' Now, would the juror, in the case supposed, be competent under this section? But it may be said that the opinion of the juror in the present case was founded merely upon rumor. Now, there is nothing in the constitution, or in the statutes, providing, or even intimating, that a juror who has formed an opinion upon rumor only may be competent to serve in the case. It may also be said, in the present case, that the juror stated upon his voir dire that he had no bias or prejudice against the defendant, and would be governed entirely by the evidence in the case in making up his verdict, and that he believed that he could try the case impartially. The juror was probably sincere in stating this, and he probably could state the same again with the same sincerity, even though he may have heard all the evidence introduced on the trial of the case. Indeed it is probable that every juror who tried the case could honestly state, if called upon to try the case again, that he believed that he had no bias or prejudice against the defendant, and would be governed entirely by the evidence in making up his verdict, and that he believed that he could try the case impartially. Men are seldom conscious of being biased or prejudiced or of being in such a condition that they could not try any case impartially, and be governed entirely by the evidence introduced on the trial of the case. The fact in the present case that the juror had an opinion with respect to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and that he had no doubt as to the correctness of his opinion, and that his opinion would remain until it should be removed by evidence, was sufficient to render the juror incompetent to serve in the case, and we think that the court below erred in overruling the defendant's challenge to the juror for cause." To exactly the same effect are the cases of Jackson v. State, 77 Ala. 18; Polk v. State, 45 Ark. 167; Andrews v. State, 21 Fla. 598; State v. Ricks, 32 La. Ann. 1099; Stephens v. People, 38 Mich. 739; Olive v. State, 11 Neb. 1, 7 N. W. Rep. 444; People v. Casey, 96 N. Y. 115; McHugh v. State, 38 Ohio St. 153; Frazier v. State, 23 Ohio St. 551; State v. Culler, 82 Mo. 623; Dejarnette v. Com., 75 Va. 867; State v. Meaker, 54 Vt. 112. Whenever it appears from the statements of a juror, when being examined touching his qualifications, that his mind is in such condition respecting the issue or any material fact to be proved at the trial that it will require evidence to remove some opinion or impression that has become fixed, relating to such issue or material fact, it cannot be said that he is an impartial juror. An impartial man—one who extends to his fellow men the humane presumptions of the law, and keeps his mind in such condition with reference to the accused that guilt must be affirmatively and conclusively shown before he is willing to convict—is such a juror as the law contemplates, and as the constitution and statutes of the state demand. Every person charged with the commission of a criminal offense has the constitutional right to be tried only by this class of persons serving as jurors. In this case both of the jurors, Alphin and Green, having stated upon their examinations that they had an opinion; that there was an impression resting on their minds as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant that would require some evidence to remove,—were incompetent, and it was error to overrule the challenges for cause that were directed against them.

3. The third cause for reversal insisted on is the error of the court in the admission of that part of the evidence of the wife of the deceased in which she related a conversation she had with Mr. A. N. Cherry, one of the attorneys of the accused. This conversation occurred in the state of Iowa, and took place while the accused was in prison at the city of Anthony. We are unable to discover any legal theory under which a conversation between two witnesses in a cause is admissible, except for the purpose of impeachment. What was said by the defendant in the jail to Mr. Cherry might be sworn to by Mr. Cherry (if it was not a professional conversation) as an admission that would bind the defendant, but we cannot understand what Mrs. Hutchinson said that Mr. Cherry said that the defendant said could be received. This evidence was objected to at the time it was given, and, at the conclusion of the testimony given by the woman, a motion was made to have it taken from the jury, but both objection and motion were overruled. In both instances the trial court committed grave error. The errors noted compel a reversal of the cause, and the other questions so earnestly discussed by counsel on both sides need not now be determined, as they may not arise on another trial. We recommend that the judgment be reversed and a new trial granted.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Feb. 7, 1891.)

TITLES OF LAWS.

Section 7, c. 138, Sess. Laws 1889, is unconstitutional, and therefore void, because it is in contravention of section 16, art. 2, of the constitution of the state, which provides that "no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Norton county; G. WEBB BERTRAM, Judge.

L. H. Thompson, for plaintiff in error.
J. R. Hamilton, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. By the provisions of chapter 157, Sess. Laws 1887, the salary of the county treasurer of Norton county is fixed at $1,200 per annum. In April, 1889, Francis M. Snow, the county treasurer of that county, under the claim that said chapter 157 had been repealed by chapter 138, Sess. Laws 1889, received from the county salary in excess of that allowed by the act of 1887. This was an action in the court below by the board of county commissioners of Norton county to recover from Snow, the county treasurer, the sum of $100, alleged to have been illegally received by him as salary. No brief has been filed on the part of the county treasurer, but it seems from the record that the trial court decided that chapter 157 had been repealed, and therefore is no longer of any force. The title of said chapter 157 is as follows: "An act to regulate the salaries of county clerk and county treasurer in Norton county, and to repeal chapter one hundred and thirteen of the Session Laws of 1877, entitled 'An act to regulate the salaries of county clerk and county treasurer in certain counties therein named.'" The title of said chapter 138, Sess. Laws 1889, is: "An act regulating the fees and salaries of the county treasurer, county clerk, county attorney, probate judge, and register of deeds of Dickinson county, Kansas, and to repeal chapter 157 of the Session Laws of 1887." Section 7 of said chapter 138 reads: "That chapter 157 of Session Laws of 1887 be, and the same is hereby, repealed." We think that said section 7 of said chapter 138 is unconstitutional, and therefore void, under section 16, art. 2, of the constitution of the state, which ordains that "no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title." Norton county is not named in the title or the body of said chapter 138, and the ordinary impression one would receive from reading the provisions of said chapter 138 is that said section 7 of said chapter repeals some act affecting the fees and salaries of the county officials of Dickinson county, not Norton county, or any other county. Nothing relating to Norton county is clearly expressed in the title. Again, two subjects are contained in said chapter 138. The title does not refer to Norton county, and the body of the act does not purport to fix the fees for the county officials of Norton county, but section 7 of said chapter 138 repeals chapter 157 of the Session Laws of 1887, and therefore is a wholly different matter from fixing the salaries of the county officials of Dickinson county. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court to overrule the demurrer and proceed with the case. All the justices concurring.

STATE v. CITY OF SPOKANE FALLS.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 2, 1891.)

LIQUOR LICENSE — APPORTIONMENT OF REVENUE.

1. Gen. Act Wash. T. Feb. 2, 1888, § 2, providing that the governing body of each incorporated town or village in the territory shall have power to regulate and license the sale of liquors, and that 10 per cent. of the license fees shall be paid into the state treasury, repeals the former special act of January 29, 1886, allowing the city of Spokane Falls to collect and retain the entire amount of the liquor license fees.

2. Act Wash. T. Feb. 2, 1888, entitled "An act to regulate, restrain, license, or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors," and giving the governing body of each incorporated body such powers, and providing that 10 per cent. of the license fees shall be paid into the state treasury, is not obnoxious to Organic Act Wash. T. § 1924, as failing to express its object in its title.

Appeal from superior court, Spokane county.

ANDERS, C. J. This was an action by appellant to recover from appellee 10 per cent. of the amount collected by it for licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors from the 2d day of April, 1888, to the month of December, 1890. The complaint alleges that, during said time, defendant collected and received into its treasury the sum of $102,000 for such licenses, all of which it converted to its own use, and refuses to pay any part thereof to the plaintiff. To this complaint the defendant interposed a general demurrer, which was sustained by the court. Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendant, from which plaintiff appealed to this court. By an act of the legislature of the late territory, approved January 29, 1888, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend an act to incorporate the city of Spokane Falls, approved November 28, 1883,'" it is provided that the city shall have power to license, tax, regulate, and restrain bar-rooms, drinking-shops, or saloons, and that the city treasurer must receive and keep all moneys that shall come to the city by taxation or otherwise, and pay out the same upon the warrant of the mayor attested by the clerk. The most material question for our consideration in this controversy is whether the provisions of the act above mentioned are repealed by a later general law, approved February 2, 1888, entitled "An act to regulate, restrain, license, or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors." It is provided by section 2 of the latter statute that the mayor and council, or other governing body, of each incorporated town or incorporated village in Washington Territory, shall have the sole and exclusive authority and power to regulate, restrain, license, or prohibit the sale or disposal of spirituous, fermented, malt, or other intoxicating liquors within the corporate limits of their respective cities, towns, or villages, provided * * * said license fee shall be paid annually in advance to the treasurer of the city, town, or village, who shall pay ten (10) per cent. thereof into the general fund of the territorial treasury, and hand the remaining ninety per cent. into the general fund of the city, town, or village treasury."

It is contended by counsel for appellee that the general law will not repeal or amend the special act unless it is the manifest and clear intention of the legislature so to do, which must be gathered from the language used in the act itself, and that such an intention is not thus made to appear. This is conceded to be a correct general proposition of law by counsel for appellant, but he claims that, in this instance, the legislature has clearly manifested its intention to so repeal or modify the special charter of appellee in so far as the general statute is inconsistent therewith, for the reason that the act of February 2, 1888, is a general revision of all prior laws relating to the same subject, and obviously designed to supersede them. An examination of the charters of the various municipal organizations throughout the territory discloses the fact that while they were generally clothed with the power to license and regulate the disposal of spirituous and intoxicating liquors within their respective limits, there was no uniformity of rule as to the disposition of the funds collected from licenses. Some of the charters required a portion of the moneys collected for licenses to sell intoxicating liquors to be paid into the county treasury, while others permitted the municipal corporations to retain the entire amount. From these considerations we are led to believe that the legislature in passing the act of February 2, 1888, intended to enact a general law which should supersede, and which did supersede, all prior laws on the same subject, either general or special.

Appellee further contends that the statute of 1888 is obnoxious to the objection that the object is not expressed in its title, and that it is therefore void as contravening section 1924 of the organic act of the territory; but we think the objection is manifestly not tenable.

Before closing this opinion, it is proper to remark that, at the time of the passage of the act of 1888, there was no city, town, or village incorporated in the territory of Washington, otherwise than by special act. And it is therefore obvious that section 2 of said act must have been intended to apply to and modify the special charters of municipal corporations then existing. For the foregoing reasons the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer.

TACOMA LAND CO. v. BOARD OF COUNTY COM'RS PIERCE COUNTY.

ROAD-TAXES—CITIES—GENERAL LAWS.

Act Wash. Feb. 4, 1886, incorporating the city of Tacoma, provides in section 3 that the city shall be a separate and independent road-district, in which the county commissioners shall have no authority to levy either property or poll taxes for road purposes. Held, that the section is not repealed by Act March 28, 1890, "to provide for the assessment and collection of taxes in the state of Washington," nor by Act March 7, 1890, "to provide for keeping highways in repair," both of the latter being general statutes, and not radically irreconcilable with such special act.

STILES, J. This cause was submitted to the court below upon an agreed case, in pursuance of chapter 26 of the Code, and it comes here under certification from that court, under section 453. It appears from the record certified thus that section 3 of chapter 1 of the act of the legislature approved February 4, 1886, which was a special act incorporating the city of Tacoma in Pierce county, contained the following provisions: "Sec. 3. The corporate city limits aforesaid shall not be included within any road-district, nor shall the county commissioners of Pierce county have any jurisdiction to assess, levy, or collect any road property or road poll tax upon the property or inhabitants therein; and so much of any county public road as lies within said corporate limits shall be kept in repair by the council of said city. But the said council may, by ordinance, vacate any such road or parts thereof, and conform the same to opened and established streets. Said city shall be a separate and independent road-district, under the exclusive control of the said city corporation. All road taxes, whether road poll or road property taxes, levied, assessed, or collected within the corporate limits of said city, shall belong to said city, and be expended therein, under the authority and direction of the city council thereof, upon county roads or parts thereof lying within said city limits, and upon the streets, highways, and alleys of said city. The city may appropriate from its general municipal fund money to aid in the opening of streets, or work upon roads or bridges or the construction or repair of wharves, docks, piers, or landing places within the city limits, but the said city shall not be entitled to receive from the county of Pierce any appropriation of county funds in aid of roads or bridges within the corporate limits of said city." Since the passage of the foregoing act, therefore, the city of Tacoma has constituted an independent road-district within the county of Pierce, burdened with the duty of keeping in repair the public roads within its corporate limits from funds levied and collected under its own authority. No road or poll taxes have been, in the mean time, levied by the county of Pierce upon the property of the citizens of Tacoma, but the jurisdiction for such purposes has been conceded to be in the municipal authorities. But in this year the commissioners of that county, claiming authority under the act of March 28, 1890, have levied and are proceeding to collect a road property tax and poll-taxes from property and persons in the city of Tacoma, of which complaint is made; and the propositions we have submitted here are accordingly as follows: (1) Does the said act repeal the special act incorporating the city of Tacoma? (2) Should the said tax be levied upon the property within the limits of the city of Tacoma? (3) Should it be levied upon the property within the corporate limits of other incorporated towns within the county of Pierce? (4) What disposition should the board of county commissioners make of taxes so levied? These queries were presented to this court hastily, and out of the usual order, and without briefs; but, on account of their public importance, we have considered them in this somewhat unsatisfactory way, and as the result of this consideration, we are constrained to answer the several propositions thus: (1) Neither the act of March 28, 1890, "An act to provide for the assessment and collection of taxes in the state of Washington," nor the act of March 7, 1890, "An act to provide for keeping highways in repair," etc., (Acts 1890, pp. 530, 617,) repeal or affect section 3 of chapter 1 of the act of February 4, 1886, for the incorporation of the city of Tacoma. (2) The said levy of taxes for road purposes should not have been levied upon property or persons within the limits of the city of Tacoma. (3) The board of county commissioners of Pierce county should, to avoid litigation, expense, and a multiplicity of suits, so far as in its power lies, recall and rescind its action in levying said taxes, and in causing the treasurer of said county to collect the same. (4) The question proposed as to other incorporated towns in Pierce county is scarcely material under the case submitted. Suffice it to say, therefore, that the same principles which govern in this instance would naturally govern in the case of any other incorporated town having a charter in substance like that of Tacoma.

The principle upon which we rest our decision in this case is that a special act incorporating a municipal corporation, or conferring upon it unusual powers and duties, is not impliedly repealed by a subsequent general statute which treats at large of the whole subject of which the special statute treats of a part, although the general statute contains words repealing all acts and parts of acts in conflict with its provisions. Endl. Interp. St. § 228; City of Harrisburg v. Sheck, 104 Pa. St. 53. It is only when the two acts are so glaringly repugnant to, and radically irreconcilable with, each other as to render it impossible that both can stand that this rule ceases to be applicable. Endl. Interp. St. § 230. But such is not the case here. The general law for the raising of revenue and the maintenance of roads is substantially the same as it was before the acts of 1890 were passed. True, section 2970 of the Code contained an express exception from the operation of the chapter on roads of all cities and towns whose charters vested in them the sole power to provide for and control the matter of roads within their limits. But this special law would have had full force without that exception thus declared, and it still has full force, although the exception was omitted from the act of March 7, 1890. The constitutional prohibition against special legislation to incorporate any town or village or to amend the charter thereof has no bearing upon this matter. Such constitutional enactments are purely prospective. They do not affect existing special charters. The city of Tacoma continued, and would continue, to hold its special charter, in all its features not necessarily repugnant to other constitutional provisions, until subsequent general legislation, clearly applicable to it, should modify or sweep away its charter. And we hold that there has been no such applicable legislation. It appears by the case before us that, in November last, the inhabitants of Tacoma, under article 11, § 10, of the constitution, and the act of March 24, 1890, adopted a municipal charter of their own, whereby the act of 1886, and all acts amendatory thereof, and special laws inconsistent with the new charter, were superseded, and this is urged as operating as a repeal of the special road-district feature of that city. But whatever may be the relations of the city of Tacoma, under its new charter, to the general laws of the state, and whether it has now forfeited the powers, and been relieved of the duties, imposed by the act of 1886, and whether the commissioners of Pierce county would now have the jurisdiction claimed, are not matters material to this inquiry. These taxes were levied in August, 1890, when the board did not have jurisdiction, and no subsequent change in the charter of the city of Tacoma could cause any jurisdiction which they would now have, to revert to a time when the law forbade the exercise of any such authority. For these reasons, the cause is remanded to the court below, with instructions to enter a decree restraining the board of commissioners of Pierce county from collecting, or attempting to collect, the said taxes, and commanding them to strike said taxes from the tax levy of Pierce county, as to all property and persons taxable within the city of Tacoma. Costs to the appellant.

MOORE v. PERROT.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION—SALE—ACCEPTANCE.

1. The article of Const. Wash. relating to superior courts gives them original jurisdiction in all civil cases where the value of the property in controversy amounts to $100; and it further declares that part of the judicial power of the state shall be vested in justices of the peace, whose jurisdiction shall be fixed by the legislature, but shall not trench on that of the superior courts. Prior to the adoption of the constitution, justices had jurisdiction of civil cases to the amount of $300. Held that, under the constitution, justices have no jurisdiction in excess of $100.

2. Where a justice has taken jurisdiction of a case involving more than $100, and an appeal is taken from his judgment, it will be treated as a proper transfer of the case to the superior court.

3. Where one who has employed another to build him a boat for a given sum, takes possession of it when finished, and then refuses to pay for it, but gives no reason for his refusal, the builder is entitled to recover the contract price.

STILES, J. This action was commenced before a justice of the peace on the 9th day of November, 1889. On the 18th day of November the justice rendered judgment against the defendant for the full amount demanded, —$240. The proclamation of the president declaring the state of Washington admitted into the Union was issued November 11, 1889. From that date the provisions of the constitution were in force, (Const. art. 27, § 16,) and on the following Monday, November 18th, the terms of all officers began. On Monday, November 18th, therefore, when the justice of the peace rendered this judgment, his jurisdiction of the subject-matter—that is, of an action wherein the amount in controversy was $100 or more—had ceased, and he was powerless to take any further step in the case, except to transfer it to the superior court. Id. art. 4, §§ 6, 10; and article 27, § 5. We were strongly urged upon the hearing of this cause to hold that justices of the peace in this state still have jurisdiction of actions at law for the recovery of money or property in the sum of $300. But this does not seem to be founded in any substantial reason. Before the constitution became operative, there existed in the Territory of Washington, under the organic act, courts of justices of the peace, whose jurisdiction in certain civil cases was fixed at $300. But upon the admission of the state, as was said in Benner v. Porter, 9 How. 235, the territorial government was displaced and abrogated, every part of it, and no jurisdiction thereafter existed within her limits except that derived from state authority. Therefore, except for those portions of the constitution which continue in force those laws of the territory which were not repugnant to the constitution, there would have been, upon the incoming of the state, no justices' courts whatever. The justices courts were thus continued, however, and the only matter to be decided is whether the statute which gave them partial jurisdiction of cases involving $300 was in any manner repugnant to the constitution. The portion of that instrument relating to superior courts gives them original jurisdiction in all cases in which the demand, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to $100, and also jurisdiction in all cases whatever in which jurisdiction shall not have been by law vested exclusively in some other court. Like wise other sections of the same article provide that part of the judicial power of the state shall be vested in justices of the peace, with power in the legislature to determine their number and prescribe their jurisdiction, provided that such jurisdiction shall not trench upon the jurisdiction of the superior or other courts of record. Now, the previously existing statute stands as the action of the legislature, and there are justices of the peace with jurisdiction prescribed, and the question is whether, by continuing to take jurisdiction of cases where the demand or value of the property in controversy is $100 or more, they will be "trenching" upon the jurisdiction of the superior or other courts of record. The language of the constitution is not that the superior court shall have exclusive jurisdiction, but it gives to the superior courts universal original jurisdiction, leaving the legislature to carve out from that jurisdiction the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace, and any other inferior courts that may be created. Thus justices of the peace may be given exclusive original jurisdiction in cases where the demand or value of property in controversy is not $100, in cases of misdemeanor, and of other special cases and proceedings not otherwise provided for or specially enumerated as within the jurisdiction of the superior courts. It is the enumeration of the particular matters which are within the original jurisdiction of the superior courts, which we interpret to mean that those matters pertain to them exclusively. The language is not the clearest that could have been used, but, unless it is so interpreted, there can be no possible force in the restriction placed upon the legislature in its power to confer jurisdiction upon justices of the peace; for, if the minor courts can have concurrent jurisdiction with the superior courts up to $300, there is not a syllable in the constitution to prevent them from having it to any amount. This is certainly not to be conceded.

What, then, was the effect of the judgment of the justice in this case? We hold it to have been null, void, and of no effect whatever. But the justice transferred the cause to the superior court, and we hold that the transfer thus made was sufficient, although accomplished under the form of an appeal. The cause was then tried in the superior court before a jury upon the issues made before the justice. Appellant complains of the refusal of the court below to grant a nonsuit, on the ground that there was a variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proofs offered. But considering that the action was commenced in a justice court, and giving such a reasonably liberal construction of the pleadings as is allowable, and considering our statute upon the subject of variance, we are constrained to support the judgment. The contract was to build a boat for the defendant, and it was the boat that was to be paid for in the sum of $240. When completed, the general property in the boat was in the defendant, (Goddard v. Binney, 115 Mass. 450,) and the contract price was due from him. The testimony showed the completion of the boat, and a tender of it to him. He seemed pleased with it, and took possession of it far enough to use it on the water, but then refused to take or pay for it without giving any reason. There was no question here that the boat was to be built to the satisfaction of the defendant, and the evidence clearly showed the boat to be a good one, built according to the contract. The judgment is affirmed, with costs to the appellee.

LEASE—FORFEITURE—PLEADING—APPEAL—RECORD—CURE OF ERRORS.

1. In an action to enforce the forfeiture of a lease on the ground of alterations made in the premises by the tenant which violated the terms of the lease unless assented to by the lessor, it is error to strike from the answer an allegation that plaintiff knew of such alterations, but did not object thereto until some time afterwards, and in the mean time accepted the rent accruing, thereby waiving the forfeiture.

2. Where the record shows the motion to strike out such allegation, but fails to show that it was granted, or that any exception was taken thereto, the admission in appellant's brief that the motion was granted will be taken as true, as also the statement that this ruling was duly excepted to.

3. The error in striking out such allegation is not cured by the fact that evidence was incidentally introduced in support of it, when it is not shown that defendant was informed by the court that he might introduce it, or that the matter was fully gone into.

Thos. Fitzgerald and Johnson & Moody, for appellant. John Trumbull, for appellee.

SCOTT, J. This was an action of forcible entry and detainer brought by appellee against appellant upon the ground of forfeiture of a lease by making alterations in the building which was contrary to the terms of the lease unless consented to by the appellee, and which alterations she alleged to have been waste. The superior court found in her favor. Appellant, as a part of his answer, alleged that the plaintiff had full knowledge of the making of said alterations at the time the same were made, and that she continued to receive rent accruing thereafter under the lease, without notifying him until some time subsequently that she intended to claim a forfeiture, and that she had thereby waived any right to take advantage thereof. The record shows that the plaintiff moved to strike the foregoing from the answer, but it fails to show any order of the court thereon. Both parties were apparently under the impression that such an order did appear, as the case was argued and submitted to us upon that theory. But the appellee contended no exception was taken thereto; that, in order to do this, it was necessary to settle a bill of exceptions. Under our practice, however, if an exception was taken and made a part of the order, a transcript of the journal entry, granting the motion and showing the exception, would have been sufficient to raise the question, or it would be sufficient if the statement of facts showed the exception; but, as neither the order nor exception is shown in any way by the record, the case is left in a peculiar attitude. If the motion was in fact not granted, judgment should have been rendered for the defendant, upon the ground that these matters set up in the answer, which amounted to a defense if true, were not denied in the plaintiff's reply, and therefore stood admitted. If stricken out, and not excepted to, the appellant would thereby be prevented from raising the point here. We think appellant's admission in his brief and upon the argument that the motion was granted, and an order made striking said matters from the answer, must be taken as true, but that we should take it coupled with the statement there made, that the order was excepted to, and the point is accordingly raised in this way. Such a course would be less injurious to the appellee, as were the case reversed upon the ground that judgment should have been rendered for the defendant upon the pleadings,—and this point is substantially raised by the record,—the plaintiff might be precluded from having a retrial.

It was contended by appellee that if it was error to grant the motion the same was subsequently cured by allowing appellant to introduce evidence in support of the allegations stricken from the answer. The record shows that some such proof was introduced, and the court made a finding of fact thereon against the appellant, but the record does not show that these matters were fully gone into, or that appellant was informed that he could offer his evidence in support thereof, nor that the order granting the motion, if made, was ever vacated. The mere fact that some such proof was incidentally made, and that the court found thereon, cannot be held to have cured the error under the circumstances. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY — EXCEPTIONS — COUNTIES — UNLAWFUL CONTRACT — ESTOPPEL.

1. When, in an equity case by the tax-payers of a county to enjoin the payment of county warrants, judgment is rendered on the pleadings, there need be no exception in order to bring the questions raised by the pleadings before the court on appeal.

2. Where the board of county commissioners make a contract for the improvement of a county road which involves the expenditure of more money than they have authority to appropriate for that purpose, and issue warrants therefor, the payment of these warrants will not be enjoined at the suit of tax-payers who, with knowledge of all the facts, petitioned that the road be improved, and permitted the work to be completed without objection.

Appeal from superior court, Clallam county; C. H. HANFORD, Judge.

SCOTT, J. It is alleged by the complaint in this case that appellant W. C. Williams entered into a contract with appellants Robert Travis, Alfred Lee, and J. S. Maxfield, the board of county commissioners of Clallam county, and purporting to act in behalf of said county therein, to improve a certain highway or county road; and that said commissioners issued to said Williams county warrants therefor in the sum of $13,800.95. It is further alleged that the total valuation of the assessable property of said county at that time was but $501,267, and that there was no money in the county treasury for the purpose of building roads, nor was any thereafter appropriated for such purpose. The appellees brought this action as tax-payers of said county against said Williams and said county commissioners, and also against Smith Troy and W. L. Church, the auditor and treasurer of said county, to enjoin the payment of the warrants. The defendants answered alleging good faith upon the part of Williams and the commissioners; that they believed they had a lawful right to enter into the contract; and that the same was made by the commissioners in response to numerous signed petitions by the residents and tax-payers of said county, and that the appellees themselves signed one of said petitions, had full knowledge of the contract at the time it was made, and of all the work performed thereunder during the pendency thereof; that they stood by and permitted said work to proceed without objection until the road was completed and warrants issued. No reply was filed to these matters alleged in the answer, and both parties moved the court for judgment on the pleadings,—the plaintiffs on the ground that the matters set up in the answer constituted no defense, and the defendants on the ground that, the plaintiffs having failed to reply, the affirmative defense must be taken as true, and that it was sufficient. The court rendered judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal.

The first proposition we are met with is that no exception was taken by appellants to the action of the superior court in the premises. But as this is an equity case, and as it was submitted to the lower court upon the facts as shown by the pleadings, we think an appeal from the judgment on the facts can be maintained, although an exception was not taken. Had these matters been stricken from the answer the case would be different, and an exception would be necessary, but the court simply held them, while true, to be immaterial, and rendered a decree for the plaintiffs. Under the allegations of the complaint, which are taken as true for the purpose of this hearing, the contract in question was illegal, and the issue of the warrants in question, or the greater portion of them at least, was clearly unauthorized.

While the county commissioners have a general supervision over county roads, with power to lay out and establish, etc., as provided by section 2673 of the Code, they must proceed according to law, and as there were no moneys on hand for the purpose of improving highways, and as the commissioners only had authority to appropriate therefor two-tenths of 1 per cent. on the amount of taxable property of such county shown by the last preceding assessment, as provided by an act of the legislature approved February 2, 1888, (see Sess. Laws 1887-88, p. 195,) it follows that any attempted incurring of such indebtedness in excess thereof was without lawful authority. While this is true, however, equity will not permit persons standing in the position of these plaintiffs, if the matters pleaded in the answer hereinbefore stated are true in fact, to directly encourage the commission of an unlawful act of this character, stand by and permit the work to be carried on in pursuance thereof without objection, by which they, in common with the other citizens and property owners of the county, are benefited, to take advantage of their own wrong in the premises, and enjoin payment of the indebtedness therefor so undertaken to be incurred. See Brown v. Merrick Co., 18 Neb. 356, 25 N. W. Rep. 356; Sleeper v. Bullen, 6 Kan. 300; Weber v. City of San Francisco, 1 Cal. 455. For this reason the judgment is reversed. But, instead of rendering a final decree, it is thought best, in view of the condition of this case, to send it back, allowing the parties to file amended pleadings, and the plaintiffs to reply, if desired, that there may be an opportunity for a retrial upon the evidence; and it is remanded accordingly.

REAL-ESTATE AGENTS — REVOCATION OF AUTHORITY — INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action by a real-estate agent for a commission, defendant claimed that the agent was employed for three days only, and that on the fifth day she expressly revoked his authority. Plaintiff admitted receiving the note revoking his authority, but denied that his employment was limited as to time by the contract, and it appeared that the property was sold to a purchaser found by plaintiff. Held that, if there was no limit as to time, the owner could at any time revoke the authority, and if, at the time of the revocation, the agent had a negotiation pending for the sale, which the owner afterwards consummates, the agent was entitled to his commission.

Appeal from superior court, Spokane county.

James B. Jones and C. S. Voorhees, for appellant. Griffiths, Moore & Feighan, for appellees.

STILES, J. The appellees brought suit against the appellant for a real-estate agent's commission, alleging that their compensation was to be $500, payable when they should effect a sale, and that they had not been paid. The answer was a general denial. From a judgment upon a verdict for the full sum demanded, this appeal was taken.

The undisputed facts would appear to be that the appellant was the owner of certain real estate in Spokane Falls, which she was desirous to sell, and on or about the 27th day of March, 1889, Lancaster, who was a member of a firm doing business in that city as real-estate agents, called upon her, and solicited an employment as agent to sell her property. Appellant assented to the proposition, and agreed to pay $500 as a commission upon the sale. On the 16th day of April following, a sale of the property was made to one Edwards for $27,000. The disputed matters on the part of the appellant were that she stipulated that the employment should continue but for three days, at the price of $26,250; that after that she would not sell at that price, but would ask a higher price, and would sell it herself; that at the expiration of about five days, no sale having been made or proposed, she notified appellees in writing that their employment had ceased, and that the sale made was without their assistance, or, if made through any assistance of theirs, it was without her knowledge, and they did nothing until after the expiration of the three days stipulated, and the service of notice that their employment was terminated. The appellees denied all these claims on the part of the appellant, and insisted that no time was mentioned in which the sale should be made, and no price was fixed; but that Lancaster, on his visit of solicitation, after he had secured appellant's agreement to pay him a commission, told her he had a person in view as a purchaser, Mr. Edwards, a person who was not on speaking terms with appellant, and whom Lancaster did not wish informed that his firm had anything to do with the sale; that appellant agreed to receive a proposition directly from Edwards, and to conduct the entire transaction herself, without Lancaster's apparent interference; that Lancaster proposed the matter to Edwards before the latter had ever had any conference with appellant; and that the subsequent sale was the result of his efforts,—all of which in turn the appellant stoutly combatted. The appellees admitted the receipt of the notice of the termination of their employment, the destruction of the paper, and the substantial purport of its contents, as claimed by appellant, but maintained that it did not reach their hands until after their work was done, viz., the suggestion of the purchase to Edwards, which was followed up by the sale of the property to him. This matter, with the question whether there was a three-days limit to the contract for a commission, constituted the real issues which went to the jury; for the appellant, by her witness Edwards, showed that it was through Lancaster that he received the first suggestion that he might be able to purchase appellant's property, and was urged to see her in reference to it. The matter of the limited time for the sale was fairly submitted to the jury by the court by its instruction on that point. But it is contended that the charge on the subject of the notice contained serious error. It was as follows: "But, if you believe that there was no limit upon this contract as to the time in which the sale should be made, then the plaintiff would have a reasonable time in which to effect a sale, virtually effected the sale, or if, before they had virtually performed the contract, she saw fit not to rescind the contract, because she would have no right to rescind the contract under any circumstances, but she would have a right to break it at any time, taking the lawful consequences, whatever that might be; so I instruct you that if, before they had performed the contract on their part, she sent this note discharging these men from that contract, that that would be a breach of it, and they could not recover in this action, because they have brought this action upon the theory that they performed the contract, that the contract was broken by her in failing to pay the money, and not in discharging or annulling the contract before they performed it. If she annulled the contract by this method I have indicated, before they virtually performed or substantially performed the contract on their part, why, then, they can recover in this action, although she sent the note because she could not escape her liability after that by sending it." The action was brought upon an express contract to pay $500, if appellees should be instrumental in effecting a sale of appellant's property, the only difference between this case and one of ordinary real-estate agent's employment being that the amount of the agent's compensation was fixed by the agreement, whereas, usually, the fee of the agent is a percentage or a sum representing the value of the service. In this case, therefore, while the appellees, if there was no limit of time fixed between the parties, had full authority to go on and find a purchaser ready, able, and willing to take the property, appellant could at any time revoke their authority, and put an end to their employment. If, moreover, a reasonable time should not have elapsed between the date of giving the authority and its revocation, the agent could usually recover his reasonable outlay and the value of his services in endeavoring to make a sale. And if, at the time of the revocation, the agent should have a pending treaty with a proposing purchaser, who afterwards, by a continuance of the same negotiations with the principal himself, actually buy the property, the agent would have fully earned his commission, since the principal in such a transaction cannot arbitrarily cut off the agent's authority, in the midst of what would be a successful agency, and then, although himself taking advantage of the agent's services, refuse him compensation. This was the law of the case, but it was not so given to the jury. While the language used, taking it altogether, is perhaps susceptible of a construction similar to the rule laid down above, it is very doubtful whether a jury, hearing it read as pronounced orally by the judge, would get any such idea of the law from it. It deals in very strong expressions, such as: "She would have no right to rescind the contract under any circumstances, but she would have a right to break it any time, taking the lawful consequences," etc. That part of the charge which informs the jury that the plaintiffs must recover upon the theory that they had fully performed the contract, and not that they had been discharged prematurely, the appellant cannot complain of. But the remainder of it, which told the jury that if, when the note was sent, the plaintiffs had "performed the contract on their part," they could recover in this action, was misleading, since nowhere were the jury told the elements necessary to constitute the "performance" of the "contract" by the appellees, unless it is to be found in an earlier part of the charge, where the court said that the doing of "any service, which was the moving or procuring cause in effecting the sale, was sufficient to warrant a recovery." This latter clause is, however, just as objectionable, since there was coupled with it no explanation whatever of what was meant by moving "or procuring cause." The jury should have been told clearly that in order to entitle appellees to recover, if they found a sale had been made, the purchaser must have been induced to buy through their efforts in calling his attention to the property prior to the note of revocation. The jury would have understood that, but they would have been very likely to misinterpret what was said, especially when informed that the appellant "would have no right to rescind the contract under any circumstances." The error thus committed we consider sufficient ground for reversal.

The appellant, however, further claims that, by numerous turns of expression in the charge, the court transgressed the constitutional rule against charging juries in respect to matters of fact or commenting thereon, and strongly intimated to the jury his opinion that appellees should recover. The latter imputation we do not think sustained, but several unguarded expressions came very near sustaining the former one. As it is not necessary to this decision that we particularize them, we shall only make them a basis for remarking that our constitutional provision on this subject is very strong, and that it behooves the judges, when called upon to charge juries, to exercise very great caution to avoid error in this particular. In an oral charge, the danger is especially great that some chance allusion to a controverted fact, as though it were established by the evidence, may overturn what is really a just verdict. Take the following: "There is some evidence here tending to show that, after the bargain was entered into, Mrs. Knox sent a note to the plaintiffs, upon the terms of which they were discharged from any further service in regard to the matter. There is some dispute about what this note contained. This is matter for your determination alone as to what it did contain." The language used in the first sentence, that there was "some evidence tending to show" the sending of a note, would seem to throw a doubt as to whether a note was sent or not; whereas, both parties agreed that the note had been sent and received. And, again, the words "after the bargain was entered into" leaves it doubtful whether the court meant by "bargain" the employment of appellees as agents, or the agreement of Edwards to buy. The attention of the jury was directed only to the ascertainment of what the note contained, coupled with a statement that, if appellees had performed their contract before it was sent, the appellant could not be allowed to escape liability at that time by any method of that kind. No question was submitted as to when, in relation to the "bargain," the note was sent, unless "bargain" meant the employment of the appellees merely; but a juror might well query whether the court were not assuming the time of sending the note as after the sale to Edwards had been agreed upon, thus telling them his views of that matter. Appellees contend here that the action of the court in allowing the appellant to testify as to the contents of the note, before it appeared that the original could not be produced, was error, and because of that error the court's entire instruction on the subject of the note was error, and not prejudicial to the appellant; but the matter is disposed of through the incorrectness of the first supposition, since Lancaster, in his testimony in chief for the appellees, not only stated that he had received the note, but gave its contents, and showed that he had destroyed it, thus opening the way to appellant to contradict him as to the time of his reception of the note, and as to its contents, and thus also allowing her to avail herself of the legal effect of the notice as fully as though she had pleaded it in her answer, no objection having been made to the introduction of this as an affirmative matter of defense, although not pleaded. The judgment will be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to appellant. It is so ordered.

ANDERS, C. J., and SCOTT and HOYT, JJ., concur.

DUNBAR, J. I concur in the result, for the reasons stated, and for the further reason that the statement of the judge that "there was some evidence tending to show that a certain note has been sent by defendant," etc., was a violation of the rule in regard to judges commenting on the testimony. What the law governing the case is, is for the judge to state. What the evidence shows, or tends to show, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the jury.

MCGRAW v. FRANKLIN.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—REPLEVIN—EVIDENCE—VERDICT.

1. Where goods recently sold to plaintiff are attached by a creditor of her vendor, and, in consideration of plaintiff's giving her note for the debt, the vendor promises to pay the note at its maturity, this is not such a promise to pay the debt of another as is required by the statute of frauds to be in writing.

2. A mortgage was given to secure this note, and both were assigned to A., who was the brother of said vendor, and who foreclosed the mortgage. In replevin against the sheriff in possession of the goods under the foreclosure proceedings, plaintiff alleged that the vendor in fact paid the note, but instead of discharging the mortgage he fraudulently procured its transfer to A. It was shown that A. had no money with which to pay the note, and the evidence was conflicting as to whether the money with which it was paid was furnished him by the vendor or another person. Held, that a judgment for plaintiff would not be disturbed.

3. Where it was shown that many of the goods had been sold to third persons, and so could not be returned, a verdict for damages only, and not in the alternative for the value of the goods, is not erroneous, especially where the point was not raised below.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

SCOTT, J. This was an action to recover possession of a certain stock of merchandise, or its value, brought by appellee against appellant in March, 1885. Appellee alleged in her amended complaint that she was the owner of the goods, and in the possession thereof; gave a detailed list of them, with the value of each item, and stated the aggregate value to have been $800; averred a wrongful taking by appellant, and claimed damages in the sum of $800 for the detention. The complaint also contained a separate cause of action asking for damages occasioned by the suspension of her business. No proof was introduced in support of this, however, and it appears to have been abandoned upon the trial of the cause. The defendant denied that plaintiff owned the goods, and denied that they were of any greater value than a sum set opposite each item, amounting, in the aggregate, to $375.40, and denied that plaintiff was damaged. A further defense was set up in the answer that the plaintiff gave a chattel mortgage upon said goods in August, 1884, to E. P. Ferry to secure the payment of a note for $526, executed to him by plaintiff at said time, which became due November 10th following; that plaintiff failed to pay the note, and on March 12, 1885, said Ferry sold the note and assigned the mortgage to one Andrew Merchant, who instituted a statutory foreclosure thereof by notice and sale in the name of the assignor; that the defendant was the sheriff of King county, and took possession of the goods and held them by virtue of said proceedings. Plaintiff, in her reply, admitted giving the note and mortgage, but alleged that the same were given for the benefit of one Robert Merchant and one W. A. Stewart, who were partners doing business under the name of R. Merchant & Co., as an accommodation to them, for which the plaintiff received no consideration. That said Merchant also agreed to pay the note before its maturity, and did pay the same in March, 1885, before the institution of said foreclosure proceedings; but that, for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff, the said Robert Merchant, W. A. Stewart, and Andrew Merchant conspired together, and, instead of causing the mortgage to be discharged, procured it and the note to be assigned to said Andrew Merchant, of which fraud the defendant had due notice. The parties proceeded to a trial of the issues as thus formed, without objection. Plaintiff recovered a verdict for $968.75, which, however, upon a motion therefor by defendant, was set aside. At a subsequent trial, in April last, plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for $975, from which this appeal was taken.

Appellant contends that the court erred in permitting proof that Robert Merchant agreed to pay the note and mortgage given by plaintiff to Ferry, on the ground that it was a promise to pay the debt of another, and, not being in writing, was void. That the verdict is not sustained by the evidence, in this: that the amount of the verdict is largely in excess of any proof of the value of the goods. That there was no proof of the payment of plaintiff's note by Robert Merchant, or of any fraud; and that the court erred in permitting evidence as to a statement made by Andrew Merchant, and allowing the same to be contradicted by the deposition of the witness Fenton. He also alleges the verdict to be erroneous because it is not in the alternative form. Some minor grounds of error were alleged, which were either not saved by the record or are not considered of sufficient importance by the court to discuss. In order to review the grounds stated, it will be necessary to go into the evidence to some extent. The proof shows that in the summer of 1884 Robert Merchant and W. A. Stewart were engaged in a confectionery business, as partners under the firm name of R. Merchant & Co.; that during said summer they borrowed of the plaintiff $575, and gave her a chattel mortgage upon the goods in question to secure the payment thereof; that they subsequently conveyed the goods to her in payment of said note; that soon thereafter a suit in attachment was brought against said R. Merchant & Co. by other parties, and the goods so conveyed by them were attached in said action. Against the objection of appellant, testimony was introduced by plaintiff to the effect that Robert Merchant made her a parol promise that if she would settle the claim for which R. Merchant & Co. had been sued by giving her note for the amount to said Ferry, with a chattel mortgage upon said goods to secure its payment, he would pay the note at or before its maturity; and that she gave the note and mortgage and settled said suit accordingly. That she supposed the property was attached, because they thought she had no right to it. It is the opinion of the court that it is not necessary such a promise should be in writing, it having been made to the plaintiff direct; that the promise was valid and binding as between the plaintiff and said Merchant. As to the proof of value plaintiff testified that she furnished the list of items and the amount thereof contained in the complaint; that she paid $775 for the goods; that they were not worth any more than that, and that the list set forth in the complaint was a correct list of the property with the value of each article; that she paid $10 additional for the counter. Upon cross-examination she admitted that she had no knowledge of the value of some of the articles, and that her knowledge as to the value of any of them was very slight; that she took Robert Merchant's word largely as to the values at the time she bought the goods, and had to do so, the way she was situated, as it was the only way she had to get pay for the amount she had loaned thereon. David Franklin, plaintiff's husband, testified that he knew the property, and made out a list of it, which Mr. Osborn wrote; that he (witness) furnished the list and amounts; that he put the property in at a fair estimation; that the total valuation was in the neighborhood of $800; and that the property was worth about that amount. Upon cross-examination he testified that they had never been in the candy business before, and that he had never bought or sold any candy machinery. The only other proof in relation to value was introduced by defendant, who testified that he obtained the best prices possible for the goods at a sheriff's sale, and that they brought $375.55. If the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the goods, she could also recover interest thereon from the time of the conversion; there having been no proof of any special damage, and the evidence as to value was sufficient to sustain the verdict found.

The points raised as to the failure of the proof to show any fraud, or payment of plaintiff's note by Robert Merchant, and as to the proof of the statement made by Andrew Merchant, will be considered together. The plaintiff testified Robert Merchant told her, if she would give her note and mortgage to Ferry to pay the claim for which R. Merchant & Co. had been sued, that he would go over in Oregon, and raise the money, pay off the mortgage, and take the business back; that he owned land in Oregon; that he thereafter went to Oregon, and said he would borrow the money of his mother; that Andrew Merchant was poor, and was working around by day's work; that he did not have any money to pay board or room-rent, and did not have any money with which he could buy plaintiff's note and mortgage; that he lived with his family in the back end of her store-room; and that, after the sale of the property by the sheriff, Robert Merchant took it, and went on with the business as before, under the firm name of R. Merchant & Co. David Franklin testified that when the property was attached in the suit against R. Merchant & Co. he said to Robert Merchant: "How is this? You claimed when you got that money and gave the bill of sale that there were no debts against the place. What are you going to do about it?" And that Robert Merchant said: "We will make that all right." I said: "We got this property in good faith, knowing nothing of any indebtedness;" and he said, "I told you there was nothing against the place, and, if you will settle, I will go over to Oregon. I have some property there, and can get the money, and pay it before it is due, if you will settle in that way." That Andrew Merchant told him he was not making money enough to keep himself and pay for his children's board, during the winter of 1884 and 1885. That he was hard up, and had no money, and that Robert Merchant furnished him some money for his support. That prior to the taking of the property under the foreclosure proceedings Andrew Merchant brought suit against R. Merchant & Co. upon a claim originally due to a firm in Chicago from R. Merchant & Co., which he claimed to have paid for them; and that the defendant also attached said property in said suit; and, after its sale under the foreclosure proceedings, Robert Merchant took it and went into business again under the firm name of R. Merchant & Co. That Robert Merchant did most of the buying at the sale. Witness knew that, because he stood by and heard Robert Merchant tell Andrew Merchant what to bid for the property. That Robert and Andrew Merchant were there together most of the time; and that Andrew Merchant, after the sale, went off to carpenter's work again. Upon cross-examination some of the questions asked by appellant's counsel and answers made thereto by the witness were substantially as follows: "Question. Explain to the jury in what way you obtained your knowledge which enables you to swear positively that Robert Merchant bought this mortgage of Ferry. Answer. My knowledge came right from the court, from Oregon, where he mortgaged his farm for $1,300, and came right over here with that money. Q. Does that show you that Robert Merchant bought this mortgage? A. It showed me that he gave it to his brother, (Andrew Merchant.) Q. How do you know that he gave it to his brother? A. Because his brother had no money. Q. How do you know that? A. He told me so. Q. Did not he tell you that he was going to get money from an old school-mate? A. Yes sir." Witness admitted that he drew his conclusions largely from these matters. J. H. McGraw, the defendant, testified that the property was demanded of him by the plaintiff before the sale, and that the plaintiff told him the mortgage had in fact been paid, and that the attempt to foreclose it was a fraud between Robert and Andrew Merchant; that he levied the attachment in favor of Andrew Merchant against R. Merchant upon the property, but did not remember whether he first seized it under that writ or under the foreclosure notice, but that he sold it under the foreclosure proceedings, and that the proceeds were not sufficient to pay the note. Charles Brown testified that Robert Merchant told him he went to Oregon, mortgaged his farm for $1,300, and sent the money to his brother, Andrew, to buy the business up for him, as he could not buy it very well himself. David Franklin was recalled, and the following questions by plaintiff's counsel were asked, objections made thereto by defendant's counsel, and questions answered by the witness: "Question. Did you hear Andrew Merchant testify upon a former trial of this cause? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. What did he swear then as to where he got this money?" Defendant's counsel objected to any testimony by witness detailing any testimony given at the former trial. Plaintiff's counsel said they got out of this witness on cross-examination that Andrew Merchant said that he was going to get some money from an old school-mate; to which defendant's counsel replied: "Mr. Franklin stated that in answer to one of your questions, I questioned him further about it on cross-examination." (This is not sustained by the record. It does not appear that such a question was asked by plaintiff or such previous testimony given by the witness.) Plaintiff's counsel then said he wished to prove Andrew Merchant stated that he got $600 from Mr. Fenton. The objection was overruled, and exception taken. "Answer. He swore that he got the money from W. D. Fenton of Oregon; that he sent him that much money that he bought the mortgage with." The deposition of W. D. Fenton was then offered in evidence by plaintiff, the same having been taken at McMinnville, Or., March 6, 1888. The defendant objected to it as being incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The objections were overruled, exception taken, and the deposition admitted, wherein the witness testified that he had never sent Andrew Merchant any money. Appellant now objects to the deposition upon the ground that it was taken under an illegal notice, but as the record fails to show that any objection was made to the notice in the court below, it will not be considered here; and the objections that were made are not tenable. Robert and Andrew Merchant were not either of them called to testify upon this last trial. From the testimony hereinbefore mentioned we think there is sufficient evidence of fraud upon the part of Robert and Andrew Merchant, and of the payment, in effect, at least, of plaintiff's note and mortgage by Robert Merchant, to sustain the verdict upon that ground. No question was raised as to the trial of these matters in an action at law. As to the proof of the statements of Andrew Merchant, the old school-mate, of whom he said he expected to get money, seems to have been understood by the parties at the trial as being Mr. Fenton, of whom he subsequently said he did get it. This inference is strengthened somewhat by Fenton's testimony that he had known Andrew Merchant for fifteen years. It is reasonably apparent from the proceedings that the two statements related to the same thing, first contemplated, and subsequently claimed to have taken place. In this view, there certainly was no error appellant could take advantage of, for in his cross-examination of Mr. Franklin he sought to and did prove the prior statement relating to the ability of said Andrew Merchant to obtain money. This testimony was clearly inadmissible, as such a statement of an interested party in his own favor could not be proven, had it been objected to on that ground. Having drawn out the testimony, appellant could not complain if the plaintiff was allowed to rebut it by showing that said Merchant failed to get the money of the person of whom he said he could get it. But we think the proof was also admissible as tending to prove the fraud which plaintiff claimed said Merchants were seeking to perpetrate. Appellant made no offer to have Andrew Merchant sworn as a witness upon the second trial, nor was it claimed that he was absent, or that his testimony was not obtainable. The fact that he testified, as he did at the first trial, upon a material point, which was contradicted by the deposition of Mr. Fenton, taken before the second trial, with his failure to testify at the second trial without any excuse or reason having been shown therefor, were circumstances entitled to some weight, and were properly admitted in evidence. As to the last ground of error alleged, the form of the verdict is as follows: "We, the jury in the case wherein Carrie Franklin is plaintiff, and John H. McGraw is defendant, do find for the plaintiff, and assess her damage at nine hundred and seventy-five dollars. THOS. W. PROSS, Foreman." In his nineteenth instruction to the jury the court said: "I have prepared a blank

"We, the jury in the case wherein Carrie Franklin is plaintiff and J. H. McGraw is defendant, do find for the ———, and assess her damages at ——— dollars.

"Foreman."

—And in his twentieth instruction the court said: "If your finding is in favor of the plaintiff, you will insert in the first blank the word 'plaintiff' and assess her damage at ——— dollars, and insert in the second blank the amount which you find in her favor. The blank over the word 'foreman' should be filled by the signature of your foreman. If you find a verdict in favor of the defendant, in the first blank you will insert the word 'defendant' and erase the words 'and assess her damage at ———'; draw a line through them, and your foreman can sign it." The defendant excepted to the form of the verdict, "for the reason that it requires the jury, in case that they find for the defendant, to erase a part of the form given. The form given tends to give the idea that the court meant to say that the verdict should be for the plaintiff." It is now objected to because it was not in the alternative for a return of the property, or for the value thereof in case a delivery could not be had. The proof showed that, while the property had been largely sold to Andrew Merchant, some of it had been sold to other parties; that Robert Merchant took what Andrew Merchant bought, and went into the business again; and it is fair to infer that the property itself could not have been returned, and that it was so contemplated at the trial. But, in any event, counsel should not be allowed here to urge this as error without having raised the point in the court below. No proof was offered as to any damages for the detention of the goods, nor was the jury instructed to find upon this point. It is apparent the verdict was for the value of the property, and it was sufficient in form against the objection there made. The judgment is affirmed.

MECHANICS' LIENS—NOTICE—VERIFICATION.

1. Code Wash. § 1881, provides that the notice for a mechanic's lien shall contain a statement of the demand after deducting all just credits, and also a statement of the terms and conditions of the contract, if any. Held, that such notice is defective where it states that the material and labor for which the lien is claimed were furnished under a subcontract, but omits to set out the terms of the original contract.

2. The notary must use his seal in certifying the verification of such lien notice, as the notice is not intended primarily for use in court or in judicial proceedings, and hence is not within the exception in Sess. Laws Wash. 1889-90, p. 474, § 5.

Chas. F. Fishback, for appellant. Lewis & Gilman, for appellees Gustave and Henrietta Winehill.

SCOTT, J. This was an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The question was as to the sufficiency of the lien notice, which the lower court held to be invalid, and sustained the demurrer. The plaintiff appeals to this court. The notice, a copy of which was set forth in the complaint, is as follows:

"State of Washington, county of King
—ss. Fred G. Gates, claimant, vs. Isaac Percival and Charles Brown, Debtors, and Gustave Winehill, Owner. Claim for lien. Notice is hereby given that Fred G. Gates performed work and labor for the debtors above named, in the construction of a certain building located on the south-west corner of South Third and Main streets, upon a plat of the town [now city] of Seattle, in King county, Washington, known as the 'Winehill Building,' and furnished material to be used, and which was used, in the construction of said building; that at the time said work and labor was performed, the said Isaac Percival and Charles Brown were in the employ of Gustave Winehill, owner above named, in the capacity of contractors in and about the construction of said building; that the said Fred G. Gates commenced to perform said labor and to furnish said material on said building on or about September 30, 1889, and labored continuously up to January 5, 1890, and that claimant ceased to perform said labor thereon, and to furnish said material, on January 5, 1890; that in the performance of said labor the claimant acted as subcontractor under the said Isaac Percival and Charles Brown, and was to receive, and the said Percival and Brown agreed to pay the claimant, for the labor done and furnished upon said building and material furnished by and used in the construction of said building, the sum of fifteen hundred and ninety-seven dollars; that after deducting all just credits and offsets there remains due and owing to the claimant, for and on account of said labor performed and furnished and the material used and furnished in the construction of the said building, the sum of fifteen hundred and ninety-seven dollars, for which amount the said Fred G. Gates claims a lien upon the building aforesaid. F. G. GATES, Claimant."

"State of Washington, county of King
—ss. Fred G. Gates, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he has read the above and foregoing claim for a lien, knows the contents thereof, and that he believes the same to be just. FRED G. GATES. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 11th day of March, 1890. VINCE H. FABER, Notary Public in and for Washington; residing at Seattle, Wash."

It appears by the complaint that the plaintiff's subcontract, upon which his lien was founded, was to perform all the mason and brick work on the building, and furnish all the materials therefor, for the sum of $10,500; that he furnished the materials and performed the labor accordingly, and was paid thereon $8,903, leaving a balance due him of $1,597, for which he filed the lien in question. Code, § 1881, provides that the lien notice shall contain a statement of the demand after deducting all just credits and offsets, and also a statement of the terms and conditions of the contract, if any. Appellant urges that the notice aforesaid is a sufficient compliance with the statute; that it is only necessary to set out the amount which is claimed to be due. He cites us to Ainslie v. Kohn, 16 Or. 363, 19 Pac. Rep. 97, where the Oregon court decided that it was not necessary to set forth an itemized statement, but only the amount remaining unpaid. This decision was founded upon a statute, however, which did not contain the provision that the terms and conditions of the contract should be stated in the notice, and consequently has but little, if any, bearing here. Appellees contend that the notice should not only contain the full amount of contract price and the sum claimed to be unpaid, but that it should also set out an itemized statement of the account, and he cites us to McWilliams v. Allan, 45 Mo. 573, which appears to have been founded upon a statute requiring a "just and true account of the demand due after all just credits have been given" to be stated in the lien notice. Our statute uses the word "statement" where the Missouri statute uses the word "account." Appellees maintain that these words express the same thing, and the case cited seems to treat them as synonymous. The notice should certainly contain a statement of the terms and conditions of the contract, if founded upon an express contract, and if upon an implied one then a statement of the full amount, and what for; if for different things, such as labor and materials, then the amount claimed for each, and in all cases a statement of what has been paid to the claimant thereon. We do not decide that it is necessary to give an itemized statement in the notice where the contract or claim can be fairly understood without it. It would be a better and safer practice so to do, however, especially where the lien is claimed by any one other than the original contractor. The lien notice in this case is clearly defective, as it does not purport to contain a statement of the terms and conditions of the contract, while it does state that the work was performed and material furnished under a subcontract. It appears by the complaint that the contract was in fact a very different one from that which would be inferred from the notice. Instead of giving any correct intimation of what the claimant's contract really was, the notice was in effect misleading. Appellees also claim that the notice is invalid for other reasons; but as the determination of the above disposes of the action, it is unnecessary to discuss them. The court deems it advisable, however, to decide one additional matter, and that is with reference to the omission of the notary to attest the verification of the notice by the impression of his official seal thereon. Appellant argues that the notary was not required to use his seal in certifying to such a verification; that it is within the exception provided by section 5 of the act to be found at page 474, Sess. Laws 1889-90. But it appears to us otherwise. The notice was not primarily intended for use in court or in any judicial proceeding, but to obtain and preserve the lien. The fact that it might be used in court, or was so used subsequently, would not bring it within the exception any more than it would a deed or a mortgage, and consequently the seal should have been impressed, to have given the certification of the oath required any validity. We agree with appellant's contention that the lien laws should receive a liberal construction, and be aided by every reasonable intendment to carry out the purposes for which they were designed; but this rule of construction or interpretation will not justify a court in going to the extent of nullifying plain provisions of the statutes, which presumably the legislature held to be essential, or they would not have been incorporated in the laws. The judgment is affirmed.

SPECIAL ADMINISTRATOR—EXPENDITURES—COMPENSATION.

1. The special administratrix of an estate is on the same footing as a receiver in equity, as to expenditures incurred in and about the estate; and the mere fact that she has exceeded a sum fixed by an order of court to be expended in repairing the property of the estate is no ground for disallowing the excess, provided it was a reasonable expenditure, and necessary to keep the property in repair.

2. Since Code Civil Proc. Cal. makes no special provision for the compensation of a special administrator, but leaves it in the discretion of the court, it is not improper for the court to take the rate of compensation fixed by statute for an administrator as the standard in determining such compensation of a special administrator.

Frank M. Stone, for appellants. Charles B. Younger, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The special administratrix of William H. Moore, deceased, having filed her final account for settlement, the heirs of the decedent filed objections to the allowance of certain items therein, and the court, after hearing the parties thereto, settled the account by allowing a number of items objected to, and disallowing the remainder. From this order the heirs have appealed to this court.

The chief objection to the action of the court is its allowance for certain expenditures in the repairs of the Pacific Ocean House. Prior to making these repairs the special administratrix had obtained an order from the superior court allowing her to expend a certain sum of money for said repairs, in which was designated the particular repairs to be made, the amount allowed for each, and which also declared, "the above amounts being the full costs of repairs which said administratrix is authorized to make." After obtaining this order she proceeded with the repairs, and completed some at less expense than she was authorized to make, while in others she expended more than was permitted by the order, and she also made other repairs which were not included within the order, so that the total amount expended by her was in excess of the amount allowed by the order. It is urged by the appellants that the court was not authorized to allow any items in her account for expenditures which were not embraced within its previous order allowing her to make the repairs. The office and duties of a special administratrix are very similar to those of a receiver in equity. Each is appointed by the court to take charge, under its directions, of property in litigation, or which is involved in the proceedings before it, with a view to its care and preservation for the parties to whom the court may ultimately decide that it belongs. The powers and duties of each are special, and limited to such as are defined by statute, or expressed in the order of his appointment, or which he may from time to time receive for the purpose of more effectually preserving the estate intrusted to his charge. If it becomes necessary during his management to make any repairs, his expenditures therefor must be sanctioned by the court appointing him, either by previous order or by subsequent approval, before he can reimburse himself from the funds of the estate. A prudent person would obtain from the court an order therefor before making such repairs, but it is not an indispensable requisite that he should do so. If he is willing to forego such protection, and to rely upon his belief that the court will ratify his acts, there is no rule of law which will deprive the court of the power to reimburse him if his acts and expenditures are approved. In Tempest v. Ord, 2 Mer. 55, Lord ELDON said that "formerly the court never permitted a receiver to lay out money without a previous order of the court; but now, when the receiver had laid out money without such previous order, it was usual to refer it to the master, to see if the transactions were beneficial to the parties, and, if found to be so, the receiver was allowed the money so laid out." This rule was followed in Adams v. Woods, 15 Cal. 206, where the action of the district court in disallowing certain payments by the receiver on the ground that they had been made without any previous order of the court was reversed. See, also, High, Rec. § 180; Hynes v. McDermott, 14 Daly, 104. We do not think that the items in the account of the special administratrix for the repairs made by her should be disallowed merely because she had not obtained a previous order to make them, or because she had expended more than she was allowed. It was quite as competent for the court to approve her disbursements for repairs made without a previous order as it was to order in advance that the repairs should be made; and, if it was competent for the court to allow the items in her account without a previous order having been obtained therefor, it was equally competent to allow such repairs as she might have made in excess of the amount allowed by the order. In either case the court must determine whether, under all the circumstances, the repairs were necessary, and the expenditures reasonable. These matters must of necessity be left to the discretion of the judge in settling the account; and, unless it appears that such discretion has been abused, it is not subject to review. The court in the present case heard testimony offered by the respective parties in reference to the contested items, and, after examining it, we cannot say that it was insufficient to support its order. Neither can we say that the court improperly allowed the items for the expenses of a horse and buggy, which were objected to by the heirs. For aught that appears in the record they were expenses necessarily incurred in her management of the estate. Code Civil Proc. § 1616. Appellants also object to the allowance to the special administratrix of commissions upon the estate that came into her hands. The Code of Civil Procedure does not make any special provision for the compensation of a special administrator, but leaves it to the discretion of the court in the settlement of his account. We cannot say that it was improper for the court to take the rate of compensation fixed by the statute for an administrator as the standard for determining a proper allowance to be allowed the special administratrix in the present case. To the objection that by this course an estate may be subjected to the payment of double commissions, it is sufficient to say that the court having charge of the estate has the power to prevent any improvident diversion of its funds during administration. The order appealed from is affirmed.

I CONCUR: GAROUTTE, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur. Some of the items in the account seem on their face to show an attempt to improve the property, rather than to preserve it; but as the witness Cope testified that all the work done was necessary to put the house in tenantable condition, and as there is no evidence to the contrary, except an inference which may arise from the apparent nature of the work done, it cannot be said that the order of the court is not supported by the evidence. I think the burden of proving the necessity of the expenditures rested upon the administratrix as to all items objected to; and, if all the evidence introduced is in the bill, the court ought to have rejected the item of buggy hire. The bill, however, does not purport to contain all the evidence introduced, and, if it did, the item referred to is so small that counsel for appellant would not desire a reversal or modification on account of an error as to it alone.

DISMISSAL OF ACTION—EFFECT—RES JUDICATA.

The voluntary dismissal of an action to quiet title as to a mortgage of defendants is not an adjudication in his favor as to the validity of his mortgage, in the absence of an agreement to that effect, and does not bar plaintiffs, in whose favor judgment was rendered, from asserting, on foreclosure of the mortgage, that the mortgagors had no title to the land.

J. Hamer and W. H. Wilde, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. There was a judgment in favor of the defendant in the court below, and a new trial was denied. The plaintiff appeals. The only question in the case in this court is whether there has been a prior adjudication between the parties to this appeal of the questions involved in this suit. The respondents in this action brought a suit against the appellant and the parties who executed to him the mortgage sued on herein to quiet title to the property in controversy. In the complaint in that case it was alleged that the respondents were the owners of the land; that the appellant's mortgagors had no title thereto, but were asserting ownership therein adverse to the respondents; that, so claiming to own the land, they had executed the mortgage now in suit to the appellant, but that said mortgage was invalid. In that action the appellant demurred to the complaint, whereupon the respondents voluntarily dismissed the action as to him. His claim to the lands, either as mortgagee of the claimants or otherwise, was not set up or litigated; and the dismissal was not upon any agreement or compromise of the case as to him, so far as the record in this case shows. The respondents proceeded to trial as to the mortgagors of the appellant, and recovered a judgment against them that the respondents were the owners of the land, and that they had no title thereto or interest therein. This judgment was affirmed on appeal to this court. Snodgrass v. Parks, 79 Cal. —. The contention of the appellant is that the dismissal as to him in the former action was a retraxit, amounted to an adjudication in his favor, as to the validity of his mortgage, and is a bar against the respondents to any defense against it. Conceding, however, that the question in litigation in the former action was the same now presented, it is well settled that the voluntary dismissal of an action, without any agreement of the parties or other circumstances tending to show that such dismissal was intended as a final disposition of the dispute between the parties, is not a bar to another action. The authorities cited to the effect that a judgment on demurrer, when the demurrer goes to the merits of the action, may be a bar, are not in point. The judgment rendered was not on the demurrer, but upon a dismissal. The demurrer was not presented or passed upon by the court. Such a dismissal is not a bar. Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 545. It may be otherwise, as we have said, where the dismissal is upon agreement of the parties. Id.; Crossman v. Davis, 79 Cal.

INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCE—VALIDITY.

Under Insolvent Act Cal. 1880, § 55, providing that if any person, insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, makes any payment or transfer within one month before the filing of a petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor, and if the person receiving such payment has reasonable cause to believe that it was made to prevent the ratable distribution of the insolvent's assets, the conveyance or payment shall be void, a conveyance by an insolvent of his property to a creditor must be both made and received with the intent to give a preference, and it is not void because received by a creditor intending to obtain a preference, unless the insolvent also had the intention of giving one.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge. Barclay, Willson & Carpenter, for appellants. Chapman & Hendrick and Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, for respondent.

VANCLIFF, C. The object of this action is to recover from defendants $856.99, the value of certain personal property alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendants by the insolvent, in payment of a debt of $900, within one month before the filing of the petition against him by his creditors, contrary to the provisions of section 55 of the insolvent act of 1880. The judgment of the court below was in favor of plaintiff for the sum demanded, and the defendants appeal on the judgment roll, contending that neither the complaint nor the findings of fact state a cause of action. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled.

So far as applicable to this case, section 55 of the insolvent act is as follows: "If any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within one month before the filing of a petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, * * * makes any payment, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, * * * the person receiving such payment * * * having reasonable cause to believe that such person is insolvent, and that such * * * payment * * * is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in insolvency, or to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among his creditors, or to defeat the object of, or in any way to hinder, impede, or delay the operation of, or to evade any of the provisions of, this act, such transfer, payment, conveyance, pledge, or assignment is void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value thereof, as assets of such insolvent debtor." It is neither alleged in the complaint, nor found as a fact by the court, that the insolvent transferred the property to the defendants "with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him;" but it is found that the transfer was made to and received by the defendants in satisfaction of a valid debt of $900, due them from the insolvent. It is further found, however, that the property was received by the defendants "with a view to give said defendants a preference, and to pay said indebtedness to said firm (defendants) before and in preference to all other creditors of said Edgar Sessions, and with a view to prevent the said property, so transferred, from coming to his assignee in insolvency, and to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among his creditors, and to defeat the object of the said insolvent act of 1880; and the said defendants, and each of them, at the time of said assignment and transfer and acceptance of said property, had reasonable cause to believe, and, as the plaintiff is informed and believes, well knew, that the said Edgar Sessions was insolvent, and that the said transfer and assignment was made for the purpose above mentioned,"—this finding being copied from the complaint. Unless the insolvent transferred the property with the view or intention to give preference to some creditor or person having a claim against him, it makes no difference what were the views or motives of the defendants in receiving the property, or what they suspected or believed about the solvency of Sessions. I think the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. WYATT et al. (No. 13,725.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1891.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — MAKERS — INDORSERS.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 3108, providing that "one who writes his name upon a negotiable instrument otherwise than as a maker or acceptor, and delivers it with his name thereon to another person, is called an 'indorser,'" one who signs as maker, with the addition of the word "surety" to his signature, is liable to the payee as maker.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, for appellant. Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter and Gottschalk & Luckel, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action upon a promissory note, dated December 5, 1888, and payable 90 days after date. The instrument appears to be a joint note, signed by each of the defendants, with the word "surety" written after the name of defendant Busch. The defendants, other than Busch, suffered default. He answered, and alleged that he signed the note neither as maker nor acceptor, and "that he wrote his name upon said negotiable instrument as a surety, without any consideration whatever, but solely for the accommodation of the makers of said instrument, and delivered it with his name thereon to co-defendant Mitchell, who delivered the same to the plaintiff, all of which facts were known to the plaintiff at the time of said delivery." He further alleged that no notice of the presentment and non-payment of the note was given to him for more than 10 days after its maturity, and that he never waived its presentment or notice of its dishonor. The court below gave judgment against all of the defendants, and the defendant Busch appeals.

It is contended for the appellant, and this is the only point made, that as he wrote "surety" after his name, and was known by the payee to be a surety for the other makers, he became, in legal effect, an indorser, and not a maker, of the note, and was discharged from liability thereon, for the reason that no notice of its presentment and non-payment was given to him within the time prescribed by statute. This position is rested upon section 3108 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "One who writes his name upon a negotiable instrument, otherwise than as a maker or acceptor, and delivers it, with his name thereon, to another person, is called an 'indorser,' and his act is called 'indorsement.'" We do not think the judgment can be reversed on this ground. The next two sections of the Code are as follows: "Sec. 3109. One who agrees to indorse a negotiable instrument is bound to write his signature upon the back of the instrument, if there is sufficient space thereon for that purpose. Sec. 3110. When there is not room for a signature upon the back of a negotiable instrument, a signature equivalent to an indorsement thereon may be made upon a paper annexed thereto." In Fessenden v. Summers, 62 Cal. 484, cited by appellant, the note was indorsed in blank by the defendant Thompson before delivery to the payee. The indorsement was for the purpose of adding credit to the note, and plaintiff made a loan upon the strength of the indorsement. The question was whether Thompson was to be treated as an indorser or guarantor of the note. It was held that, under sections 3108 and 3117 of the Civil Code, he was an indorser, and as such entitled to notice of non-payment. That case is not in point, for the reason that here the appellant did not indorse the note, but signed his name to it in the place of a maker. Since the decision of Aud v. Magruder in 1858, (10 Cal. 282,) where, as here, it appeared from an addendum to the name of one of the makers of the note in suit that he was a surety thereon, it has been uniformly held by the supreme court of this state that, where one subscribes his name to a promissory note in the place of a maker, he will, as between himself and the payee, be treated as a maker, and held liable as such, though he was in fact only a surety for the other makers, and this was known to the payee when he received the note. Aud v. Magruder, 10 Cal. 282; Dane v. Corduan, 24 Cal. 157; Damon v. Pardow, 34 Cal. 278; Chafoin v. Rich, 77 Cal. 476, 19 Pac. Rep. 882. This rule has not been changed by the Code, and the appellant was therefore not an indorser of the note, and his liability did not depend upon due notice of demand and non-payment. We think the judgment should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

AVERY v. CLARK et al. (No. 13,890.)

MORTGAGES—MECHANICS' LIENS—PRIORITIES.

1. Where the purchaser of land sells it before obtaining a conveyance, and puts his vendee in possession, and upon getting a conveyance immediately conveys to his vendee, taking a mortgage in part payment of the price, he waives any previous lien he may have had on the land for the price, and must rely solely on the lien of his mortgage, which accrues from its date.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1186, providing that mechanics' liens shall be preferred to any lien that may have attached subsequent to the time when the materials were furnished, materials furnished to a person in possession under a contract of sale constitute a prior lien to a mortgage subsequently given the vendor for the price.

3. Where materials are furnished under a contract, and part of them are procured from another, who refuses to deliver them unless paid for by the contractor, the latter, having paid for them, can include their cost in his claim of lien.

T. J. Carran and Walter Bordwell, for appellant. Wells, Guthrie & Lee, C. McFarland, and Albert Crutcher, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. This is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage made by the defendants Humeston to one Robbins, and by him assigned to the plaintiff. The defendants, other than the mortgagors, are claimants of mechanics' liens for labor and materials furnished in the construction of a dwelling-house upon the premises described in the mortgage. Judgment was rendered for a sale of the premises, and directing that out of the proceeds of the sale the claims of the respondents (McCarthy, Clark, and Humphreys) should have priority in payment over the mortgage claim of the plaintiff. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed, upon the ground that his claim was the first lien upon the lands.

The case is here upon the judgment roll alone, and presents the following facts: September 24, 1888, A. S. Robbins, the plaintiff's assignor, being in possession of a lot of land in Los Angeles, under a contract of purchase from one Griffes, who was the owner, made an agreement with the defendant Cassie M. Humeston to sell her the same for the sum of $2,200, of which she then paid $200, and took possession of the land. This agreement was never recorded. In the latter part of October of the same year the defendant R.

C. Humeston, husband of said Cassie, with her consent, and at the advice of Robbins, began the construction of a dwelling-house upon the lot, which was completed April 16, 1889. No written contract was made for the construction of the house, and its value or cost exceeded $1,000. January 5, 1889, Griffes executed to Robbins a deed of the lot, and on the same day Robbins conveyed it to Mrs. Humeston, and at the same time Mrs. Humeston and her husband gave him their four promissory notes for $500 each, for the unpaid amount of the price thereof, and executed the mortgage in question to secure their payment. Both of the deeds were recorded on the day of their date, and the mortgages two days thereafter. March 19, 1889, the plaintiff purchased the mortgage and notes from Robbins, who on that day "assigned" them to him. Prior to the date of this mortgage, viz., December 3, 1888, the respondents Clark and Humphreys entered into a verbal contract with R. C. Humeston to furnish lumber and other materials as might be required in the construction of the house, and between that day and April 10, 1889, furnished materials which were used in such construction, to the value of $2,017, for which they afterwards filed their claim of lien. At the time of making this contract they knew that Mrs. Humeston claimed the land under a contract, and was indebted to Robbins for the purchase money to the extent of $2,000. The court does not find on what day Clark and Humphreys commenced to furnish the materials other than that it was "between the 3d day of December, 1888, and April 10, 1889;" but it is conceded in the brief of counsel for appellant that they commenced to furnish them on the 3d day of December, 1888.

It is contended by the appellant that, by virtue of the contract of sale between Robbins and Mrs. Humeston, there was created in favor of Robbins a vendor's lien for the unpaid portion of the purchase money, which was preserved in the mortgage that was taken at the time Robbins conveyed the property to her, and that the right to enforce this lien passed to the plaintiff by the assignment to him of the notes and mortgage, and has priority over the liens of the respondents. A vendor's lien is not the result of any agreement or any intention of the vendor and vendee, but is a simple equity raised by courts for the benefit of the vendor of real estate. It is a privilege purely personal, and cannot exist in favor of any but the vendor. It does not exist in his favor if he has other security for the land which he has conveyed. It is not assignable, even by express contract, nor does it pass to the assignee of the vendee's obligation for the purchase money. It has been uniformly held in this state that this lien is lost by any act on the part of the vendor manifesting any intention on his part not to rely upon the lien, and that, although it is competent for him to take security for the payment of the purchase price of the land, and by an express agreement not lose his right to resort to this lien, yet his taking such security is prima facie a waiver er of the lien; and, in the absence of some agreement to the contrary, the vendee will hold the land discharged from such lien. In Hunt v. Waterman, 12 Cal. 301, the vendor had taken a mortgage on the property sold, for the payment of the entire purchase money, but, by reason of some defect, the mortgage was unavailing as a security. He then brought an action to foreclose his vendor's lien. The court says: "The question in this case is directly presented whether in this state a vendor's lien exists when a mortgage security is taken for the purchase money. Decisions of the various courts have been numerous on this branch of jurisprudence, and are not harmonious. The better rule, supported by the weight and number of authorities, is to hold the silent lien of the vendor extinguished whenever the vendor manifests an intention to abandon or not to look to it; and it held that he does this whenever he takes other and independent security upon the same land, or a portion of the sameland, or on otherland. When he looks to other security he loses this tacit lien." In Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 173, Judge FIELD, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "When any other independent security is taken, as a mortgage on the land, or upon other property, or the personal responsibility of a third person, the lien is held to be waived unless there is at the time an express agreement for its retention. The taking of a distinct, independent security is presumptive evidence of the waiver." It is also the established rule in this state that this lien is not assignable, and that the assignee of the right to recover the money for which the land was sold cannot enforce the lien. Baum v. Grigsby, supra; Camden v. Vail, 23 Cal. 633. In Baum v. Grigsby, the court says: "The cases which deny that the lien passes with the personal security of the vendee do not rest, except in a few instances, upon the want of a special assignment from the vendor, but upon the ground that the lien is in its nature unassignable, and to that conclusion we have arrived. * * * The assignee of a note given for the purchase money has not parted with the property which he seeks to reach in consideration of the note he has received. He has never held the property, and has therefore no special claims upon equity to subject it to sale for his benefit. The particular equity of the vendor in this respect cannot, in the nature of things, be asserted by another." These principles were afterwards formulated in the Civil Code, which provides, (section 3046:) "One who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon, independent of possession, for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer." Section 3047: "Where a buyer of real property gives to the seller a written contract for payment of all or part of the price, an absolute transfer of such contract by the seller waives his lien to the extent of the sum payable under the contract." Properly speaking, a vendor's lien does not exist until the vendor has parted with his title. So long as he retains the title he cannot be said to have any implied lien upon the land. The security which he then has for the purchase money is created by express reservation, and cannot be impaired by any act of the vendee. This is an express lien existing by virtue of a contract executed between the parties, and is capable of assignment and enforcement by his assignee. Taylor v. McKinney, 20 Cal. 618. Such a lien is open and manifest to the world, and is entirely different from the secret, invisible lien which the law implies in behalf of the vendor when he parts with the title, and which is known only to the parties to the transaction, and those to whom they may communicate the fact. For such a lien equity makes no special provision, but leaves the parties to rely upon the contract which they have executed between themselves. Whatever was the nature of the security held by Robbins prior to January 5, 1889, by virtue of the contract of sale between him and Mrs. Humeston, whether it was a vendor's lien or a lien in the nature of a mortgage, or whether, inasmuch as he did not himself have the title to the land, it was a security differing from either of these, when he took the promissory notes of Mrs. Humeston and her husband, secured by their mortgage upon the land which he then conveyed to her, he waived whatever lien he had prior to that date, and thereafter had only the lien that existed by virtue of the mortgage. The unpaid price of the land did not thereafter "remain unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer." In addition to her personal obligation he had the personal obligation of her husband, together with their mortgage on the land to secure the same. By these acts his vendor's lien, if he had any, was extinguished, and his prior security was merged in the mortgage, and became an open, public, and express lien. Nor did the insertion in the mortgage of the clause, "this mortgage is given in part-payment of the purchase money of the within-described property," have the effect to extend the lien by relation to the date of the contract of sale. These words do not constitute or imply any agreement or intention for the preservation of a prior lien. The fact that the mortgage which the vendor takes at the time of the conveyance is expressed to be for the purchase money of the land is none the less a waiver of his vendor's lien. The plaintiff in this case has, however, only such rights of lien upon the land as Robbins could transfer, and such as he did transfer, on the 19th of March, 1889, by his assignment of the notes and mortgage. He does not in his complaint allege any assignment to him of any other lien than was created by the mortgage, his allegation being that "on the 19th day of March, 1889, for a valuable and sufficient consideration, said plaintiff purchased said mortgage and notes from said A. S. Robbins, who then and there duly assigned, transferred, set over, and delivered the same to the plaintiff;" and the finding of the court is in accordance with this allegation. We have seen above that as the assignee of Robbins he is not entitled to assert any vendor's lien in his own behalf.

ter are preferred to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrances which may have attached subsequent to the time when * * * the materials were commenced to be furnished." Inasmuch as the only lien which the plaintiff has is that of his mortgage, which did not attach to the land until January 5, 1889, and as the respondents commenced to furnish the materials for which their lien was allowed prior to that date, it follows that their lien was preferred to the lien of the plaintiff. Nor do the provisions of section 2898 of the Civil Code give to the plaintiff, under the facts of this case, priority for the lien of his mortgage in disregard of this section. Section 1192, Code Civil Proc., provides that "every building * * * constructed upon any lands with the knowledge of the owner, or the person having or claiming any interest therein, shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of such owner, or person having or claiming an interest therein, and the interest owned or claimed shall be subject to any lien filed in accordance with the provisions of this chapter," unless such person shall give notice that he will not be responsible for the same. Not only did Robbins fail to give any such notice, but the court finds that he "consented to and advised the construction of said dwelling-house." Although he was not the "owner" of the lands until January 5, 1889, yet by virtue of his contract with Griffes, he was until that date, and for several months prior to the time when the respondents began to furnish materials, a "person having or claiming an interest therein," and that interest, to its entire extent, became subject to their lien. The principle upon which liens are allowed in favor of mechanics and material-men is that their labor and materials have given value to the buildings upon which they have been expended, and that it is inequitable that the owner of the land, who has contracted with them for such improvement, or who has stood by and seen the improvement in progress without making objection, should have the benefit of their expenditures without making compensation therefor. Even in the absence of the foregoing provisions of the Code, it would be in contravention of well-established rules if, under the facts of this case, the lien of Robbins should have priority over that of the respondents. Having advised the construction of the dwelling-house upon land then owned by him, under the most elementary principles of equity he would not be permitted to avail himself of this increased value for the purpose of enhancing his own security at the expense of those who had themselves given value to the land. There was no error in allowing to Clark and Humphreys, as a portion of their claim, the sum of $190 for certain glass used in the building. The court found that Clark and Humphreys furnished to the defendant R. C. Humeston materials of the value of $2,037.84, to be used in the construction of the dwelling-house, and that "of and included in said amount is a claim for glass amounting to $190, furnished by the firm of Schlesinger & Goldwater," and that Schlesinger & Goldwater refused to deliver the same until paid for. The court does not find that Schlesinger & Goldwater furnished the glass to Humeston, but does find that the material furnished by Clark and Humphreys to Humeston was of the above value, and that in this amount was this claim for glass which Schlesinger & Goldwater refused to deliver until paid for, and that Clark and Humphreys paid Schlesinger & Goldwater for the glass. These findings are entirely consistent with the fact that Clark and Humphreys agreed with Humeston to furnish the glass for the dwelling-house, and for that purpose bought the same from Schlesinger & Goldwater, but that Schlesinger & Goldwater refused to deliver the glass to them until it was paid for, and that thereupon Clark and Humphreys paid for the glass, and furnished it according to their contract with Humeston. As the appeal is taken upon the judgment roll without any bill of exceptions, we must assume that the evidence was sufficient to support all the findings of the court. The foregoing principles, which give priority to the lien of Clark and Humphreys, are also applicable to the lien of McCarthy. We cannot say that the description of the land in the claim of lien filed by him is not "sufficient for identification." Code Civil Proc. § 1187. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—INJURY TO FEELINGS—OBJECTIONS—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for malicious prosecution, damages for injury to plaintiff's feelings, caused by the arrest, are recoverable under a general allegation of damages.

2. An objection to the admission as a whole of a copy of the record of the proceedings in the criminal trial, which, by Code Crim. Proc. Cal. § 912, is made prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, is properly overruled where the inadmissible portions of the copy are not specified in the objection.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENY, Judge.

J. M. Dameron, for appellant. Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action for damages, occasioned by the malicious prosecution of a criminal action against the plaintiff before a justice of the peace of Los Angeles county. The findings of the court were in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was entered against the defendant for the sum of $400 and costs. Appellant claims that the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify to the injury to his feelings caused by the arrest, the only special damages alleged being $25, paid an attorney for the defense of the respondent in a criminal action, and $50 loss on account of detention from business for two days. We think that the evidence was properly allowed under the general allegation as to damages. Bodily pain and suffering come under the head of general damages, because they result naturally and directly from bodily harm; and injuries to the feelings flow as naturally and as directly from treatment like that complained of herein. 1 Suth. Dam. pp. 763-766. Appellant contends, also, that the court erred in overruling his objection to the introduction in evidence of copies of the complaint, warrant of arrest, proceedings, and docket entries in the criminal action tried before the justice of the peace, certified by the latter. The papers were attached together, and were objected to as a whole. They included a certified copy of the entries in the docket. Such copy is made prima facie evidence of the facts stated, by the provisions of section 912, Code Crim. Proc. As some of the evidence offered as a whole was admissible, and as appellant failed to specify any particular portion to which he addressed his objection, there was no error in the ruling of the court. Board v. Keenan, 55 Cal. 647. Furthermore, it appears from the defendant's own evidence that he prosecuted the case referred to, and that the plaintiff was acquitted. Judgment and order affirmed.

WILLS—REVOCATION BY MARRIAGE—MARRIAGE CONTRACT.

1. Under Civil Code Cal. § 1999, which declares that a will is revoked by the subsequent marriage of testator and the survival of the wife, unless provision has been made for her by "marriage contract," and which provides that no other evidence to rebut the presumption of revocation shall be received, the marriage contract, to rebut such presumption, must purport on its face to make provision for the wife in lieu of testamentary provision, and the court cannot receive any evidence of the intention of the parties, or their relative conditions of wealth at the time it was executed, or the effect which will result from its enforcement.

2. A deed of separation between husband and wife, which refers to a conveyance of land executed to the wife by the husband, in consideration of which she releases him from his marital obligations, and renounces all claim to his property after his death, but which does not indicate that either of the parties had in mind the subject of a will executed by the husband before his marriage, or that the instrument was executed in lieu of testamentary provision for her, is not a "marriage contract," within the meaning of the above section, so as to rebut the presumption of revocation arising from the subsequent marriage; and it is the duty of the probate court to deny the probate of the will, without inquiring into the reasonableness of the consideration for the wife's release of the husband, provided for in the deed of separation.

HARRISON, J. John R. Corker died in the county of Los Angeles, September 12, 1889, leaving a writing purporting to be his last will, which was executed December 12, 1883; and on September 18, 1883, John F. Corker, who was named therein as executor, presented the same to the superior court of said county, together with his petition for its probate, and the issuance to him of letters testamentary thereon. To this petition the respondent, Aurelia J. Corker, filed written opposition, alleging that the said will had been revoked by reason of the marriage of the decedent to her subsequent to its execution, and that no provision had been made for her either in the will or by marriage contract. To this opposition the petitioner answered, alleging that after such marriage, and prior to the 9th of October, 1888, the decedent and contestant mutually agreed to separate and live apart, and "in pursuance of said agreement the said John R. Corker and Aurelia J. Corker, on said 9th day of October, 1888, entered into a marriage contract, or agreement in writing," under their hands and seals, which was duly acknowledged, and recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county; and that in consideration of the covenants in said marriage contract contained, "and as settlement and division of all their property rights, the said John R. Corker, on said 9th day of October, 1888, executed to Aurelia a deed" for certain real estate in Los Angeles county, (describing the same,) of which she thereupon took the possession, and that they then separated, and never after resumed marriage relations. The following is the instrument referred to in his answer as a marriage contract or agreement: "It is agreed by and between Aurelia J. Corker and John R. Corker, husband and wife, of Los Angeles city and county, state of California, as follows: The said Aurelia J. Corker, in consideration of the said John R. Corker conveying to her, by good and sufficient deed this day executed, contemporaneous herewith, the lands therein described, does hereby release and absolve him, the said John R. Corker, from in any manner contributing to her support as his wife or otherwise, during their and each of their natural lives. That she releases and conveys to him all right, claim, or interest that she may have in or to all community property which has been or shall hereafter be acquired by her said husband; all right or claim to alimony, or attorney's fees, costs, or support in any manner during litigation or otherwise, are for the same consideration (in case a proceeding for the dissolution of the marriage between them is instituted by either party hereto) is hereby released, and the said John R. Corker is absolved and discharged therefrom; and for the same consideration she releases all right, claim, or interest that she may have by law or otherwise in or to any property, real or personal, that he may have at the time of his death, or to which he may then be entitled, and all right, claim, and interest in or to his estate after he is dead. In consideration of the foregoing, the said John R. Corker has conveyed, and does hereby again convey, sell, and assign and set over, to the said Aurelia J. Corker, as her own separate property, the lands and premises described in said deed of even date herewith, to have, hold, and convey the same without let or hindrance from him, collect, receive, have, and enjoy the rents and profits therefrom, and discharges, releases, and absolves her and her property now or hereafter acquired by her from any, all, and every right, claim, or interest which he may have therein because the same being in law community property. And it is further mutually agreed between the parties hereto that they will each support and maintain themselves, sell, convey, purchase, mortgage, and do all business regardless of the other, the same as if they were unmarried; the intention being to hereby settle now and forever all property rights and interests and relieve each other of all obligations growing out of or imposed by their marital relations, as far as they can under the law; and they hereby agree that they will immediately separate and live apart from each other. As there are no children born of said marriage, and none have been adopted by them, there are none to be provided for by the parties hereto. In witness whereof the parties to this agreement have hereunto set their hands and seals this 9th day of October, 1888. [Seal.] AURELIA J. CORKER. [Seal.] JOHN R. CORKER." At the hearing upon these issues the contestant, for the purpose of defeating the effect of the instrument of October 9, 1888, offered evidence to show that the property conveyed to her in consideration of its execution was her separate property, and that consequently the agreement made no "provision" for her, and was without consideration. The court, in its decision, took this view of the transaction, and found that the property so conveyed to her had for a long time prior thereto been her separate property; that there was no other consideration for the execution of the agreement; that the agreement itself was not fair and reasonable in its terms; that the release therein by the wife was not founded upon sufficient consideration; and that no provision had been made for her by the decedent, either by marriage contract or in the will; and thereupon denied probate to the will. A motion for a new trial was made by the proponent upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings of the court that the property so conveyed to the wife was her separate property, or that the agreement of October 9, 1888, was without any other consideration, or was not fair and reasonable in its terms; and, also, its finding that no provision had been made for her by marriage contract. The motion for a new trial was denied, and from this order the proponent has appealed to this court.

Section 1299 of the Civil Code is as follows: "If, after making a will, the testator marries, and the wife survives the testator, the will is revoked, unless provision has been made for her by marriage contract, or unless she is provided for in the will, or in such way mentioned therein as to show an intention not to make such provision; and no other evidence to rebut the presumption of revocation must be received." The term "marriage contract," as found in this section, is not defined in the Code. The section itself is nearly identical with section 12 of the act concerning wills, passed April 10, 1850. At that time the legislature had before it the bill defining the rights of husband and wife, which became a statute April 17, 1850, (St. 1850, p. 254,) and which contained a chapter headed "Marriage Contracts." An examination of the sections in that chapter will show that the term, as used therein, refers entirely to antenuptial contracts; and it is fairly presumable that the "marriage contract" referred to in section 12 of the act concerning wills (now section 1299 of the Civil Code) is the one referred to in the act of April 17, 1850, defining the rights of husband and wife. When the Civil Code was adopted, this term in the chapter on "Husband and Wife" was changed to "Marriage Settlement" and "Contract for Marriage Settlement," (Civil Code, §§ 177-181;) and, in consideration of the provisions of section 5 of the Civil Code, we must presume that the "marriage settlement" found in these sections is the same as the "marriage contract" found in the act of April 17, 1850, and consequently the same as the "marriage contract" referred to in section 1299 of the Civil Code.

Stewart, in his treatise on Marriage and Divorce, § 32, says: "Contracts or conveyances, in contemplation of marriage, whereby property is promised to or settled on either or both of the parties, by either or both of the parties, or by a third party; and contracts whereby either or each of the parties releases or modifies, or agrees to release or modify, his or her property rights, which would otherwise arise from the marriage,—are called 'marriage settlements' or 'contracts.'" And in the same section he also says: "Marriage settlements made after marriage, unless in pursuance of antenuptial articles or agreement, are simply contracts between husband and wife." It is unnecessary, however, to decide in this case whether the marriage contract referred to in section 1299 is limited to antenuptial contracts, or whether a post-nuptial agreement between husband and wife may be so framed as to constitute such a marriage contract, inasmuch as the instrument here is a post-nuptial agreement, which does not, in terms, purport to be a marriage contract. Section 1299 unequivocally declares that, except in the instances therein specified, "if after making a will the testator marries, and the wife survives the testator, the will is revoked." When the will is offered for probate, the surviving wife, in order to defeat its probate, need only show that she was married to the testator subsequent to its execution. The burden is then cast upon the proponent to show the existence of one of the conditions which except it from this rule. If the wife is not mentioned in the will, he must show that "provision has been made for her" by "marriage contract." And, in order to emphasize the rule that the instrument itself is the only mode of proof, the section further declares: "And no other evidence to rebut the presumption of revocation must be received." The plain meaning of this clause is that, unless the instrument shows upon its face that it is a "marriage contract" within the meaning of the section, and that by it "provision" has been made for the wife, and that such provision was intended to take the place of testamentary provision for her, the will is revoked. The wife is not called upon to introduce any further proof, and the proponent is limited in his proof to the marriage contract itself. Nor can the court receive any evidence for the purpose of showing the intention of the parties to the instrument, or their relative conditions of wealth at the time it was executed, or the effect which will result from its enforcement. If the instrument is a "marriage contract," and purports to make "provision" for the wife, the court cannot inquire into the character or extent or reasonableness of such "provision" any more than it can in other contracts between parties who are sui juris. If the parties are themselves satisfied with the "provision," it is not for the court to substitute its judgment for theirs as to its sufficiency. So long as the execution of the contract is not impeached, it is as binding upon the parties as would be any other contract. If the instrument does not on its face purport to make provision for the wife in lieu of testamentary provision, the court cannot receive evidence of any character for the purpose of showing that such was the intention of the parties. The provision of the statute forbidding any other evidence than the contract itself is peculiarly appropriate to all post-nuptial agreements. As the husband and wife can enter into any engagement or transaction with each other respecting property, which either might, if unmarried, (Civil Code, § 158,) such an agreement made by them ought not to receive a construction that does not appear upon its face to have been its object, or which will operate a different result from that which is fairly deducible from its terms. If the husband and wife have, each of them, separate property, and they choose to deal with each other respecting it, either by way of exchange or purchase and sale, such dealing should not be made the pretext of asserting some right which does not appear from the terms of the instrument to have been in their minds. If the husband during the marriage makes to his wife a conveyance of certain property, such conveyance ought to be regarded as a gift, rather than a "provision" for her, which would prevent his antenuptial will from being revoked by his marriage.

The instrument executed between Corker and his wife partakes more of the nature of a deed of separation than of a marriage contract. It does not purport to make any "provision" for the wife; nor is there anything in its terms that indicates that either of the parties had in mind the subject of a will, or that the instrument was executed in lieu of making testamentary provision for her. It refers to another instrument executed to her by her husband, in consideration of which she releases him from certain marital obligations. The instrument itself does not contain any of the elements of a "marriage contract." As soon as this instrument was presented to the court, and the court saw from an inspection of it that it was not a marriage contract, its power under the proceedings before it was limited to denying probate to the will. After it had been shown that there was no marriage contract in which provision had been made for the wife, the court was only required to determine the person who had the right to administer upon the estate. Whatever rights of property passed under the contract, or whether it could be enforced, or whether the widow has any right in the estate of her deceased husband, are questions that may arise when distribution of the estate shall be sought, but could not then be investigated. Sitting at that time merely as a court of probate, it had no jurisdiction to inquire into the sufficiency of the consideration for which the deed to the wife was executed, or for the release then executed by her to her husband, or whether the property described in the deed to her was at the time of its execution her separate property, or whether the contract itself was fair or reasonable. Its findings and determinations upon these subjects were without authority, and binding upon no one. These questions could be presented and determined only in a tribunal having jurisdiction to inquire into them, and where the parties who would be affected thereby would have an opportunity to be heard. The court seems to have reached this conclusion, since in its judgment it merely declared that the will was revoked, and therefore denied it probate. Whether the evidence before the court was sufficient to justify its findings upon the other propositions is immaterial. If there was sufficient evidence to justify its finding of the ultimate fact that no provision had been made for the wife by any marriage contract, that decision or finding is not impaired by the fact that there was not sufficient evidence to justify the immaterial findings which it made; and its order denying a new trial was correct, and should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

TERRITORY V. KEE.

CRIMINAL LAW—DIRECTING VERDICT.

Under the constitutional provision which guaranties to persons accused of crime the right of trial by jury, the court, in a criminal case, has no power to direct the jury to convict, though the evidence of guilt is overwhelming.

Appeal from district court, Bernalillo county.

The case is briefly stated in the stipulation, which is filed in place of and constitutes the entire record, and reads as follows: "In this cause it is stipulated by and between the respective counsel that the defendant, Joe Kee, a Chinaman, was indicted and tried upon a good and sufficient indictment, duly returned by a regularly organized grand jury of Bernalillo Co., New Mexico, for the crime of embezzlement at said term; that the defendant, by a good and sufficient plea, when arraigned on said indictment, pleaded 'not guilty;' that during said trial all the witnesses introduced on the part of the territory were Lizzie McGrath, (who was the principal or prosecuting witness,) James H. Smith, the policeman who made the arrest, and R. B. Myers, the justice who bound the defendant over, and all of whose evidence tended to prove that in about September, 1887, the defendant, at the request of Lizzie McGrath, entered her employ as cook and general servant at Albuquerque, in said county, at a salary of ten dollars a week; that during the course of his employment the defendant, at the request of said Lizzie, several times carried her bank-book and cash to the First National Bank of said Albuquerque, and deposited the cash to her credit; that on the 15th day of September, 1887, again at her request, the defendant took her bank-book and one hundred and sixty dollars in gold and silver coins of the coinage of the United States and in currency, issued under the laws of the United States, and went out to go to the bank as usual, but instead of going to the First National Bank, went to Hope's corner faro-bank, in said Albuquerque, and there proceeded to gamble the aforesaid money against the game and bank until he had but twenty-five dollars of it left, at which time he was arrested; that said sum of twenty-five dollars, together with twenty dollars the said Lizzie owed him for two weeks' wages, left the defendant 'short in his accounts' to the said Lizzie in the sum of one hundred and fifteen dollars, and that said above-named witnesses also testified that the defendant at different times admitted to each of them the above state of facts; that the only defense made was the giving in of the defendant's plea of 'not guilty' and the following testimony by the defendant himself: Joe Kee, the defendant, being duly sworn, testified as follows: 'Question. Will you tell the truth if you talk to the jury now? Answer. No, sir. Q. Will you speak the facts if you talk to the jury now, as they occurred? A. Yes, sir; I talk some. Q. Will you tell right? A. Yes, sir. Q. You won't tell any lie? A. No. Q. Do you know Lizzie McGrath? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where were you during last September? Were you in her house last September, the same as she told here on the stand? A. Yes, sir. Q. What were you doing there in that house? A. Cooking. Q. What kind of a house is that? A. Whore-house. Q. How much did she give you a week for cooking? A. Ten dollars a week. Q. Where have you been for the last seven months? (Objected to by the territory as immaterial. Sustained.)' And this was all the testimony produced or offered or introduced in said cause on the part of either party. And thereupon the defendant, by counsel, moved the court to instruct the jury to find him not guilty, for the reasons—First, because the evidence shows that the money was received from the defendant's principal, and not from any other person, in accordance with the words of the statute; second, because there is no evidence in the case showing, or tending to show, that the money given to the defendant was the property of Lizzie McGrath; and, third, because there is no evidence in the case to show that the defendant appropriated the money to his own use,—which motion was denied by the court, to which action of the court the defendant, by counsel, then and there duly excepted and still excepts; whereupon the defendant's counsel then asked permission of the court to argue the case to the jury on the testimony, but the court denied him such permission, to which action of the court the defendant then and there excepted and still excepts; whereupon the court, of its own motion, instructed the jury as follows: 'Gentlemen of the jury: There is no conflict in the evidence in this case. Therefore you are instructed to find the defendant guilty as charged, and assess his punishment at a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment in the county jail or the territorial penitentiary not more than two years nor less than three months.' And thereupon the jury, by direction of the court, found the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and assessed his punishment at imprisonment in the territorial penitentiary for the term of two years, to which action of the court in so instructing the jury to find him guilty the defendant then and there duly excepted and still excepts. That thereafter, in proper time, the defendant, by counsel, filed his motion in arrest of judgment and for the discharge of the defendant from custody, which motion the court overruled; that the grounds of such motion was the action of the court in so refusing to permit counsel for defendant to argue the case to the jury in his behalf, and the action of the court in so instructing the jury to find the defendant guilty, to which action of the court in so overruling the said motion the defendant at the time duly excepted and still excepts; that thereafter, upon the last day of said term, the court sentenced said defendant to the term of two years' penal servitude in the territorial penitentiary; that on said last day of the term the defendant filed his proper affidavit, and prayed an appeal of said cause to the supreme court of the territory of New Mexico, which was duly granted, and the time for settling and filing a bill of exceptions in the cause was then set, and thereafter from time to time, before such time had expired, duly extended to the 1st day of September, A. D. 1888. And now, the respective counsel having agreed upon the foregoing as a bill of exceptions herein, they respectfully ask the court that the same be signed and sealed and made of record herein. In evidence of which agreement the said counsel hereunder sign. CLIFFORD L. JACKSON, District Atty., representing the territory. BERNARD S. RODEY, Atty. for Defendant. Which is hereby done this 21st day of August, 1888. WM. H. BRINKER, Presiding Judge."

LEE, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Several questions are raised by the record, but only one we think it necessary to consider, as, in our opinion, in criminal cases it is not in the province or power of the court trying the case to direct a verdict of guilty, no matter how strong, clear, and unimpeached the evidence may be on the part of the prosecution. Under the constitutional provision which guaranties to persons accused of crime the right of trial by jury, an accused person has in every case where he has pleaded "not guilty" the absolute right to have the question of his innocence or guilt submitted to the jury, no matter what the state of the evidence may be. The right thus granted has been so fully recognized and carefully guarded by the courts that it has been frequently held that it cannot be waived by the prisoner, and that a trial before the court without a jury is erroneous, even where it takes place with the prisoner's consent. The only case of respectable American authority holding the contrary proposition is the ruling of Justice HUNT, in the circuit court of the United States, on the trial of Susan B. Anthony for illegal voting at a federal election. U. S. v. Anthony, 11 Blatchf. 200. And the learned judge in that case seems to have come to doubt the correctness of his ruling on the question, as subsequently, when the officers of the election, who were indicted together with Miss Anthony for the same offense, and in which substantially the same testimony was introduced on the trial, he submitted the case to the jury. In the case of U. S. v. Taylor, 11 Fed. Rep. 470, Judge McCrary carefully reviews the rulings of Justice HUNT in the Anthony Case, and holds the contrary doctrine. In concluding his opinion he says: "It is now well settled in the federal courts that in civil cases, where the facts are undisputed, and the case turns upon questions of law, the court may direct a verdict in accordance with its opinion of the law, but the authorities which settle this rule have no application to criminal cases. In a civil case the court can set aside the verdict, whether it be for the plaintiff or defendant, upon the ground that it is contrary to the law as given by the court; but in a criminal case, if the verdict is one of acquittal, the court has no power to set it aside. It would be a useless form for a court to submit a civil case involving only questions of law to the consideration of a jury, where the verdict, when found, if not in accordance with the court's view of the law, would be set aside. The same result is accomplished by an instruction given in advance to find a verdict in accordance with the court's opinion of the law. But not so in criminal cases. A verdict of acquittal cannot be set aside, and therefore, if the court can direct a verdict of guilty, it can do indirectly that which it has no power to do directly. By his plea of not guilty the defendant must be understood as denying the truth of the information or indictment, and as not conceding the truth of what the witnesses for the government have sworn to. This is so, notwithstanding the fact that no witnesses for the defendant contradicted the statements of the witnesses for the prosecution. In this condition of the testimony it was the right of the jury to pass upon the credibility of the witness, even if impeached as to character, and to consider whether, upon applying all the tests of manner, clear or confused statement, prejudice, and accuracy of memory, they were to be believed. It was within the province of the jury to disbelieve the witnesses for the government. And even in civil cases, so far as I know, no judge has ever gone further than to say, when the case was at all dependent upon oral testimony, that if the jury believed all the testimony they should find for the plaintiff or defendant. The present case, in itself considered, is of little consequence, but the question involved is of far-reaching importance; for if the power to direct a verdict of guilty exists in this case, it exists and may be exercised in any criminal case, however important, and even if the punishment be death. In view of this, and especially in view of the opinion above cited of Mr. Justice HUNT, for whose judgment I entertain the highest respect, I have considered the case with great care. I have also consulted Mr. Justice MILLER, who authorizes me to say that he concurs in the conclusion which I have reached." The rule as stated by Justice McCrary is sustained in U. S. v. Gibert, 2 Sum. 19, as it is there held that as soon as it judicially appears of record that the party has pleaded not guilty, an issue has arisen which courts are bound to direct to be tried by a jury. While it is a very old, sound, and valuable maxim in law that the court answer to questions of law and the jury to facts, yet every day's experience evinces that in criminal cases juries assume to be judges of the law as well of the facts. And while it is the law and the theory that the court will instruct the jury as to the law in the case, and that it is the duty of the jury to receive the law from the court, yet it has never to our knowledge been claimed that if the jury disregarded the law as laid down by the court, and returned a general verdict of not guilty, the court can set it aside; and as said by McCrary, supra: "If this cannot be done by an order after verdict, how could the court do substantially the same thing by an instruction before verdict?" The action of the court is the same in either case; it is a decision by the court upon the law and facts that the accused is guilty. The court must determine both the law and the facts, whether it directs a verdict of guilty or sets aside a verdict of not guilty. McCrary cites in support of the doctrine laid down by him, and which, we think, is the correct one, the following authorities, some of which go to the full extent, that the jury are exclusive judges of the law and the facts in criminal cases. Several of them are exactly in point, holding that a direction to the jury to convict is erroneous, notwithstanding overwhelming evidence of guilt. U. S. v. Battiste, 2 Sum. 243; Com. v. Porter, 10 Metc., (Mass.) 263; Com. v. Van Tuyl, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 1; U. S. v. Stockwell, 4 Cranch, C. C. 671; Stettinius v. U. S., 5 Cranch, C. C. 573; Montee v. Com., 3 J. J. Marsh. 132; Sims v. State, 43 Ala. 33; U. S. v. Hodges, 2 Wheeler, Crim. Cas. 477; U. S. v. Wilson, Baldw. 78; U. S. v. Fenwick, 5 Cranch, C. C. 562; U. S. v. Greathouse, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 364; 4 Bl. Comm. 361; Tucker v. State, 57 Ga. 503; Huffman v. State, 29 Ala. 40; Perkins v. State, 50 Ala. 154. This court, believing the law to be as expressed in the authorities referred to and cited, holds that the court below erred in instructing the jury to find the defendant guilty, and in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for such action as may be properly taken in accordance with the views herein expressed.

(5 N. M. 548)

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—ANCIENT DEEDS.

1. In ejectment, two ancient deeds, which plaintiff admits were insufficient to pass the title to the grantee because not executed in accordance with the laws of Spain, then in force in New Mexico, are inadmissible to show color of title in plaintiff, who claims under the heirs of the grantee, in the absence of evidence that the grantee or his heirs ever took possession of the land, or exercised acts of ownership over it.

2. An entry on the land by a son of the grantee, nearly 50 years after the execution of the two ancient deeds, and many years after the grantee's death, under an assumption of ownership in himself, is an ouster of the grantee's other heirs; and the title acquired by such entry and possession inures to the son and his heirs, and not to the other heirs of the grantee; and hence such entry and possession do not render admissible the two ancient deeds, as showing color of title in plaintiff, who claims under a quitclaim deed from the other heirs of the grantee.

3. Plaintiff having failed to show any title in the grantee, the exclusion of evidence as to who were his heirs, if error, is immaterial.

Error to district court, Santa Fe county.

LEE, J. This is an action of ejectment, brought by Miguel Salazar, the plaintiff in error, against the defendant in error, Robert H. Longwill, to recover possession of certain real estate situated in precinct No. 4 in the county of Santa Fe, known as the "Ranchito Largo," and for damages for the detention of the same. The action being under the statute, the defendant's plea of not guilty put in issue the right of the plaintiff to possession, and all other questions raised and matters charged in the plaintiff's declaration. The issues being thus joined, they proceeded to trial. The plaintiff introduced his evidence, whereupon the defendant's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, which motion was sustained for the reason that the evidence failed to sustain the case, and the jury, by direction of the court, returned a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and by a writ of error brings the case to this court, and assigns the following grounds of error: (1) That the court erred in excluding from the jury the first document offered in evidence by the plaintiff below; it purporting to be a certificate of conveyance from Maria Casada, widow of Vicente Apodaca, to Tomas Sena, of a portion of the lands in dispute, and executed on the 30th day of July, A. D. 1821. (2) That the court erred in excluding from the jury the second document offered in evidence by the plaintiff below; it purporting to be a conveyance from Vincente Apodaca and Vicente Martinez to Tomas Sena, of a portion of the lands in dispute, and purporting to have been executed by an alcalde on the 12th day of September, 1807. (3) That the court erred, because at a later stage of the trial and after evidence had been given tending to show possession of the lands in dispute in the ancestors of plaintiff in error's grantors, the court again refused to allow plaintiff in error to give the above-described documents in evidence to the jury, but excluded the same again from the jury. (4) That the court erred in refusing to allow any testimony as to who were the heirs of Tomas Sena, except from absolute personal knowledge, and excluded from the jury testimony as to the general reputation in the family of the descendants of Tomas Sena as to who were his heirs, and refused to allow plaintiff in error to show that certain persons were recognized and treated in the family as such heirs, and excluded such testimony from the jury. (5) That the court erred in refusing to allow testimony to be given to the jury as to the actual occupancy of the land in dispute by permission of Jose D. Sena, after the death of Miguel Sena y Quintana in 1875, and in excluding such testimony from the jury. (6) That the court erred in excluding from the jury the deed offered in evidence, executed July 4, 1887, and recorded July 15, 1887, from persons reciting in said deed that they were the heirs of Tomas Sena to the plaintiff in error, conveying the land in controversy. (7) That the court erred in excluding from the jury other relevant, material, and competent testimony offered by plaintiff in error on the trial in the court below in support of his case, and which should have been allowed in evidence. (8) That the court erred in giving its instructions to the jury to return a verdict for the defendant below over the objections of the plaintiff in error, and in refusing to allow the jury to consider the evidence which it had before it.

The principal question for review arises upon the exclusion of certain documents offered in evidence by the plaintiff as the foundation of or in support of his title. We will consider this ruling more fully than any of the other points made, for we think it is decisive of the case. The documents were ancient documents, and therefore to be considered with the presumptions that come to the support of imperfect instruments of more than 30 years old. The documents thus offered in evidence in this case were evidently attempts to make conveyances under the laws of Spain, in force here at the time. The first one offered was dated in the year 1821, and executed by Don Diego Montoya, a constitutional alcalde. The grantors did not sign the same, for the reason, as the alcalde certifies, that they did not know how. The other document was dated in the year 1807, before Don Jose Miguel Tafuya, acting alcalde for the town of Santa Fe. The party making the deed was not present, but, as recited in the document, was at home, sick in bed; and the instrument was not signed by the grantor, or by any one for her. Nor was there any authority in writing or power of attorney exhibited or offered in evidence, whereby the alcalde was authorized to execute the document. They were in the Spanish language, and, when translated into the English language, read as follows:

"Document No. 8. At the city of Santa Fe, New Mexico, on the thirtieth day of the month of July, and current year of one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, before me, Don Diego Montoya, constitutional alcalde of said city, personally appeared Vicente Martin and Don Tomas Sena, both residents of this city, and the former stated that whereas his aunt, Maria Casadas, is sick in bed, and it is impossible for her to come to witness the execution of the present instrument, she has requested him, in the presence of two witnesses, of this same place, to state in her name that her husband, Don Vicente Apodaca, deceased, sold to the said Don Tomas Sena, in the month of April of last year, 1820, a piece of land known as the 'Ranchito Largo,' which is situate in this city, and it consists of one hundred and seventy-seven and a half varas from north to south, and from east to west on the north side of eighty-one and a half varas, and on the south of sixty-three and a half varas; the boundaries of the said land being, on the north, the main road that turns off from the Tenorio's house, which goes by the Martinez house; on the south, the arroyo called 'Los Garambullos,' on the east, lands of the said purchaser; and on the west, lands of Senor Mateo Garcia,—for which land no instrument has been executed to him; and in consideration of the fact that she knows that the said bargain was made, and that in virtue thereof she has received, to her perfect satisfaction and contentment, twenty-one dollars and three reales in cash, desiring to remedy the said defect in the name of her deceased husband, and, on account of her present inability, delegating for that purpose her authority to her said nephew, Vicente Martin, it is her will that it be stated that the bargain made of said land, being true and legal as it is, it is also true that she was contented and satisfied with the said sum, and in virtue thereof, if the said land is or may be worth more, of the excess she makes to him a gift and donation, pure, simple, perfect, and irrevocable, which the law calls 'inter vivos,' and that she gives it to him free of any annuity, rent, mortgage, or other incumbrance, in order that he may freely use it in the manner that he may choose, without any one interfering with him, neither she, her children, heirs, nor successors; and in case any one should oppose it, she requests the justice of his majesty that they be not heard either in or out of court, binding her children, on the contrary, to this guaranty until they place him in quiet and peaceable possession, concerning which she renounces any and all laws which may operate in her favor, submitting herself to the fulfillment of this instrument as if it were by definitive sentence pronounced by a competent judge, acquiesced in and not appealed from; and, as she knows it is an act of justice, she desires this to be complied with, and that it be considered as the said sale, without alleging the defect that up to this date the proper instrument had not been executed; to that end, and in order that the present may have the necessary force and validity, requesting the present constitutional alcalde to sanction it by his authority and judicial decree; and I, the said constitutional alcalde, stated that I sanctioned and did sanction it in so far as I am authorized by law. I certify that Maria Casadas is dangerously ill, and that for that reason, with full knowledge, it has been her will that her nephew, Vicente Martin, should appear in her name, who, comparing all that he has stated, and which is here set forth, with that which in the presence of the two witnesses recently and for the sake of due formality the said Casadas has finally stated, it has all been found to be certain and true. In testimony whereof, and in order that the present instrument be entitled to the same credit as if it had been executed by order of the deceased Don Vicente Apodaca, I signed it with the same witnesses, who made a cross, not knowing how to write. The secretary of the municipality of this city signing this document of security, it being noted that use has been made of the present common paper on account of there being none of any stamp in this province. To all of which I certify.

"Document No. 3. At the town of Santa Fe, on the twelfth day of the month of September, one thousand eight hundred and seven, before me, Don Jose Miguel Tafuya, acting alcalde of this said town, appeared Vicente Apodaca, Vicente Martin, and Tomas de Sena, all three residents of this aforesaid town, whom I certify I know, and the two Vicentes stated that they gave, and in effect they did give, to the said Tomas de Sena, in legal sale, a piece of cultivated land which is at the Ranchito Largo, and [of] this land that which Vicente Apodaca sold consists of fifty varas, and that which Vicente Martin sold consists of one hundred and thirty-eight varas, both pieces comprising one tract; and its boundaries are, on the north, an arroyo; on the south, the Arroyo de los Garambullos; on the east, the lands of the said Vicente Martin; and on the west, the land of the said Vicente Apodaca,—which lands both vendors sold to him for the price and sum of one hundred and thirty-eight dollars in the currency of the country, which said vendors acknowledge having received from the hand of Tomas de Sena, to their satisfaction and contentment, with which they declare that they are satisfied, and paid for the value of said land; and, if it is or may be worth more, of the excess and greater value they make to him a gift and donation, pure, simple perfect, and irrevocable, which the law calls, [two words are here erased in the original; they were doubtless the words 'inter vivos;' ] and that they cede and convey to the said purchaser the right of action and seigniority which they had in said land, in order that as his own he may use it, selling or alienating it, without any suit or claim being brought against him either by them, their children, heirs, successors, either now or at any time; and, in case they should bring it, may they not be heard either in or out of court; and that they will appear in his defense until they leave him in quiet and peaceable possession; to which guaranty they bind their present and future property, real and personal, that they annul [waive] any and all laws that may operate in their favor, and they will not avail themselves thereof, either now or at any time; and they both submit themselves to the royal justices of his majesty, and particularly to those of this town, in order that to the fullest extent they may urge and compel them to the fulfillment of this instrument as if it were by the definitive sentence pronounced by a competent judge, acquiesced in, and not appealed from. All of which they executed before me, and they requested me, for the greater force and validity of this instrument, to sanction it by my authority and judicial decree; and I, said alcalde, state that I did and do sanction it in so far as I am authorized by law. I certify that I know the grantors, who did not sign, as they did not know how. I signed it with those attending me acting by special authority for lack of a public or royal notary, of which there is none of any kind in this province. To all of which I certify.

These instruments were attempted to be executed under the laws of Spain, then in force in this territory as a province of Mexico, and under the Spanish law a sale of real estate was made before a notary public by what was termed a "public writing," (en escritura publica.) A "public writing" is thus defined: "Public writing" is that which is made by a notary public in the presence of the parties who execute it, with the assistance of two witnesses; the parties in interest signing it, or, at their request, either of the witnesses, with the said notary." Escriche, p. 637. "Public Instrument. In general it is every writing authorized by a public functionary in matters pertaining to his office or position, as has been already indicated in the two preceding articles, but more particularly by public instrument or writing, is meant the writing in which is contained a disposition or agreement executed before a notary public in accordance with the law, is understood, and of this kind of instruments we will treat in this article." "(1) In order that the public instrument be held as authentic, and in accordance with the law, the following conditions are required: * * * (7) That, the writing being made, it be read by the notary to the parties and the witnesses, and, the former agreeing to its tenor, they shall sign with their names and surnames; and if they should not know how to sign, either of the witnesses, or any other person who may know how to write, may sign for him," the notary making mention at the end 'that the witness signed for the party who did not know how to write.'" Law 1, tit. 23, bk. 10, Novissima Recopilacion. Escriche, pp. 886, 888. The civil law in regard to the requirements of a power of attorney is essentially the same as that of the common law, and it would hardly be contended that under the common law a person without a properly executed power could make a valid conveyance of another person's land. Yet these documents might very properly have been admitted in evidence as ancient documents, tending to show color of title, if they were offered alone for that purpose, with an understanding that they were to be followed up with proofs that the grantees took possession thereunder, and maintained the same under claim of title, until ouster by the defendant; and this proposition would have to be sustained by the evidence, as it is an elementary rule in the action of ejectment that the party claiming the right to lands must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title. The possession of the defendant gives him a right against every person who cannot establish a title. This is a general rule, to which there is no exception, and has been established by a world of authorities. See Tyler, Ej. p. 72, and cases cited. The plaintiff in error does not claim that the documents offered in evidence by him were legal deeds, but invokes for them the ruling of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How. 284. In that case the deed was executed in 1804. It was attested by two witnesses, and purported to have been acknowledged in the presence of a syndic. The deed had been executed 40 years at the date of that decision, and from the time of its execution to the time of the decision the grantees were asserting their claim under it. It was presented to the commissioners in 1811, having been filed with the recorder of land titles in the year 1808; and again it was brought before the commissioners in 1835, having remained on the file until that time. Possession under the deed was for a time held by Stoddard himself, and became so notorious that an elevation on the land was called "Stoddard's Mound." It was held that such a deed, under such a state of facts, was properly admitted in evidence. In this case there is no evidence that Tomas Sena, the grantee, ever had possession of any part of the land, or by any act of his ever asserted or pretended to assert any claim of title to any part of it, unless it is included in a general bequest to his heirs by his first wife, which will was executed in 1835. The will, however, was only offered in evidence to show who the heirs of Tomas Sena were, and not for the purpose of showing that the land was included in his will, or thereby intended to be conveyed to any person or persons. The documents were not recorded during the lifetime of Tomas Sena, or during the lifetime of Miguel Sena y Quintana, his son, who died in the year 1875, he being the party who, it is claimed by the plaintiff, in the year 1866 or 1867 set up some claim of right to the property. Whether this right was under or by virtue of the documents in question it does not appear. So far as the evidence shows, his claim to the property was that of his own. These documents, together with the will of his father, were found, after his death, in a box which had belonged to him. It does not appear in evidence that before that time any of the other heirs of Tomas Sena knew of their existence. His acts of ownership were to visit the land a few times, have it measured with a rope, to try and sell it, and put it in charge of Maj. Jose D. Sena, to take charge of it for him. Maj. Sena let different persons cultivate different parts of the lands. Some years some parts of the land were cultivated, some years others, and some years it remained idle. There are no buildings of any kind on the land, or other evidences of exclusive possession, except a wire fence around a small part of the land. The evidence does not show when that was constructed or by whom. There is no pretension that it was erected by Miguel Sena y Quintana. In fact the evidence shows the contrary, as Maj. Sena states in his testimony that he does not know who put the fence there, nor does he show that it was there while he had charge of the premises. Then, what was the character or effect of the acts of ownership exercised by Miguel Sena y Quintana to the locus in quo? It is admitted by the plaintiff in error that the documents in question are not deeds conveying fee-simple title. Then, in order to give them any legal effect, it would have to be shown that Tomas Sena, the person mentioned in the documents as the grantee, or persons holding under him, had entered under them and occupied the same by claim of right, until such possession ripened into title by prescription. There is no evidence that Tomas Sena ever had or claimed possession of the land, nor is there any evidence that Miguel Sena y Quintana entered or took possession as a tenant in common with the other heirs of Tomas Sena, deceased; but, so far as the evidence goes, his possession was adverse to them. An ouster by a tenant in common of his co-tenants does not differ in its nature from any other ouster. His entry was an ouster of them, and his possession was adverse to them, for his assumption of ownership was in himself, and clearly adverse to them, as well as the rest of the world; and, if any title inured to any person by virtue of his possession, it would be to him, his heirs, or persons holding under him, and not to the heirs of Tomas Sena, deceased.

And this brings us to consider a deed offered in evidence, executed by some 40 persons on the 4th day of July, 1887, in which it is cited that they are the heirs of Tomas Sena, deceased, and in consideration of one dollar and other good considerations quitclaim whatever right or title they may have inherited as heirs of Tomas Sena, deceased; it being thus set forth in the deed: "The property herein conveyed is the same property that the said parties of the first part obtained and inherited from Tomas Sena, deceased, who purchased the said real estate from Vicente Apodaca and Vicente Martin by deeds dated September 12, 1807, and July 30, 1821," etc. And this deed does not purport to convey any other title than that which they may have inherited as heirs of Tomas Sena, deceased, through the attempted conveyances before set out and considered. It is very clear that those documents did not convey to Tomas Sena any title, and therefore his heirs, whoever they may have been, could not convey a title through inheritance from the said Tomas Sena as derived by him through those documents. The court was therefore right in excluding this deed as evidence from the jury.

There are errors assigned upon the rulings of the court in excluding certain testimony from the jury, which was claimed tended to show who the heirs of Tomas Sena were. This testimony could only become material after they had established a title in Tomas Sena, which, according to the view we have taken of the case, the plaintiffs failed to do. Therefore the testimony in that regard was immaterial, and errors, if any were committed, in relation thereto, would be regarded immaterial, and cannot have any effect here.

It is also claimed that the court erred in directing a verdict for defendant. This was practically settled in sustaining the ruling of the court below in excluding from the jury as evidence the title papers offered by the plaintiff in error. Those papers being excluded, there was no evidence to support a verdict, and the court very properly instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, for the reason that the law presumes a person in possession of real estate has a valid title thereto, and this presumption can only be overcome by proving the title out of such party. Finding no substantial error, the judgment will be affirmed.

ELECTIONS—CANVASSING RETURNS—MANDAMUS—INJUNCTION.

1. Under Act Feb. 23, 1889, (Sess. Laws N. M. T. 1889, c. 135, § 13, p. 331,) providing that the county commissioners shall canvass the returns and declare the result of an election from the returns, and that, if they fail to canvass any return under any pretense, they may be compelled by mandamus to either canvass the returns, and declare the result, or bring before the district judge all the returns to be examined by him, and the result declared by him, the district judge can enjoin the canvassing board from issuing a certificate of election pending a mandamus proceeding to compel them to canvass the returns from certain districts which they have refused to consider. O'BRIEN, C. J., dissenting.

2. Under Laws N. M. T. 1889, c. 117, § 1, providing that injunctions may be granted in aid of any suit at law, provided that such suit has been begun, it is competent for a district judge, on whom power to compel by mandamus the board of county commissioners to canvass all the returns of any election is conferred by Laws N. M. T. 1889, c. 135, § 13, to enjoin the commissioners from issuing certificates of election pending the proceedings by mandamus which have been instituted when the injunction is granted. O'BRIEN, C. J., dissenting.

3. The fact that in punishing commissioners for disobedience of such injunction the court commits an irregularity, by imposing several different fines for several distinct offenses in one proceeding, does not entitle them to release on habeas corpus, as such errors must be cured in the court committing them, or by appeal. O'BRIEN, C. J., dissenting.

4. Under Comp. Laws N. M. § 1829, providing that the courts shall always be open, the judge of the district court at chambers has jurisdiction to grant an injunction in vacation.

Habeas corpus.

Francis Downs, N. B. Laughlin, Thomas Smith, and Harrison Burns, for petitioners. E. L. Bartlett, Sol. Gen., and John H. Knaebel, for the Territory.

McFIE, J. On the 23d day of January, A. D 1891, on petition of John H. Sloan and Teodoro Martinez, alleging, in substance, that petitioners were unlawfully confined and restrained of their liberty by the sheriff of Santa Fe county, a writ of habeas corpus issued out of this court, directing Francisco Chavez, sheriff of Santa Fe county, to bring the petitioners before this court, to show cause why petitioners should not be discharged. The record discloses all of the proceedings had before EDWARD P. SEEDS, associate justice of the supreme court of the territory of New Mexico, and judge of the first judicial district court thereof, of which the county of Santa Fe forms a part, sitting in chambers in the city of Santa Fe, in said county, in a certain mandamus proceeding, No. 2,808, filed November 12, 1890, entitled "The Territory of New Mexico, ex rel. Benjamin M. Read, vs. John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez. Board of County Commissioners of Santa Fe county," and a certain proceeding by injunction, No. 2,809, filed November 12, 1890, entitled "Benjamin M. Read, Joseph B. Mayo, and Thomas B. Catron vs. John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez." Upon the hearing, January 23, A. D. 1891, no technical objections were raised to the formality of the proceedings, but, on the contrary, counsel for petitioners denied the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter, and the power of the court to issue the process by which petitioners were held, and contended that the same was void. The facts out of which this controversy grows are pretty fully stated in the application for injunction, which is as follows:

"Territory of New Mexico, county of Santa Fe. In the district court for the said county of Santa Fe, sitting for the trial of causes arising under the laws of said territory. To the Honorable EDWARD P. SEEDS, associate justice of the supreme court of said territory, and judge of said district court: Benjamin M. Read, Joseph B. Mayo, and Thomas B. Catron, residents of said county, bring this, their bill of complaint against John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez, also residents of said county, and show unto your honor: Complainants were candidates at the election held in said county on the 4th day of November, 1890, said Read and Mayo for the offices of members of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of New Mexico, and said Catron for the office of member of the council of said legislative assembly, and, as such candidates, were voted for by voters of said county, and, as shown by the election returns, received majorities of the votes cast for said offices, respectively. Defendants are the county commissioners of said county, and, as such, are required by law, within six days after an election, to publicly examine and count the votes polled for each candidate, and to forward to the persons who have received the greatest number of votes polled at any election held for members of the house of representatives the corresponding certificate of election. That defendants have assembled at the court-house in the county of Santa Fe for the purpose aforesaid, but have failed, neglected, and refused to count a portion of the votes polled at said election for these complainants, such portion being the votes cast for complainants in the precincts of said county numbered 1, 2, 8, 11, and 16; the returns of election from said precincts being before said defendants, and in regular and perfect condition. The failure and refusal of defendants to count said votes as shown by said returns will materially affect the result of said count so as to make it appear that persons other than complainants have been elected to said offices, although such is not really the fact; and defendants give out and threaten that they will make and deliver, or cause to be made and delivered, to such other persons, certificates showing their election to the offices aforesaid, and complainants believe that they will certainly do so unless restrained by an order of this court. If such certificates are so made and issued to such other persons, great and irreparable damage may, and probably will, result to complainants, and to each of them, and to the public generally, and the existence of such certificates may, and probably will, be the cause of numerous suits and vexatious and expensive litigation, as has heretofore been the case in this territory under similar circumstances. As soon as the said count by defendants is completed, complainants will institute, or cause to be instituted, in accordance with the statute, proceedings in mandamus to compel defendants to canvass all of the returns of said election in said county; but before such proceedings can be made effective, and before the complete canvass can be made, defendants will issue, or cause to be issued, such improper and fraudulent certificates of election as hereinbefore described. Complainants therefore pray that defendants be restrained and enjoined by an injunction of this court from making and delivering, or ordering or causing to be made or delivered, any certificate of election to either of the offices hereinbefore mentioned to any person or persons other than these complainants, and for making, or causing to be made, any record of the result of their canvass of said election returns, until the further order of the court in the premises. May it please your honor to grant unto complainants the writ of subpoena, under the seal of this honorable court, directed to defendants, John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez, commanding them, and each of them, to appear before this court on a day and under a penalty to be therein fixed, then and there to answer unto the premises as fully as if the same were here repeated, and they particularly interrogated thereto, but not under oath, an answer under oath being hereby expressly waived, and to abide the order or decree of the court in the premises. BENJAMIN M. READ."

"Territory of New Mexico, county of Santa Fe. On this 12th day of November, A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me Benjamin M. Read, and made oath that he had read the foregoing bill by him subscribed, and knew the contents thereof, and that the same is true, except as to matters therein alleged upon information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. Witness my hand, and the seal of the district court of the first judicial district of the territory of New Mexico, the day and year last above written. A. E. WALKER, Clerk Dist. Court. [Seal.]"

"The territory of New Mexico to John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez, greeting: Whereas, Benjamin M. Read, Joseph B. Mayo, and Thomas B. Catron have filed in the district court for Santa Fe county their bill of complaint against you, praying to be relieved touching the matters therein set forth, now, therefore, you, the said John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez, both individually and as members of the board of county commissioners of Santa Fe county, your agents, servants, employes, and advisers, are hereby restrained and enjoined from making or delivering, or ordering or causing to be made or delivered, any certificate of election to the offices of members of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of the territory of New Mexico, and of member of the council of said legislative assembly, to any person or persons other than said Benjamin M. Read, Joseph B. Mayo, and Thomas B. Catron, and from making or causing to be made any record of the result of your canvass of the election returns of the election held in said county of Santa Fe on the 4th day of November, 1890, until the further order of said district court in the premises. Witness the Honorable EDWARD P. SEEDS, associate justice of the supreme court of the territory of New Mexico, and judge of the first judicial district court thereof, and the seal of said district court, this 12th day of November, 1890. A. E. WALKER, Clerk. [Seal.]"

The injunction not having been dissolved, but remaining in force, two affidavits were filed in the cause setting forth the disobedience of the writ of injunction by two of the said county commissioners, John H. Sloan and Teodoro Martinez. Thomas B. Catron, one of the complainants, filed his petition setting forth the violation of the injunction by two of the commissioners, Sloan and Martinez, and prayed that they should be punished for contempt. The court ordered Sloan and Martinez brought before the court by attachment, and upon hearing they were each fined in the sum of $50 for four distinct acts of contempt, aggregating $200, and costs, and ordered to be imprisoned in the county jail until fine and costs were paid. The petitioners refused to pay the fine and costs assessed against each of them, and were put in jail by the sheriff. To avoid payment of the fines assessed and costs, and be discharged from imprisonment, petitioners have sued out this writ of habeas corpus. The law governing the mandamus proceedings in this case is section 13, c. 135. Laws 1889, and took effect February 28, 1889. In compliance with that section, Mr. Read filed his sworn petition on the 12th day of November, 1890, alleging the refusal of John H. Sloan, Teodoro Martinez, and George L. Wyllys, as such canvassing board, to count the returns from certain precincts named; and the court granted an alternative writ of mandamus requiring the canvassing board to proceed to either canvass the returns from the precincts named, and declare the result, or to appear in person forthwith before said district court, and bring with them all of such returns, and all of the returns or papers purporting to be returns. The board, accompanied by counsel, appeared before the court on the following day, and filed an answer stating in full their reasons for declining to canvass the returns, and declare the result, as directed by the court, and asked to be discharged. On application of counsel for the relator a peremptory writ of mandamus, as to the canvassing of precincts 1, 2, 16, and 8, was issued November 18, 1890, returnable November 19, 1890, but the record shows no further proceedings, nor compliance with said peremptory writ. A bill of exceptions was filed by the respondents on December 5, 1890, and the cause is now in this court.

Having thus fully stated the record, we will now consider the law applicable to this cause. It is insisted on behalf of the petitioners that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and therefore the writ of injunction was void; and being void, admitting that the petitioners had disobeyed the writ, there could be no contempt. It may be admitted that, if the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter,—that is, an absolute lack of power,—then there could be no contempt in disobeying the order of the court, because the order and process of the court was void. The authorities are abundant in support of this proposition. It is contended on behalf of the officer that the court had complete jurisdiction in the premises; that the petitioners are not illegally restrained, and should be remanded. A large number of authorities have been cited, and a examination of them emphasizes the necessity of keeping in mind the distinction between the entire want of power conferred by jurisdiction and the erroneous exercise of or the propriety of exercising, the power conferred. Courts of equity have very large discretionary powers, and in the exercise of that discretion they have declined to exercise an ex-lating jurisdiction and power which would have been exercised had a proper case been presented. No positive and inflexible rule can be laid down regulating the jurisdiction of courts of equity, or whether jurisdiction shall be exercised or declined, inasmuch as the circumstances of each case must be taken into consideration in determining these questions. Nor can the authorities of one state be relied upon as settling these questions for another, for the reason that there may be constitutional or statutory limitations or enlargements of jurisdiction not common to all; thereby necessitating a careful examination of the law as applied to the facts of each case. In this case it is insisted that the court had no jurisdiction, because the petitioners were acting as a board of canvassers of an election; that they had discretionary powers; that they constituted an independent political power, and were free from the interference of the judicial power. The case of Dickey v. Reed, 78 Ill. 261, is relied upon as conclusive in this case. In that case an election had been held to determine whether the city of Chicago should become incorporated under the general incorporation act, or remain under its charter; or, as the court says, the election was to determine "which of two forms of government it should have." A bill in chancery was filed, alleging fraud and irregularity in the election,—not in the returns,—and prayed an injunction restraining the canvassing board from canvassing the returns of the election then in their possession. This was properly denominated a "bill to contest the election," which courts of chancery usually decline to entertain; but the injunction sought to restrain the board from doing a legal duty which the statute of Illinois imposed upon it,—to canvass the returns. The lower court granted the injunction, but the supreme court held that the court had no jurisdiction of the case. There is a marked distinction between the proceedings in that case and the case here, namely: That was a bill in chancery to contest an election; this was not. The injunction in that case was to prevent the board from performing a legal act and duty; the injunction in this case sought to prevent the board from doing an illegal and fraudulent act. There is also a material difference between the law then in force in Illinois and the laws of this territory, in that in this territory the statute expressly makes it the duty of the courts, when the county commissioners, sitting as a canvassing board, fail or refuse to canvass all of the returns, on its being brought to the attention of the court, to compel the board to canvass all the returns. Section 13 of chapter 135 of the Laws of 1889 is as follows: "That the board of county commissioners, sitting as a canvassing board for the purpose of canvassing the returns of any election hereafter held in this territory, shall not adjourn or become functus officio as a canvassing board until such board of commissioners shall have canvassed each and every return of election before them, and shall have declared the result from the face of such returns; and if any board of county commissioners, sitting as a canvassing board, shall fail, neglect, or refuse to canvass any return of any election before said board under any pretense that such return is irregular, or for any other pretense, it shall be lawful for any qualified voter to present his petition under oath to the judge of the district court having jurisdiction, at his chambers, briefly setting forth the facts and circumstances, and praying that such board of commissioners shall be required by writ of mandamus issuing out of said court to count and certify such returns. And thereupon it shall be the duty of the district judge to immediately issue, or cause to be issued, his alternative writ of mandamus requiring said commissioners either to canvass such return or returns and to declare the result, or to appear in person forthwith before said court, and bring with them all of such returns; and, if such commissioners shall decline to canvass such return or returns, they shall appear before said court in obedience to such writ, and take with them all of the returns or papers purporting to be returns before them, and thereupon the court shall forthwith proceed to examine said returns, and upon such examination may issue his peremptory writ commanding said board of commissioners to immediately canvass any or all of such returns, and to declare the result."

Evidently, the legislature of this territory, profiting by experience, intended to place it within the power of one voter of a county to invoke the aid of the courts to compel canvassing boards, when canvassing election returns, to do their duty, if they either fail, neglect, or refuse to do it. The object of the law is to ascertain the will of all the people as expressed by them by their ballots, even from an unscrupulous or unwilling board of canvassers, and to preserve the rights of the people, individually and collectively, as well as prevent fraud and injury. Canvassing boards may fail, neglect, or refuse through ignorance; and the court, upon proper application, is required to direct them. Boards of canvassers have a ministerial duty to perform under this law, and that is to canvass "each and every return of election before them, and shall have declared the result from the face of such returns." This law gives the courts power to see that this duty is performed, and the undoubted right to issue the necessary writs of mandamus compelling its performance. The record shows that it became necessary to invoke the remedy provided by this law, but that it was unavailing.

The power of the courts to compel boards of canvassers to do their ministerial duty by canvassing the returns and declaring the results in election cases is sustained by numerous authorities without the aid of such an explicit law as the law of this territory. In the case of State v. Garesche, 65 Mo. 480, the court says: "Having ascertained what was the true return, and that the canvassing officers had failed or refused to count it, thus leaving their legal duty unfulfilled, the peremptory writ commanded its performance. It will thus be seen that the right to determine the specific legal duty of ministerial officers, such as defendants are, necessarily results from the very nature of the proceeding by mandamus. It simply requires the judicial officer to proceed to do his duty. It not only requires the ministerial officer to proceed to do his duty, but it also indicates what his specific duty is. To assert that the writ of mandamus cannot require the performance by a ministerial officer of any act which he does not, with the lights before him, conceive it his duty to perform, is to destroy the efficacy of the writ, and to substitute the conscience of the officer for the command of the law." The supreme court of Wisconsin has decided that a board of canvassers can be compelled to determine, in accordance with law, which one of the candidates at an election in that state for the office of representative in the congress of the United States is entitled to the certificate of election, and that this does not contravene the constitutional power of the house to determine its member's right to the office; the court merely deciding whether the returns made by such board of votes cast in a county should be included in their canvass and statement. State v. Board of Canvassers, 36 Wis. 498. Mr. McCrary, in his work on Elections, (section 350,) says: "The courts will not undertake to decide upon the right of a party to hold a seat in the legislature when by the constitution each house is made the judge of the election and qualifications of its own members; but a court may, by mandamus, compel the proper certifying officers to discharge their duties, and arm the parties elected to such legislative body with the credentials necessary to enable them to assert their rights before the proper tribunal. And inasmuch as canvassing and returning officers act ministerially, and have no power to go behind the returns, or inquire into the legality of votes cast and returned, a court will, by mandamus, compel them to declare and certify the result as shown by the returns, because that is a plain duty; but the award of a certificate of election under such mandate will not conclude the legislative body in determining the election." O'Ferrall v. Colby, 2 Minn. 180, (Gil. 148.)

These authorities, and many others that might be cited, make clear the duties of these canvassing boards, and the power of the courts to compel them by mandamus to do their duty, and the further fact is shown that such proceeding is not an election contest, nor does it try the title to an office. It simply compels a canvass of the returns, and a declaration of the result as shown by the face of the returns, regardless of who is elected or defeated. The numerous authorities in Illinois and elsewhere to the effect that the courts of equity have no jurisdiction in a case of contested election, and that injunction will not restrain the holding of an election, or try the title to an office, are not applicable here, and will be better understood if the above distinctions are kept in mind. As stated in the case in 78 Ill., there are certain political powers pertaining to the co-ordinate departments of government that are independent of judicial power, and therefore cannot be controlled by the courts, which proposition excludes all courts; but the power of the courts may be invoked in aid of political administration to compel the performance of specific legal duties. Wherever, therefore, the door is open to judicial supervision, as in this territory, then all of the power of the courts necessary to make the remedy effectual is available. If equity is necessary to uphold the common law, it has a clear right to act by reason of the ancillary character of its functions. Under the statute of the territory above referred to, there can be no doubt of the power and jurisdiction of the court in the mandamus proceeding, nor can there be any reasonable doubt as to the fact that the legislature, in passing that act, intended to compel county commissioners, when sitting as a canvassing board, to declare the true result of an election from the face of all the returns, and that the judge of the proper district court, if called upon as provided by the law, should compel it to be done in case of failure, neglect, or refusal. It is clear, also, that such board is prohibited from canvassing less than all of the returns, and that they are forbidden to certify to false results, based upon a canvass of part of the returns. Therefore, if the law is obeyed by canvassers, all parties will secure the rights to which they were entitled by the result of any such election and the law.

It was urged in argument on behalf of the petitioners that the court had no power to control the discretion of petitioners when they were acting as canvassers of election returns; but an examination of the statute shows that they had no discretionary powers. The statute commanded them to canvass all of the returns, and declare the result from the face of the returns; therefore the argument fails to point out a want of power in the court in this respect. Counsel for petitioners also contend that petitioners are answerable alone to their consciences and their constituents for failure or refusal to properly discharge their duties as such canvassing officers; but this contention is conclusively answered by the statute on the subject, and need not be further noticed. Sadly defective, indeed, would be a law which placed the rights and interests of the people of a county in the hands of (it might be) an irresponsible and unscrupulous board of canvassers, who were accountable only to their consciences and constituents. Fortunately, the law of this territory is not thus defective. Jurisdiction in regard to election matters having been specifically conferred upon the courts of this territory, it is difficult to see how the case of Dickey v. Reed, 78 Ill. 261, becomes authority in this case; for in that case it was held that jurisdiction had not been conferred, and therefore the process was void. The failure to exercise the power conferred does not destroy the power. That is clearly shown by the case of Neiser v. Thomas, (Mo.) 12 S. W. Rep. 725, in which the court refuse to take jurisdiction, but say that they do not wish it to be understood that they would not exercise jurisdiction, even in an election case, upon the presentation of a proper case. That was an injunction case, but was really an attempt to contest an election, and sought to have Mr. Thomas' right to the office of city marshal of St. Louis set aside on the ground that he was disqualified. To determine this question, evidence must be heard; and hence it was simply an attempt to try a contested election case in an equity court, and jurisdiction was properly declined. If we accept the view of the Illinois case contended for by counsel for petitioners,—that canvassing boards, in election matters, are an independent and coordinate political power, absolutely free from the jurisdiction of the courts,—what means this array of decisions of able courts, both of law and equity, in which they have taken and exercised jurisdiction in election cases, and especially as to canvassing boards? It seems to us that the contention is erroneous, and that the Illinois court declined jurisdiction under the law of that particular state as applied to the case presented to the court. The fact that some courts exercise jurisdiction in election cases, while others do not, serves to prove that the courts await the presentation of a proper case before attempting to exercise an existing power; and, further, that while there are election cases of which the courts of equity will refuse to take jurisdiction, owing to the particular phase of the case presented, still there are very many phases of election cases of which courts both of law and equity will take and exercise jurisdiction. Numerous cases are reported showing the power of the courts over canvassing boards, and our statute gives the courts comprehensive jurisdiction over them.

This brings us to the consideration of the injunction proceeding in the light of what has been said. The bill alleged, in substance, that at the election held in Santa Fe county November 4, A. D. 1890, Benjamin M. Read and Joseph B. Mayo were each candidates for the office of member of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of New Mexico, and that Thomas B. Catron was a candidate for member of the council of said legislative assembly; that they were voted for at said election, and that the returns showed that they had received a majority of the votes cast at said election for such offices; that petitioners and one George L. Wyllys were the commissioners of Santa Fe county, and were by law required to canvass the returns of said election within six days after the election, declare the result, and forward certificates of election to those having received a majority of the votes cast; that the said board had assembled, but that they had failed, neglected, and refused to count the returns from precincts 1, 2, 8, 11, and 16 of said county, although the returns from these precincts were before the board in regular and perfect condition; that the failure of the board to count the returns from those precincts would materially affect the result by showing that other persons than complainants were elected, when in fact complainants had received a majority of the votes cast; that said commissioners had threatened to declare the result from a partial canvass, and issue certificates to others than complainants for said offices; that, if such certificates were issued, great and irreparable damage will be the result to complainants and the public generally; that it may, and probably will, result in causing numerous suits and expensive and vexatious litigation; that complainants will institute mandamus proceedings to compel the board to canvass all of the returns, but that before such proceedings can be made effective the board will issue, or cause to be issued, such fraudulent certificates. Upon this bill a writ of injunction issued, as above set out. This bill brought to the court's attention a case where a board of canvassers had refused to obey the law, and not only that, but that they were about to do a plainly illegal act, and perpetrate a fraud, liable to cause a multiplicity of suits and great injury, which could still be prevented by the prompt action of the court. The court was bound to know the law, and that the act about to be committed was plainly illegal and fraudulent. The bill alleged that the canvassers had refused to canvass the returns from five precincts, although the returns were before them in "regular and perfect condition;" and the court was bound to know that the law commanded this board to canvass all of the returns, and declare the result from a canvass of all the returns, and that it was an illegal act to issue certificates of a result declared from a canvass of part of the returns. While county commissioners have large discretionary powers, this canvassing board had no discretion whatever, under the law as to that particular matter. They had a specific duty to perform. They had refused to perform it, and were about to declare a false result, and issue certificates, the legal effect of which the court was bound to know. Referring to the law of this territory on this subject, we cannot refrain from commending the wisdom of the legislature in enacting it. It strikes directly at the cause of the vexatious litigation and disorder,—the discretionary powers of canvassing boards. This law provides that the county commissioners, when sitting as a canvassing board for the purpose of canvassing the returns of any election held in this territory, shall not adjourn or become functus officio as a canvassing board until they "shall have canvassed each and every return of election before them, and shall have declared the result from the face of such returns." The will of all the voters as shown by the returns must be declared by the canvassing board. In case of a candidate for office, he has a legal right to this declaration; and if, by this declaration, a candidate has received a majority of the votes, the certificate must be issued to him, and it is an illegal act to deprive him of this evidence of his title to office. As was said in O'Ferrall v. Colby, 2 Minn. 180, (Gil. 148:)" But a court may, by mandamus, compel the proper certifying officers to discharge their duties, and arm the parties elected to such legislative body with the credentials necessary to enable them to assert their rights before the proper tribunal." This does not necessarily give the candidate the office,—indeed, he may never obtain it; but he has a right to have what the law gives him from the canvassing board. The record shows that the mandamus proceeding was before the court at the time this bill for injunction was presented, as it bears an earlier number upon the docket; hence the court was informed that it might become the duty of the court to compel the board to declare a different result from that upon which the board was about to issue certificates, so that the court, by refusing to restrain the issuance of illegal certificates, would practically become a party to the transaction. It was the plain duty of the court, and it had full power, to prevent certificates from being issued until such time as, by the remedy pointed out by the statute, it could be definitely ascertained what the result of the election was, and to whom certificates should be issued by the board. The bill in this case sought to restrain the doing of a fraudulent act. It sought to prevent vexatious and expensive litigation, and it pointed out the necessity for prompt relief. But it is urged that there is want of jurisdiction, because there was a remedy at law. That there is a remedy at law is not sufficient. It must be an adequate remedy. Under the law of this territory, the remedy at law was not an adequate remedy in this case. If this had been a bill to contest an election, or try the title to an office, there would be force in the contention; but it is not a case of that kind. The law of this territory clothes the courts expressly with full power, when properly called upon by a tax-payer of the proper county, to grant the writ of mandamus, both alternative and peremptory, to compel canvassing boards to do their duty, if they fail, neglect, or refuse to do it. That duty is to canvass each and every return before them, declare the result from the face of the returns, and, under section 1191, they must issue certificates to the persons having the greatest number of votes for the particular office. In other words, the canvassing board must give to the person receiving the greatest number of votes, (at an election for officers,) after they have ascertained from an honest canvass of all the returns, the certificate which is prima facie evidence of his title to the office, and it also secures to the people an honest expression of their will. Any other canvass, or the issuing of any other certificate, would be a gross fraud upon both the person voted for and the people. But for the intervention of equity in such a case as this, prima facie evidence of title to the same office may be given to more than one person by unscrupulous officials, and if so the very purpose of the law would be defeated. As the law applies equally to all election returns, it follows that the rights acquired by a candidate for election to office at an election in this territory are to be preserved from their inception, and the right of a person elected to office in this territory is to have the legal evidence of that right which the canvassing board are required by law to give him, and, further, that such legal evidence of right to the office shall not be given to another. The policy of the law is to deprive canvassing boards of their power to do harm, such as the bill shows was about to be done. The court in South Carolina, in the case of Grier v. Shackelford, 3 Brev. 491, speaking of the duty of election managers, says: "It is not to be believed that the legislature intended to hang the most important rights of the citizen on the arbitrary decision of such a tribunal. If they are to range through all the vagaries of their capricious fancies, the elective franchise will become an idle mockery."

Is it an adequate remedy for a candidate, having received the greatest number of votes, to be compelled to contest before the legislature a defeated candidate, having prima facie evidence of title to the office given him in violation of law? Plainly, it is not. The law commands the board, and, if they refuse, the court must compel the board, to give the successful candidate prima facie evidence of his right to the office, and it is for the defeated candidate to resort to quo warranto or contest, as the case may be. These remedies may be adequate for the defeated candidate, but they are not for the successful candidate. The legislature of a territory is limited in its sessions to 60 days, and compensation is paid to the sitting member. Suppose a board of canvassers gives a certificate of election to a defeated candidate; he presents it, and takes his seat; contest is brought by a successful candidate, but by delay it is not decided prior to adjournment. Where is the remedy for the candidate who was actually elected? Evidently, such is not an adequate remedy. If the board of canvassers do their duty, the successful candidate will receive prima facie evidence of his right to the office. If the unsuccessful candidate desires to question the result, he may resort to the appropriate remedy, go behind the returns, and then the case has reached what is regarded in law as a "contested election case." "Except in cases of special injunction to stay waste or prevent other irreparable injury, the bill should generally show some primary equity in aid of which the injunction is asked, and the relief is granted as ancillary to or in support of the primary equity whose enforcement is thus sought." Patterson v. Miller, 4 Jones, Eq. 451; Washington v. Emery, Id. 29. "And it is incumbent upon the party seeking relief by interlocutory injunction to show some fair legal or equitable rights, and a well-grounded apprehension of immediate injury to those rights." High, Inj. § 7. "Where, however, the parties are at issue upon a question of legal right, and it is necessary to preserve their rights in statu quo until the determination of the controversy, an interlocutory injunction may properly be allowed." Harman v. Jones, Craig & P. 299. In such cases courts of equity do not assume jurisdiction to dispose of the legal rights in the controversy, but confine themselves to protecting those rights as they are, pending an adjudication upon the legal questions involved. In Kerr v. Trego, 47 Pa. St. 292, involving elections and offices in the city of Philadelphia, the supreme court granted an injunction, and said: "The remedy by injunction extends to all acts that are contrary to law, and prejudicial to the interests of the community, and for which there is no adequate remedy at law." The supreme court of Illinois, which decided the case of Dickey v. Reed, has frequently granted injunctions in county-seat election cases, holding that, while they had no statutory authority, the authority was implied by the constitution.

If there could still be any doubt of the power of the court of equity over the subject-matter of this injunction proceeding, we think it is at rest by virtue of another statute of this territory, which took effect on the same day the former statute referred to took effect: Section 1, c. 117, Laws 1889, is as follows: "That suits in equity may be begun, injunctions granted, or receivers appointed in aid of any suit at law, whether the same has been prosecuted to a judgment or not: provided, that such suit at law has been begun at the time any such equitable relief is sought." It is objected that the mandamus proceeding was not a suit at law; but we are of the opinion that the term "suit at law" is used in its broadest sense, and that it was intended to authorize the aid of equity whenever it was necessary in order to give a more complete and effectual remedy in any pending legal proceeding. The word "suit" is a very comprehensive term. As used in the judiciary act, 1789, § 25, it was construed to mean "any proceeding in a court of justice in which the plaintiff pursues in such court the remedy which the law affords him." "An application for a prohibition is a suit," Weston v. City Council, 2 Pet. 449. "In its most extended sense, the word 'suit' includes not only a civil action, but also a criminal action." Story, Const. § 1719; 1 Chit. Pl. 399. "Suit" applies to proceedings in chancery, as well as law," (1 Smith Ch. Pr.); "and is, therefore, more general than 'action,' which is almost exclusively applied to actions at law," (Didier v. Davison, 10 Paige, 516.) The term as used in the statute is to be construed in its comprehensive sense, and comprehends proceedings ancillary to the remedy by mandamus, as authorized by section 13, c. 133, Laws 1889. The injunction proceeding is in aid of the mandamus, as shown by the record, and, indeed, each refers to the other, and the nature of the remedy sought shows the ancillary character of the proceedings. Can it be contended that a court possessing enlarged jurisdiction, both at law and in equity, will decline to stay an illegal act, and preserve the status quo until equal and exact justice can be done? We think not, and therefore hold that upon the case presented the court had complete jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, and properly granted the temporary injunction prayed for. That the command of the writ was disobeyed by the petitioners is not denied by them, and the record also shows the violation of the injunction by setting out in full the certificates which the court had restrained them from issuing. If the court had jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter,—which we have already answered in the affirmative,—it follows that the action of the petitioners in disobeying the order of the court was contempt, for which they were liable to punishment. They were properly brought before the court by attachment, and punished by fine, and committed to the county jail until the fine and costs were paid.

It is objected by counsel for petitioners that the court exceeded its authority in the matter of punishment, inasmuch as four different fines were assessed of $50 each for four distinct offenses in one proceeding. The record shows that these fines were assessed separately, and there being no doubt of the inherent power of the court to punish, as well as by virtue of the statute, there can be no doubt of the legality of the first fine of $50. But the fact that more fines were assessed would not make the entire punishment void. The petitioners are liable to be held for the valid fine. It is a mere irregularity, that does not warrant discharge on habeas corpus. Errors or irregularities are curable in the court from which the process issued, or by appeal; not on habeas corpus. Church, Hab. Corp. §§ 344, 363, and cases cited. The supreme court of the District of Columbia, in a case where three sentences had been imposed, says: "The relator appears to be imprisoned for three several terms of one hundred and eighty days each, without any specification as to the time of beginning or ending of the last two terms of imprisonment. The sentences pronounced by the court do not provide that the periods of imprisonment under these convictions are to commence at any future period, or after the expiration of the period mentioned in the former judgment. This omission is fatal to any imprisonment which exceeds that of a single sentence." There is nothing before this court to show that either of the petitioners moved the court to remit the fines, or that payment of either of the fines has been made; hence the punishment is not a matter for our consideration. The petitioners were committed to jail until the fine was paid, and properly so. The commitment is not a separate punishment; it is simply an incident to it. In the case of Fischer v. Hayes, 6 Fed. Rep. 63, the court said: "It is in this view that it has always been held that where the statute authorizes or prescribes the infliction of a fine as a punishment, either for a contempt of court or for a defined offense, it is lawful for the court inflicting the fine to direct that the parties stand committed until the fine be paid, although there be no specific affirmative grant of power in the statute to make such direction." It is not necessary in this case, nor does the court intend, to construe section 665, Comp. Laws, with a view of determining the power of the legislature to limit the courts in assessing a fine for contempt, nor whether the fine provided for would be the extent of punishment. The court in this case observed the limit of the statute in assessing the fine for each contempt; and, while assessing fines in the same action for four distinct contempt may be irregular except as to the first, as the fines were separate it cannot avail the petitioners prior to the payment of the valid fine and costs.

The objection of want of jurisdiction in vacation is not well taken. By section 1829, Comp. Laws, the courts of this territory are always open, and their jurisdiction is comprehensive enough to include proceedings in contempt. The prayer of the writ of habeas corpus will be denied, and the petitioners will be remanded to the custody of the officer.

FREEMAN and LEE, JJ., concur.

FREEMAN, J. I concur in the conclusions reached in this cause by a majority of the court, and, in the main, with the reasons assigned. In view, however, of the importance attached to the questions involved, I have thought it not improper to place on file my own views.

This is an application on the part of the relators to be discharged from what they allege to be an unlawful restraint on their liberty. They incorporate as a part of their petition a part of the record of the proceedings in the district court, which culminated in the commitment from which they seek to be discharged. The other part of the record has been filed by the counsel for the territory. The record as thus made up exhibits, substantially, the following state of facts: The relators, who were on and preceding the 4th day of November, 1890, county commissioners for the county of Santa Fe, territory of New Mexico, were charged by law with the performance of certain duties. They are required to give notice of elections; to appoint for each precinct three persons of "discretion and good character" to act as judges; within six days after the election, public notice having been given, they are required to examine and count the votes polled for each candidate. I shall have occasion hereafter to note the extent of the power conferred by the term "examine and count the vote." They are also required to supply each precinct with a ballot-box, with lock and key; to forward within 10 days to the secretary of the territory a "true extract of the votes polled." The failure through "culpable neglect" to have poll-books forwarded to the election precincts, or a failure to count the votes at a proper time, subjects them to a fine of not more than $25, nor less than $10. If they shall give false or fraudulent certificates, or maliciously throw out any returns sufficiently legal, "or shall substitute false returns for true ones, or prevent the popular vote being had, or shall be guilty of such frauds," they shall pay a fine of not exceeding $500, nor less than $200. They are to give to the person receiving the greatest number of votes a certificate of election. "Every commissioner who shall knowingly, ignorantly, or maliciously fail to comply with the duties imposed upon him by law and the provisions of this act, and who shall fail to count the votes at the time and place designated by law, or in any manner misrepresent the popular vote, or shall prevent or order the judges of election not to certify, or refuse to keep open a poll-book for the information of the public, at the courthouse, from the time the said poll-book shall be delivered to them until the day of examination of the same, and for the counting of the votes, or in any other manner shall prevent the obtaining of the legal vote of the people, or shall refuse to allow any candidate or citizen to examine the said poll-book so placed for inspection, or shall give any false or fraudulent certificate, shall on conviction be fined in any sum not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, and shall be imprisoned in the county jail for not less than six months, nor more than one year; and, further, he shall be forever disqualified from holding any office of profit or honor in this territory." Comp. Laws § 1205. It is also provided that the district judge may, on the presentation of any one who may desire to do so, make a summary investigation of the charge of misconduct on the part of the commissioner, and, if he shall find him guilty, he shall suspend him from office until final decision at the next term of the district court. Section 1206, Comp. Laws.

Were it not for the disclosure made by the record in this cause, I should deem it unnecessary to say that the sole purpose of the legislature in the enactment of the statutes to which I have adverted was to secure a free, fair, and honest expression of the people at the polls. And aside from the discussion which has grown out of this case, and confining ourselves alone to the provisions of the law, it seems to me that the sole purpose of the legislature in providing for a board of canvassers was to secure that end. Whatever is honestly and intelligently done by a commissioner under the law to secure a free, fair, honest, and full expression of the popular will is done in the line of his duty. Whatever is done either "knowingly, ignorantly, or maliciously," to prevent that end, is a willful, ignorant, or malicious violation of the law, and merits the condemnation of all good citizens, and the punishment prescribed by law. The absolute necessity for the preservation of the freedom of elections and the purity of the ballot is so apparent as to admit of no discussion. It would be an idle waste of time to undertake to demonstrate that, in a government like ours, the line that marks the distinction between law and lawlessness, government and anarchy, is drawn at the ballot-box; and he who undertakes to obstruct a free expression of public sentiment at the polls is an enemy to society and a public criminal. Nor does it palliate the offense that the obstruction is interposed under the color of authority. The desperate revolutionist who by force of arms undertakes to prevent the expression of popular will through the ballot-box may be a bolder man, but he is none the more a criminal, than the man who under color of office seeks to do the same act. There is another point equally well settled, though possibly not so well understood, and that is that in the discharge of the duty imposed upon the commissioners to "examine and count the votes" they act in a purely ministerial capacity.

Whatever judicial function or discretion they may possess is exhausted in the selection of "discreet and honest judges of election." The vote having been cast, they have nothing to do but to examine and count it. When the examination reaches the point of disclosing the fact that the vote under consideration was actually cast, it must be counted. Mr. Associate Justice BRISTOL, in the case of Bull v. Southwick, 2 N. M. 353, said: "As such board of canvassers, they assumed judicial power to pass upon the illegality of, and reject, votes, without any other ceremony than because parties and by-standers challenge them as illegal. In this way hundreds of votes were thrown out, and the result of the election thereby arbitrarily changed. This is but another illustration of what experience has long since demonstrated, which is that if such judicial powers should be conferred upon mere canvassing boards, to be exercised at the close of a hotly-contested election, in the absence of the real parties interested, and almost always with the partisan advisers of such boards in the background, their sittings would be marked by the exercise of arbitrary power that would be more aggressive and odious than that of the ancient court of Star Chamber." This case was heard and decided in 1882. It thus appears that, even prior to the passage of the act of the legislature to which I am about to refer, the doctrine that the county commissioners sitting as a board of canvassers were mere ministerial officers, clothed with no judicial discretion, was firmly settled by judicial construction in this territory. In order, however, to remove any doubt that might exist, and to put at rest any and all vexatious questions that might arise before such boards of canvassers, the legislature, at its twenty-eighth session, passed an act, the thirteenth section of which is as follows: "Sec. 13. That the board of county commissioners, sitting as a canvassing board for the purpose of canvassing the returns of any election hereafter held in this territory, shall not adjourn or become functus officio as a canvassing board until such board of commissioners shall have canvassed each and every return of election before them, and shall have declared the result from the face of such returns; and if any board of county commissioners, sitting as a canvassing board, shall fail, neglect, or refuse to canvass any return of any election before said board under any pretense that such return is irregular, or for any other pretense, it shall be lawful for any qualified voter to present his petition under oath to the judge of the district court having jurisdiction, at his chambers, briefly setting forth the facts and circumstances, and praying that such board of commissioners shall be required by a writ of mandamus, issuing out of such court, to count and certify such returns; and therefore it shall be the duty of the district judge to immediately issue, or cause to be issued, his alternative writ of mandamus requiring such commissioners either to canvass such return or returns and to declare the result, or to appear in person forthwith before such court, and bring with them all of such returns; and, if such commissioners shall decline to canvass such return or returns, they shall appear before said court in obedience to such writ, and take with them all of the returns, or papers purporting to be returns, before them; and thereupon the court shall forthwith proceed to examine said returns, and upon such examination may issue his peremptory writ commanding said board of commissioners to immediately canvass any or all of such returns, and to declare the result." Sess. Laws 1889, p. 321. This law went into effect February 28, 1889. The section of the statute which I have quoted seems to me to be too plain to admit of construction. Let us analyze it, for a moment, in order to see if it contains any provision that can by any possibility be misunderstood. First. The board shall not adjourn until it has canvassed each and every return before it, and shall have declared the result. Second. If it shall fail, neglect, or refuse to canvass any return under any pretense that such return is irregular, or for any other pretense, any qualified voter may present his petition to the district judge praying that such board may be required by writ of mandamus to count and certify such returns. What returns? Why, the returns that said board, under some pretense, have failed or refused to canvass. Third. The district judge is then required immediately to issue his alternative writ requiring the board to either canvass such returns and declare the result, or to appear before him in person forthwith, and bring with them all such returns. The judge is to issue his mandamus immediately, and the commissioners are to appear forthwith. No provision is made for waiting for the regular term of the court. Fourth. If the commissioners decline to canvass such returns, they shall, in obedience to the writ, i. e., forthwith, appear before the judge, and bring with them—what? Bring with them what they in their judgment regard as the proper, legal, and regular returns? No. This is not what they are to be ordered to do, but to bring with them all the returns, "or papers purporting to be returns." Fifth. Having done this,—having, in obedience to the writ, appeared in person before the judge, and having produced not only all the returns, but each and every paper purporting to be a return,—their power, authority, and responsibility practically cease. For, sixth, immediately on the production of such papers, the judge himself shall proceed to examine them; and his judgment, so far as the commissioners are concerned, is absolutely conclusive. For, seventh, the judge is required, as a result of his examination, to issue a peremptory writ commanding said board to canvass any or all of such returns, and declare the result. That is to say, the judge is required to examine all of the papers, and to declare what are and what are not proper returns, and to direct the board to declare the result.

cretion, ministerial, judicial, or otherwise, vested in the commissioners as a board of canvassers ceases the moment they appear before the judge in response to the alternative writ. They are not merely his subordinates. They no longer constitute any part of the board, so far as relates to any question growing out of the validity or invalidity of the papers filed with them as returns, or as papers purporting to be returns. Any effort on their part thereafter to impress their views upon the result is not merely contempt of court, but a plain and culpable usurpation of authority. It is no answer to say that a mandate of a judge directing the board to canvass certain returns, thereby declaring the election of a particular candidate, is an unwarranted invasion of the legislative by the judicial branch of the government. This is not true in fact, and for three reasons. In the first place, the legislature is the sole judge of the election, qualification, and return of its own members. It may seat a member with or without a certificate of election. If it should appear to that body that a member having a certificate issued to him by the board of canvassers, as a result either of their own examination or that of the judge, was not in fact elected, it would be its duty to deny him the privileges of a member. In the second place, the relation of county commissioners is as foreign to the legislature as that of the judge. The district judge belongs to the judiciary, and the county commissioners to the executive or administrative, branch of the government. Each, to a certain extent, is independent of the other, and the legislative branch is absolutely independent of both. In the third place, the legislative branch of the government, being independent of both the judiciary and administrative branches, has a perfect right to vest the power of canvassing the returns of an election in any officer it may choose, either executive or judicial, or to create an office especially clothed with that power. As we have seen, it has clothed certain administrative officers, to-wit, county commissioners, with this power, to be exercised in the first instance, and, following the usual line of remedial jurisdiction in other matters, it has vested in the judiciary a supervising or controlling power. Such being the law as I understand it, I shall endeavor to apply it to the facts in this case.

On the 12th day of November, 1890, there was issued out of the district court of the county of Santa Fe a writ of mandamus directed to the county commissioners, the relators in this case. This alternative writ, after reciting that it was issued on the petition of Benjamin M. Read, "a resident and qualified voter of said county," proceeds to set out the charges, which are substantially as follows: That the board of commissioners had failed, neglected, and refused to canvass the returns from precincts numbered 1, 2, 16, and 8, and also that they had refused to canvass four votes cast for petitioner at precinct No. 11. The writ concluded as follows. "Now, therefore, you are hereby required either to canvass such returns, including said certificate from precinct number eight of said county, and also to canvass and count the said four votes polled in precinct number 11 of said county, which are marked 'Not registered' upon the poll-books of said precinct, and declare the result, or to appear in person forthwith before said district court, and bring with you all of said returns, and all of the returns, or papers purporting to be returns, before you." On the 13th day of the same month the respondents appeared and filed their answer, which, after setting out in detail the alleged irregularities which, in the opinion of the board, required them to reject and to refuse to canvass certain returns therein described, concludes as follows: "Your respondents, therefore, in obedience to the requirements of said alternative writ of mandamus, appear before your honor all such returns or papers purporting to be returns before you." It is not pretended that the proceedings thus far were not in strict accord with the act of the legislature already quoted. On the issue thus joined, the cause was heard by the district judge, and a peremptory writ of mandamus awarded. To this ruling of the court respondents tendered a bill of exceptions, which was duly signed and sealed. On the same day that the alternative writ of mandamus was issued a petition was filed on the equity side of said court by the said Benjamin M. Read and by Joseph B. Mayo and Thomas B. Catron against the said commissioners, averring, substantially, that complainants were, at the election held on the 4th of said month, candidates for seats in the legislative assembly of said territory; that defendants constituted the board of canvassers, whose duty it was to canvass the votes polled at said election in said county of Santa Fe; that said commissioners had assembled at the court-house in said county, "but have failed, neglected, and refused to count a portion of the votes polled at said election for these complainants," etc.; that said refusal would materially affect the result of said election, and would make it appear that persons other than complainants had been elected; that said commissioners were threatening to give certificates of election to other parties, etc. They asked that an injunction issue restraining the commissioners from issuing certificates of election to others than complainants. An injunction was issued in accordance with the prayer of the bill. On the 5th of December, 1890, defendants answered. They admit that complainants were candidates at said election, but deny that they received a majority of the votes cast. They then set out what they deemed various irregularities in the returns of precincts 1, 2, 8, 11, and 16; that these returns were not in regular and perfect condition, etc.; that they met, and proceeded to canvass the returns; that, while so doing, "the complainants, well knowing the irregularities, fraud, and deceit appearing in some precincts, and the illegal and insufficient manner and condition of the pretended and alleged returns before said defendants as such canvassing board, and that the said pretended and alleged returns were so irregular and insufficient that the said board could not receive and count them, they, (the complainants,) in anticipation of their decision as such board of canvassers, filed a bill in chancery, and obtained an injunction issued out of this honorable court, by which they were restrained and enjoined from making and completing the count and canvass of all the votes cast in said election, according to the returns made to them as such board. And these defendants deny that the pretended returns made to them as a canvassing board of precincts in said county numbered 1, 2, 8, 11, and 16 were in regular and perfect condition, but they aver and state to the court here that the alleged returns before them from precincts 1, 2, and 16 were irregular, and contrary to law and the statutes in such case made and provided; and that the face of the returns from precinct 11 was regular, and was so counted, when reached by the board in the regular order. But there was never at any time any poll-book, ballot-box, or returns of any kind before these defendants, as a canvassing board or otherwise, from said precinct numbered 8 in said county; that there was not at any time evidence before them that an election had been held at precinct number eight on the 4th day of November, 1890," etc. They deny that they had failed to count any votes "properly returned;" deny that they threaten to give certificates to persons "who did not receive the greatest number of votes," etc. They admit that "a certain paper purporting to be a certificate of election returns signed by four persons, two of whom signed as judges of election, and two as secretaries or clerks of election, in precinct numbered 8 in said county, was presented to the defendants while sitting as a board of canvassers by one of the complainants, Benjamin M. Read, who was a candidate as aforesaid, and an interested party in the result of the canvass and count, and who was not authorized by law to act as messenger or custodian of the election returns; and they aver that the said purported certificate or paper is irregular in form, insufficient in law, does not contain a true and correct statement of the votes cast and polled at said precinct No. 8 on the 4th day of November, 1890, and that said alleged certificate, if canvassed and counted, would change the election returns, and would have the effect of giving majorities to persons who were not elected by a majority of the votes cast at said election; that said alleged certificate gives majorities from four to eleven greater than the actual vote as it was cast, polled, and counted, and certified by the judges of election, as these defendants are informed and believe." They then allege on information and belief that said certificate was made at Santa Fe, and under the supervision of interested parties, etc., and by parties who never saw the original certificate made out and signed by the judges of election, if any such original certificate was ever so made out and signed. "That one of the persons who signed said paper as an election judge did so at the request of some person who came from Santa Fe, with the paper already filled out to be signed, and seven days after his official position as judge of the election had expired." The contradictory statements contained in this answer, of themselves convict the board of an attempt to suppress the popular vote and defeat the will of the people; for while, in one part of the answer, they charge that there was not at any time evidence before them of any election at precinct No. 8, they nevertheless admit in another portion of the answer that a paper purporting to be a return from said precinct, signed by two judges of election and two clerks, had been filed with them; but they allege that said "purported certificate" did not contain a true and correct statement of the votes polled at said precinct. How did they know that "purported certificate" did not contain a true statement of the votes polled, if they had never had before them any evidence that any such election had been had? Having answered, they demurred to the bill, setting out six causes of demurrer, substantially as follows; First, the court has no jurisdiction of the parties; second, because the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy; third, because the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matters and the persons; fourth, the bill does not state facts sufficient upon which to base an action; fifth, complainants have no common interest; sixth, that the bill is multifarious. This answer, in the nature of a demurrer, was filed on December 5th, and on the same day a motion was filed to dissolve the injunction. On the 17th day of January, 1891, one of the complainants filed in the cause an affidavit reciting that defendants, in violation of the injunction; had on the 5th day of December, 1890, issued certificates, etc.; and thereupon a writ of attachment was issued. The parties were arrested, and on January 19th appeared and filed a motion to quash the attachment. The grounds of this motion were substantially as follows: First, the judge had no power in vacation to issue the attachment; second, because the judge had no power, jurisdiction, nor authority to institute proceedings for contempt; third, the judge had no power to issue an injunction to prevent the board of canvassers from issuing certificates; fourth, the judge had no power to issue an injunction, which was therefore void; fifth, because no order to show cause had preceded the writ of attachment; sixth, because the rules and regulations of the chancery court were not observed in the issuance of the writ of attachment. On the 20th of January, an order was entered by the district judge reciting that upon a hearing of the parties, and upon the full consideration of the cause, he had found the parties guilty of four several acts of contempt, and imposing a fine of $50 upon them for each of the alleged acts of contempt. They were adjudged guilty of contempt, and an order of commitment was entered against them in the event that the fines were not promptly paid.

That we may have a proper conception of the relation sustained to each other by the two proceedings of mandamus and injunction, it may not be improper to note the order in which the several steps were taken. Both writs were applied for and issued on the same day, to-wit, November 12, 1890. On the 13th of the same month defendants answered the alternative writ of mandamus, and on the 18th a peremptory writ was issued. On the 5th of December defendants filed their answer to the bill for injunction, and also moved to dissolve the same, and on the same day they proceeded, in direct violation of its terms, to issue certificates of election.

I shall not consume time in discussing the question as to the jurisdiction of the court to issue the writ of mandamus. The act of February 28, 1889, confers the power in express terms. Not only so, but the facts in this case, in their minutest detail, bring it within the express terms of the statute. Every requirement of the statute, save one, was met. The complaint was made; the alternative writ was issued; the respondents appeared and produced the returns; the judge examined them; the peremptory writ was issued. At this point, however, obedience to law was abandoned. The respondents, the relators here, thinking, no doubt honestly, that they were better qualified to take care of the public interests than the legislature, determined to defy the law. It is trifling with the occasion to treat the conduct of these relators as a contempt of court. It was a contempt of law. It would be an unwarrantable reflection upon their intelligence to say that they did not understand their duty in the premises. It was not a matter of mistake. It would be a reflection on the voters of the county to suggest that three men too ignorant to understand the thirteenth section of the act of February 28, 1889, could be elected to the office of county commissioner. But, conceding the jurisdiction to issue the mandamus, it is insisted that the court had no authority to issue the injunction; that the act of 1889, imposing on the judge the duty of issuing the mandamus, is an implied denial of his authority to proceed by any other method; and the familiar doctrine that expressio unius est exclusio alterius is invoked to sustain this view. Opposed to this, however, is the equally familiar doctrine that, when power is conferred on a court to do any particular thing, there is, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, an implied grant of power to issue such process as may be necessary to carry into execution the power conferred. This is especially true of courts of common-law and chancery jurisdiction; and section 1868 of the organic act provides that "the supreme court and district courts, respectively, of every territory, shall possess chancery, as well as common-law, jurisdiction."

But there is another reason that to my mind is conclusive of this question. It is well settled that the two processes, mandamus and injunction, are correlative in their character and operation. As a rule, whenever a court will interpose by mandamus to compel the performance of a duty, it will exercise its restraining power to prevent a corresponding violation of duty. The supreme court of the United States has declared: "But it has been well settled that when a plain, official duty, requiring no exercise of discretion, is to be performed, and performance is refused, any person who has sustained personal injury by such refusal may have a mandamus to compel its performance; and, when such duty is threatened to be violated by some positive official act, any person who will sustain personal injury thereby, for which an adequate compensation cannot be had at law, may have an injunction to prevent it. In such cases the writs of mandamus and injunction are somewhat correlative to each other." Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. S. 541; High, Extr. Rem. § 6. Even under the common law as it existed in England at a time when the writ of mandamus issued only as a prerogative writ, and before it became what it now is,—a writ of right, issuing ex debito iustitiæ,—it exercised a restraining, as well as a coercive, power. Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 192. The injunction was purely ancillary to the mandamus. The relation which the former writ sustained to the latter was precisely that of an attachment sued out in aid of a common-law action of debt. The purpose, and only purpose, was to preserve the status quo pending the determination of the question raised by the proceeding by mandamus. There was, in fact, but one cause of action, and, in law, practically but one suit. If the petitioners were not entitled to an injunction, they were unquestionably not entitled to mandamus. The purpose of the mandamus was to compel the commissioners to do that which could be done only as a prerequisite to the issuance of a certificate of election. Under the law, they were first to canvass the vote and declare the result, and afterwards to issue a certificate of election. To say that, while they might be compelled by mandamus to canvass the return, they could not be restrained from issuing a certificate, predicated upon a result reached in defiance of the mandamus, is to announce a solecism. In the view that I have taken of the matter, the proceeding by injunction was unnecessary. Pending the proceeding by mandamus, the board had no authority to issue a certificate of election. A peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the commissioners to canvass the votes cast at an election is, ex vi termini, a command to them to do nothing that will defeat the purposes of the writ. It was the duty of the board to obey the writ, not alone in its substance, but in its spirit. High, Extr. Rem. § 566. Hence it follows that the issuance of the certificate pending the operation of the writ of mandamus was a violation of its terms, and warranted the imposition of a fine for contempt. Granting, however, that an injunction was unnecessary, it does not rest with the relators in this proceeding to say that the court was unnecessarily specific in its directions to them. If, in good faith, they had obeyed the mandamus, I am inclined to the opinion that they would have been entitled to their costs as to the injunction; but the effort to escape the penalty incurred by gross and willful violation of law, by showing that the proceedings of the court were irregular, or that its processes were unnecessarily specific, does not commend itself to the favorable consideration of the court.

It is further insisted, however, that the whole proceeding before the district judge was void for the reasons—First, that the rival candidates for the legislature should have been remitted to their right of contest; and, second, because the interposition of the court was unwarranted interference on the part of the judicial with the legislative branch of the government. This proposition has been urged with commendable zeal, and with great ability. The learned counsel for the relators have exhibited great research in the production of authorities to sustain their views. They have insisted that, if the courts can interpose by mandamus or injunction to control elections, they may curtail, if not destroy, the powers vested in the other branches of the government; and numerous authorities have been cited to sustain this view. The case of relators does not raise this question. So far from being enjoined against the discharge of their duty, they were required by the mandamus to perform their duty. So far from the action of the judge being an infringement on the prerogatives of the legislature, he was himself acting under the mandate of an act of the legislature. I should not deem it necessary or proper, in view of the act of the legislature I have already quoted, to discuss the question as to the authority of the court to interpose its mandamus, but for the earnestness with which the counsel for the relators have insisted that the action of the judge was a usurpation, and therefore void. I shall briefly review some of the authorities cited as sustaining the position of relators' counsel.

In the case of Railroad Co. v. De Graff, 27 Minn. 1, 6 N. W. Rep. 341, it was sought to enjoin the governor of the state from the performance of certain duties imposed upon him by the legislature. It was held that this could not be done. It is true that the judge, in rendering the opinion of the court, states very broadly that under the constitution of that state the courts are powerless to interfere with the operations of any officer of the executive department, whether the action sought to be controlled was ministerial merely, or one involving the exercise of "discretion and judgment alone." Whether the general principle stated be correct or otherwise, the facts in the case warranted the conclusion reached. No such authority was sought to be exercised in the case at bar. In the case of Walton v. Develing, 61 Ill. 201, the syllabus is as follows: "Where the law authorizes an election to be called in a township, to determine whether a majority are in favor of subscribing to the stock of a railroad company, when the election is called in pursuance of the requirements of the law, a court of equity has no power to restrain the officers from holding, or the people from voting at, such election. A writ of injunction issued in such case is void, and the officers and people are not bound to obey it, as the court has no jurisdiction." In the case of Harris v. Schryock, 82 Ill. 119, it was said: "But, according to repeated decisions of this court, the power to hold an election is political, and not judicial; hence a court of equity has no power to restrain officers from the exercise of such powers." In the same state, in the case of Dickey v. Reed, 78 Ill. 271, the court repeats the same doctrine, declaring that "elections belong to the political branch of the government, and are beyond the control of the judicial power." * * * And the political power of the state may organize municipal bodies, and put them into operation, by force of enactment, or by election of the people to be thus governed, and they can provide the modes of reviewing the returns of election to ascertain whether they are in accordance with the expressed will of the people, and, until the courts are empowered by the constitution or legislative enactment, they must refrain from interference."

I have thus referred to what seemed to the counsel for relators as the most direct authorities in support of their position for the purpose of showing that they are not either directly or by implication assailed by the views that I have advanced. In the case at bar, the election had been held, the vote had been cast, and the alleged interference on the part of the judge was in the exercise of a duty imposed on him by the very authority that created the board of commissioners. In the language of the decision last quoted, he was empowered to act by "legislative enactment." It was not, therefore, a case of interference on the part of the judiciary with the right of election, but of open and avowed revolt on the part of the commissioners against the organized government of the territory. The true doctrine, under our form of government, is this: Every qualified voter has the right to cast his vote and have it counted. When the legislative power has appointed an election, and provided the proper officers for holding it and declaring the result, the courts have no power to interpose by way of preventing the exercise of such function. But no such officer has authority, under color of his office, to defeat the will of the people as expressed at the polls, and, if he undertakes to do so, it is the duty of the courts, on proper application, and within the rules prescribed by the legislature, to interfere by such remedial process as may be necessary to attain the proper remedy. In respect of their purely ministerial duties, election officers are not beyond the control of the courts. Cooley, Const. Lim. 621; High, Extr. Rem. § 56.

A question was raised in the argument as to the right of the judge to enter the judgment complained of at chambers. The authority to do so is conferred in such specific terms by section 1829 of the Compiled Laws that the mere reference to that section is regarded as sufficient answer to this objection. It was also insisted on the argument that under the provisions of section 665 of the Compiled Laws the judge had no authority to impose a fine in excess of $50 without a trial by jury. The several acts and omissions on the part of the relators constituted, in my opinion, but one offense. I think the mode adopted in fixing the amount of the fine was irregular, but it is an irregularity that cannot be taken advantage of in this proceeding. But I do not agree with the learned counsel for the relators that the section referred to was intended to operate as a limitation upon the right of a judge to impose a fine for a contempt of court committed in a refusal to obey one of its mandates. On the contrary, I am satisfied that this statute relates alone to the preservation of order and decorum in the presence of the court.

I must say that, in the view I take of this cause, the discussion has taken a much wider range than was pertinent to what I conceive to be the only issue involved. Section 13 of the act of February 28, 1889, unquestionably gives the district judge jurisdiction of the controversy out of which the proceedings for contempt arose. Section 2027 of the Compiled Laws of 1884 requires this court to forthwith remand the relators, if it should appear that they are detained in custody for any contempt, specially and plainly charged in the commitment, by some court, officer, or body having the authority to so commit for the contempt so charged. All of this appears on the face of the petition, and I think, therefore, that the motion to dismiss the writ, and remand the relators, is well taken, and should be allowed.

O'BRIEN, C. J., (dissenting.) To my mind, it is clear that two errors, at least, fatal to the validity of the commitment of the relators, appear upon the record of these proceedings. First, that the court had no jurisdiction, in the first instance, to issue the writ of injunction; second, that the judgment upon the hearing, touching the violation of the injunctive order, imposing a fine of $200 on each of the relators, and ordering their imprisonment until such fine be paid, is illegal and of no binding validity. For the purpose of a proper understanding of the case, the bill of complaint, the writ of injunction, judgment on attachment, and commitment are set out in extenso:

"In the district court of Santa Fe county. Bill for injunction. Territory of New Mexico, county of Santa Fe—ss.: In the district court for the said county of Santa Fe, sitting for the trial of causes arising under the laws of said territory. To the Honorable EDWARD P. SEEDS, associate justice of the supreme court of said territory, and judge of the said district court: Benjamin M. Read, Joseph B. Mayo, and Thomas B. Catron, residents of said county, bring this, their bill of complaint against John H. Sloan, George L. Wylls, and Teodoro Martinez, also residents of said county, and show unto your honor: Complainants were candidates at the election held in said county on the fourth day of November, 1890, said Read and Mayo for the offices of members of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of

New Mexico, and said Catron for the office of member of the council of said legislative assembly, and, as such candidates, were voted for by voters of said county, and, as shown by the election returns, received majorities of the votes cast for said offices, respectively. Defendants are the county commissioners of said county, and, as such, are required by law, within six days after an election, to publicly examine and count the votes polled for each candidate, and to forward to the persons who have received the greatest number of votes polled at any election held for members of the house of representatives, the corresponding certificate of election. That defendants have assembled in the courthouse in the county of Santa Fe for the purpose aforesaid, but have failed, neglected, and refused to count a portion of the votes polled at said election for these complainants, such portion being the votes cast for complainants in the precincts of said county numbered 1, 2, 8, 11, and 16; the returns of election from said precincts being before said defendants, and in regular and perfect condition. The failure and refusal of defendants to count said votes as shown by said returns will materially affect the result of said count so as to make it appear that persons other than complainants have been elected to said offices, although such is not really the fact; and defendants give out and threaten that they will make and deliver, or cause to be made and delivered, to such other persons, certificates showing their election to the offices aforesaid, and complainants believe that they will certainly do so, unless restrained by an order of the court. If such certificates are so made and issued to such other persons, great and irreparable damage may and probably will result to complainants, and each of them, and to the public generally; and the existence of such certificates may and probably will be the cause of numerous suits, and vexatious and expensive litigation, as has heretofore been the case in this territory under similar circumstances. As soon as the said count by the said defendants is completed, complainants will institute, or cause to be instituted, in accordance with the statute, proceedings in mandamus to compel defendants to canvass all of the returns of said election in said county; but before such proceedings can be made effective, and before a complete canvass can be made, defendants will issue, or cause to be issued, such improper and fraudulent certificates of election as hereinbefore described. Complainants therefore pray that defendants be restrained and enjoined by an injunction of this court from making and delivering, or ordering or causing to be made or delivered, any certificate of election to either of the offices hereinbefore mentioned to any person or persons other than these complainants, and from making, or causing to be made, any record of the result of their canvass of said election returns until the further order of the court in the premises. May it please your honor to grant unto complainants the writ of subpoena, under the seal of this honorable court, directed to defendants, John H. Sloan, George L. Wylls, and Teodoro Martinez, commanding them, and each of them, to appear before this court on a day and under a penalty to be therein fixed, then and there to answer unto the premises as fully as if the same were here repeated, and they particularly interrogated thereunto, but not under oath, an answer under oath being hereby expressly waived, and to abide the order or decree of the court in the premises. BENJAMIN M. READ."

"Territory of New Mexico, county of Santa Fe. On this 12th day of November, 1890, personally appeared before me Benjamin M. Read, and made oath that he had read the foregoing bill by him subscribed, and knew the contents thereof, and that the same is true, except as to the matters therein alleged upon information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. Witness my hand, and the seal of the district court of the first judicial district of the territory of New Mexico, the day and year last above written. A. E. WALKER, Clerk of the District Court. [Seal.]"

"The territory of New Mexico to John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez, greeting: Whereas, Benjamin M. Read, Joseph B. Mayo, and Thomas B. Catron have filed in the district court for Santa Fe county their bill of complaint against you, praying to be relieved touching the matters therein set forth, now, therefore, you, the said John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez, both individually and as members of the board of county commissioners of Santa Fe county, your agents, servants, employes, and advisers, are hereby restrained and enjoined from making and delivering, or ordering or causing to be made or delivered, any certificate of election to the offices of members of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of the territory of New Mexico, and of member of the council of said legislative assembly, to any person or persons, other than said Benjamin M. Read, Joseph B. Mayo, and Thomas B. Catron, and from making, or causing to be made, any record of the result of your canvass of the election returns of the election held in said county of Santa Fe on the 4th day of November, 1890, until the further order of the said district court in the premises. Witness the Honorable EDWARD P. SEEDS, associate justice of the supreme court of the territory of New Mexico, and judge of the first judicial district court thereof, and the seal of said district court, this 12th day of November, 1890. A. E. WALKER, Clerk. [Seal.]"

"The territory of New Mexico to the sheriff of Santa Fe county, greeting: You are hereby commanded to arrest and take the body of John H. Sloan, and him safely keep, so that you have his body before the district court within and for the county of Santa Fe, sitting at chambers at the federal building in said county, on Monday, January 19, 1891, at nine o'clock A. M., then and there to answer for a charge of contempt. Witness the Honorable EDWARD P. SEEDS, associate justice of the supreme court of the territory of New Mexico, and judge of the first judicial district court thereof, and the seal of said district court, this 17th day of January, 1891. A. E. WALKER, Clerk. [Seal.]"

"The territory of New Mexico to Francisco Chavez, sheriff of the county of Santa Fe, greeting: Whereas, on the 12th day of November, 1890, an injunction was issued out of the district court of Santa Fe county enjoining and restraining John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez, both individually and as members of the board of county commissioners of said Santa Fe county, their agents, servants, employes, and advisers, from making or delivering, or ordering or causing to be made or delivered, any certificate of election to the offices of members of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of the territory of New Mexico, and of member of the council of said legislative assembly, to any person or persons other than Benjamin M. Read, Joseph B. Mayo, and Thomas B. Catron, and from making, or causing to be made, any record of the result of their canvass of the election returns of the election held in said county of Santa Fe on the 4th day of November, 1890, until the further order of said district court in the premises. And whereas, on the 17th day of January, 1891, there was filed in the office of the clerk of said court the petition of the said Thomas B. Catron, setting forth that the said John H. Sloan and Teodoro Martinez, two of the defendants in said injunction proceeding, wholly disregarding the injunction so issued as aforesaid, did, on the 5th day of December, 1890, sitting as a board of canvassers of said county, canvass the returns of the general election held in said county on the 4th day of November, 1890, and did on said 5th day of December, 1890, make, order, and deliver a certificate of election to the offices of members of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly to persons other than the said Benjamin M. Read, the said Joseph B. Mayo, and the said Thomas B. Catron, to-wit, to one Charles F. Easley, to one Thomas P. Gable, and to one Romulo Martinez; the said Easley and the said Gable receiving certificates of election to the office of member of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly, and the said Romulo Martinez receiving a certificate to the office of member of the council of said legislative assembly; and praying that that court cause attachments to issue for the arrest of the said John H. Sloan and Teodoro Martinez for contempt. Whereupon such proceedings were had by the said court that on January 20, 1891, after attachments had been issued by said court against the said John H. Sloan and Teodoro Martinez, and after the bodies of the said Sloan and the said Martinez had been presented before the said court by you, the said sheriff, they being accompanied by counsel, and after a full hearing of counsel, the said John H. Sloan and Teodoro Martinez were adjudged guilty of contempt of this court in issuing and delivering a certificate of election to Charles F. Easley, in issuing and delivering a certificate of election to Romulo Martinez, and in making, or causing to be made, a record of the result of their canvass of the returns of the election held in said county of Santa Fe on the 4th day of November, 1890, and the punishment of each of said defendants was assessed to a fine of fifty dollars for each of the said several contempts, making a total of two hundred dollars against each of said defendants: Now, therefore, you, the said sheriff of Santa Fe county, are hereby commanded that of the lands and tenements, goods and chattels, of John H. Sloan, in your county, you cause to be made the sum of two hundred dollars fine, and seventeen dollars and forty-five cents costs of suit, which, by the said judgment of the said district court on the 20th day of January, 1891, the territory recovered against the said John H. Sloan, and in default of the prompt payment of the said sum by the said John H. Sloan that you confine the body of the said John H. Sloan in the common jail of said county until said fine and costs are fully paid and satisfied, and due return made of this writ, with your proceedings thereon. Witness the Honorable EDWARD P. SEEDS, associate justice of the supreme court of the territory of New Mexico, and judge of the first judicial district court thereof, and the seal of said district court, this 20th day of January, 1891. A. E. WALKER, Clerk. [Seal.]

It appears, then, that the writ was granted at the suit of T. B. Catron, who claimed to be elected member of the council, and Benjamin M. Read and J. B. Mayo, who claimed to be elected members of the house, in the present general assembly of this territory. They filed their bill before the completion of the official canvass of the votes by the board of county commissioners. Irregularities in returns from some of the precincts may have occurred, or the petitioners may have had reasons to suspect that the board of county commissioners would not make a full and impartial canvass of the votes returned. It may not be amiss to remark, in passing, that the three petitioners, Catron, Read, and Mayo, are, or claim to be, Republicans, and that two of the three county commissioners are Democrats. Partisan zeal may be at the bottom of the trouble. The important question to determine is, had petitioners a right to invoke the aid of a court of chancery to protect them by writ of injunction against the consequences of the possible, probable, or actual dishonesty of the county commissioners in making the official canvass and issuing certificates of election? Plainly, no such right existed if the law intrusted to another tribunal power to apply the proper remedy and offered complete relief. Each house of the legislative assembly is the exclusive judge of the election and qualification of its members. No decree, interlocutory or final, of a court of chancery can affect or impair this power. The judgment or discretion of the legislature cannot be controlled by such decree. Its action in the premises is independent, final, and unassailable. Before it all contests must be decided. We cite the appropriate sections of the Compiled Laws of 1884, as amended by Laws of 1889: "Sec. 1172, (as amended Session Laws 1889, p. 318.) If any candidate from any county or district in this territory contest the seat of any representative or member of the council, said person shall give written notice to the contestee within thirty days after the returns of the election are received by the secretary of the territory. Said notice of contest shall specify as nearly as may be the grounds upon which the contestant relies, and it shall also give the name of some justice of the peace or notary public before whom it is purposed to take proofs in support of the grounds alleged and set forth in such notice, and also the time and place of the taking thereof. Sec. 1173, (as amended Session Laws 1889, p. 318.) The contestees, at the time and place of taking such proofs, may select another justice of the peace or notary public to assist in taking of such proof as he desires; but a failure to do so shall not affect the right of contestant to proceed with his testimony under his notice. Sec. 1174. To reject any illegal votes that may be polled at any election in this territory, it shall not be necessary to contest or question them at the polls, but they may be rejected by the authorities authorized by law to determine the validity of said elections, on being proved, after due notice is given by the party contesting said election to the opposing party. Said notice in any county election shall not be less than eight days, and shall in all cases be within thirty days thereafter. Sec. 1175. If the person whose seat is contested in either branch of the assembly intends to question the illegality of any votes given to the contesting candidates, he shall, within eight days after said contest, give equal notice to the opposite party in the manner prescribed in section 1172. Secs. 1176, 1177, 1178, (as amended Session Laws 1889, p. 318.) If the justice or justices of the peace, notary or notaries, appointed, or any of them, should fall, on account of sickness or other just cause, to be present at the taking of the testimony in such contests, another justice of the peace or justices, notary or notaries, may be chosen by the contestant parties, and the taking of such testimony shall commence within thirty days after the election, and the said justice or justices of the peace, or notary or notaries, shall issue subpoena (s) to all persons required by either party to appear and testify. Said justice or justices of the peace, notary or notaries, shall hear all the testimony, and certify the same to the president of the council, if the seat contested shall be that of a councilman, and to the speaker of the house of representatives, if it be that of a representative, on or before the first day of the session of the legislative assembly. Sec. 1179. No testimony shall be received by the justices, or either branch of the territorial legislature, from either the contesting or opposing parties, unless it refers to the points specified in the notice. The justices of the peace shall forward to the general assembly a certificate, together with the depositions taken by them, and no others, and the legislative assembly shall not receive any other testimony than that already specified."

intended to furnish legislative candidates with adequate means to protect their rights and prevent injustice. The forum therein recognized as adequate to grant complete relief, to detect mistakes and frauds in all stages of the election, from the opening of the polls to the issuing of the certificates, is either house of the general assembly. Why should a court of chancery assume jurisdiction in a proceeding wherein it would be powerless to enforce obedience to its decrees? It has no right to decide who is or who is not elected. The legislature alone has the exclusive power to determine that fact. But, it may be said, it may regulate the intermediate procedure. Why should it? Does not the written law amply provide for the redress of any wrong that may be committed in the course of such procedure? Who has constituted the chancellor's court a more reliable or less partisan tribunal than the council or the house of the general assembly for the rectification and settlement of the frauds or errors incident to popular elections? Once concede to the courts the right to interfere in such proceedings, and who can define the limits of such assumption? In the present case, each of the three petitioners received a certificate of election in accordance with the will of the chancellor, as expressed in the preliminary writ of injunction; but the two members of the house, upon contest had before that body, within a few days after their admission, were expelled, and their seats awarded to other parties. If wrong, can any order or decree entered or to be entered by the chancellor afford a remedy? Will courts take jurisdiction of causes wherein they are powerless to enforce their judgments? It may be said, in answer to this, that the present suit by injunction was simultaneous with and ancillary to mandamus proceedings instituted to compel the county commissioners to receive and canvass the election returns. How does that relieve the matter of its objectionable features, as long as each house of the general assembly has legal power to ignore the adjudications in either case, and to approve or disapprove the alleged misconduct of the commissioners, by awarding seats to the candidates who, in its opinion, were elected and qualified, regardless of the orders and judgments of the court? Are the judicial and legislative departments of the territorial government to be thus encouraged to wage war upon each other's dignity, and bring odium and discredit upon both? Case law, so called, may be found in support of almost any proposition that the vagaries of counsel may advance or invent. But I doubt if the history of legal proceedings furnishes any precedent at all similar to the one under consideration. Some of the facts found in, and many of the legal principles applied to, an authoritative case in Illinois, (Dickey v. Reed, 78 Ill. 261,) ought, in my opinion, to have a controlling influence in the decision in this case. All of the wrongful acts charged to the county commissioners in the bill are properly reviewable in a statutory contest before the council or the house of the general assembly. The law presumes that the decision rendered therein will be just, and hence has made it conclusive. "When the law furnishes," says the supreme court of Illinois in the case cited, "a mode for contesting any election, that mode must be followed." Again: "Courts of equity have no inherent power to try contested elections, and they have never exercised such power except in cases where it has been conferred by express enactment or necessary implication." And: "Injunctions, when issued by a court not having power, need not be obeyed." It is useless to urge that this suit was not instituted to contest an election. The bare perusal of the bill shows that such was its main object, and that the complainants were unwilling to take the requisite statutory steps, and submit their claims to the arbitrament of the only tribunal authorized by law to hear, try, and determine the same. It follows, in my judgment, that the proceedings were coram non Judge and void, and that the relators may not be punished for contempt in disobeying the injunctive order.

The commitment of the relators appears to me to be illegal, also, because the court had no power to inflict as punishment for disobedience of the writ a fine in excess of that prescribed by the statute. Section 665 of the Compiled Laws of New Mexico of 1884 reads as follows: "No judge of the district court shall fine any person for contempt for a want of respect for the court in a sum exceeding fifty dollars without a trial by jury." There is no pretense of a jury trial in this case, and still each of the relators was fined $200 for the violation of this injunction, and ordered to prison until the payment thereof. The trial judge, recognizing the binding force of the statute, discovered that there were four distinct mandates in the writ, and, multiplying the $50 by four,—the number of the acts covered by the restraining agis of the injunction,—he pronounced the multiplied sentence as the judgment of the law. Plainly this was error. The writ must be regarded as a single, indivisible, judicial act, and punishment for its violation ought not to exceed the maximum amount fixed by the statute. Had the judgment ended in the fine alone, perhaps it would be void for the excess only; but, when it consigned the alleged transgressors to the county jail until such fine was fully paid, it deprived the citizen of his liberty, because, perhaps, unable to pay an illegal exaction, and thereby became oppressive and void in toto. The relators might have been able and willing to pay the statutory amount, but unable, though ever so willing, to pay the excessive ransom.

The foregoing remarks embody my views as to the merits of this painful controversy. It follows, in my judgment, as the injunction proceedings were void ab initio, and as the judgment pronounced upon relators in the attachment proceedings to punish them for contempt in violating the commands of the writ was equally void, because rendered in violation of the plain provision of the statute, that the relators are unlawfully restrained of their liberty, and should be unconditionally discharged from imprisonment.

DELGADO v. CHAVEZ, Sheriff.

DISOBEYING MANDAMUS—CONTEMPT—HABEAS CORPUS.

A peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the probate clerk, in his official capacity, to recognize one of two rival sets of claimants for the office of county commissioners, and to refuse recognition to the other, is not void because it incidentally involves the title set up by the rival claimants; and, as the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, the probate clerk, who was imprisoned for contempt in refusing obedience to the mandate, cannot be liberated on habeas corpus. O'BRIEN, C. J., dissenting.

N. F. Laughlin, Francis Downs, H. Burns, and Thomas Smith, for petitioner. John H. Knaebel and E. L. Bartlett, for respondent.

FREEMAN, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff of Santa Fe county, N. M. The petition is very voluminous, and sets out in full a certain proceeding in mandamus instituted against the relator by Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt, on the 13th of January, 1891, seeking to compel the relator, as probate clerk of the county of Santa Fe and ex officio clerk of the board of county commissioners, to perform certain official duties. This is one of the unfortunate proceedings that grew out of the closely-contested election held in the county of Santa Fe on the 4th of November, 1890. Rival sets of county commissioners claim to have been elected. Candidates of both parties held what they claimed to be valid and proper certificates of election. An alternative writ of mandamus was issued against the relator, commanding him to recognize the petitioners to that writ as the legally elected board. In his answer to the writ the relator admitted that he had declined to recognize the petitioners, and sets out at length his views as to who were entitled to exercise the functions of county commissioners. The cause having been heard by the district judge, a peremptory writ was issued. The relator refusing to obey the writ, an attachment was issued, and on the hearing he was committed to jail until he should purge himself of the contempt.

In the case of John H. Sloan and Teodoro Martinez, ante, 930, (heard and determined at the present term of this court,) we have discussed at some length the power of the district judge to issue the writs of mandamus and injunction, and to punish for contempts. Much of what has been said in that case finds appropriate application to this. The case at bar, however, differs from the case of Sloan and Martinez in this: that the latter case involved the right of the district judge to direct the canvassers to canvass the votes cast at the election, while in the present case the question involved is as to the jurisdiction of the court to issue the writ to the probate clerk, directing him which of the two rival boards he should recognize as the lawful body. We have no doubt but that the judge had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties; and this conclusion settles, as we think, the whole question raised by this proceeding.

The writ of mandamus long since ceased to be a prerogative writ. It is no longer an extraordinary proceeding, except in the sense that an injunction, attachment, or other like process is extraordinary. "It is equally well settled that a mandamus in modern practice is nothing more than an action at law between the parties, and is not now regarded as a prerogative writ." Com. v. Dennison, 24 How. 97. It would be a vain and needless exhibition of research to undertake to point out the almost innumerable instances in which this writ has been successfully invoked. The following cases will serve to illustrate the general purposes for which the writ will lie: To compel the allowance of an appeal, (Ex parte Cutting, 94 U. S. 14;) to allow a pension, (Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. 497;) to compel district judge to issue execution, (Postmaster General v. Trigg, 11 Pet. 173;) to compel railroad company to deliver rolling stock, (Ex parte Milwaukee R. Co., 5 Wall. 825;) to compel counties to pay judgments, (Supervisors v. U. S., 4 Wall. 435;) to enforce mandates, (U. S. v. Fossatt, 21 How. 445;) to reinstate cause, (Ex parte Bradstreet, 6 Pet. 774;) to compel levy of tax to pay judgment, (U. S. v. Council of Keokuk, 6 Wall. 514;) to compel court to enter judgment, (Insurance Co. v. Adams, 9 Pet. 573;) to compel court to sign bill of exceptions, (Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 190;) to compel postmaster general to perform ministerial duty, (Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. 524;) to compel register of land-office to enter application for land, (McCluny v. Silliman, 2 Wheat. 369;) to compel court of claims to entertain motion for new trial, (Ex parte Russell, 13 Wall. 664;) to restore an attorney disbarred by court having no jurisdiction, (Ex parte Bradley, 7 Wall. 364;) to compel town officers to audit charges against the town, (Lower v. U. S., 91 U. S. 536.) In Ohio, Alabama, California, Maryland, North Carolina, Indiana, and Montana the writ will lie to compel the governor of the state to perform a merely ministerial duty. High. Extr. Rem. § 119. It has been also successfully invoked to compel an old officer to deliver records which concern justice to the new one; to compel the clerk of a company to deliver up books, etc.; or the steward of a borough to attend with the books at the next corporate assembly, etc. 5 Com. Dig. 34. In the case of Railway Frog Co. v. Haven, 101 Mass. 403, it was said: "It is well settled that it can be granted, for instance, to compel a town-clerk or clerk of the public corporation, whose office has expired, to deliver over to his successor his common seal, books," etc. In the case of Conlin v. Aldrich, 98 Mass. 557, the following facts appeared: The town-meeting had been held at which Conlin was chosen as a member of the school committee for the term of three years; but the polls were open and the election was made after sunset. This election was treated as invalid, and another meeting called, at which Burditt was elected to the same office. The town-clerk gave to Conlin a certificate of his election, but Aldrich and Start, who were the two other members of the committee, refused to recognize him as their associate, or to permit him to act as such; they recognizing Burditt as properly elected. The application of Conlin for a writ of mandamus was allowed; HOAR, J., declaring: "It is not very strongly contested by the respondents that the appropriate remedy for the petitioner, if he is entitled to any relief, is the writ of mandamus. That point is substantially settled by the case of In re Strong, 20 Pick. 484." This case, like the one at bar, presents the condition of rival claimants for the same position. So, also, of the case just cited from 101 Mass., where it was said: "The respondents insist, however, that inasmuch as they are in actual possession of the offices in question under a claim of right, and exercising the functions annexed to them, the only mode of controverting their title is by writ of quo warranto. The fact that the officers are de facto filled and occupied by rival claimants is by no means decisive, and not very material upon this point. It has been so decided in the case of conflicting claims to the office of county commissioner, (In re Strong, 20 Pick. 484;) also in the case of members of a school committee, (Conlin v. Aldrich, 98 Mass. 557.)" In the case of Jennings v. Fisher, 7 Cush. 239, it was said: "This writ, no doubt, is more freely and frequently granted at the present time than it was formerly. It lies to a former town-clerk or clerk of a company to deliver to his successor the common seal, books, papers, and records of the corporation, which belong to his custody. Indeed, it lies to any person who happens to have the books of a corporation in his possession, and refuses to deliver them up. In the case of Kimball v. Lamprey, 19 N. H. 220, GILCHRIST, C. J., said: "There are numerous authorities tending to show in what case a writ of mandamus is the appropriate remedy. In the case of Com. v. Athearn, 3 Mass. 285, it is estimated by PARSONS, C. J., that the proper mode is for the successor of the town-clerk to take the oath of office, and to demand of the former clerk the records, and, if they are refused, then to move for a mandamus to command him to deliver over the records. It was alleged in that case that the defendant was in possession of the office, but was not so legally. In the First Parish in Sudbury v. Stearns, 21 Pick. 148, trover was brought against the defendant for the book of record of the parish. His defense was that he was the clerk, and, as such, had a right to the possession of the records. MORTON, J., says: 'A mandamus would doubtless be a more appropriate and effectual remedy to compel the delivery of the records to the legal officer;' and he cites the case of Com. v. Athearn. The rights of persons acting colore officii can be tried only in an information in the nature of a quo warranto or on a writ of mandamus." To the same effect is the doctrine laid down by the supreme court of Vermont in the case of Stone v. Small, 54 Vt. 498, the syllabus of which is as follows: "(1) Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the old trustees of an incorporated village, attempting to hold over, to deliver to the new board the books, papers, and articles of personal property in their possession belonging to the village, and to prevent their interfering with the new trustees in the exercise of their office. (2) When an act incorporating a village imperatively declares that its trustees shall be annually elected on a certain day, the majority of a meeting called for the purpose of electing such officers has no power to adjourn the meeting without day, in fraud of the law and the minority; and if a legal minority, immediately following such adjournment, reorganizes the meeting and elects trustees, they are entitled to hold their office."

These authorities, we think, demonstrate the fact that although the proceeding by mandamus against the relator involved incidentally, if not directly, the title set up by the rival set of commissioners, the mandamus was not for that reason void. It was resisted, however, by the relator on the ground that it could not be used as a means of contesting the right of the rival claimants to the office. There might be much force in the reasons assigned in support of this doctrine if alleged against the propriety of the proceedings by mandamus; but the mistake of the relator lay in supposing that this objection could be successfully interposed as a justification for a refusal to obey the mandate of the court. There is a marked difference between the utter want of jurisdiction, and an erroneous exercise thereof. The former may be pleaded as a justification for a refusal to obey the order of the court, but the latter cannot. In re Cohen, 5 Cal. 495; Church, Hab. Corp. § 317. In the case of People v. Railroad Co., 76 N. Y. 298, it was said: "The question of the propriety of that order is not now before us; the present appeal being only from the order adjudging the appellants guilty of contempt in not having obeyed the writ." "It is insisted, however, that the mandamus was void for the reason that it was vague and uncertain in its command; that it required the relator, not only to recognize certain parties as entitled to exercise the functions of the office, but that he was also commanded, among other impracticable things, to enter all the past, as well as the future, orders of said board; that the writ, in effect, commanded him to do what was not then, and might never become, his duty." This writ did not, as we understand it, seek to impose on the relator any impracticable or difficult duty. It simply required him to perform his usual and ordinary duties as ex officio clerk to the board. Whatever this board had already done that had not been recorded was to be recorded, and he was to attend from time to time, in the future, to perform his usual functions in the usual way. It is not pretended that it was not in his power to obey the leading and all-important command laid upon him. It is not possible that he could have misapprehended the principal purpose of the writ, which was to direct him to recognize in his official capacity one of the rival sets of claimants, and to refuse to recognize the other. He seems to have misapprehended entirely the functions of his office. He was not authorized by law to determine who were, and who were not, the legally-elected commissioners. That question had already been determined, so far, at least, as to bring his ministerial duties within the jurisdiction of the court. It does not follow, because the court ordered him to do that which in part he could not do, that therefore the writ was void. In the case of U. S. v. Labette Co., 2 McCrary, 27, 7 Fed. Rep. 318, a writ of mandamus was issued to compel the supervisors to levy, collect, and pay over certain taxes. The respondents levied the tax, but returned that they had no power, process, or authority by which they could collect it. A writ of attachment having been issued, they were discharged for the reason that, having done all in their power to obey the writ, they were not guilty of contempt. This question was discussed at some length in People v. Nostrand, 46 N. Y. 378. In that case it was said: "It was also urged upon the argument that the order should be reversed because the precise amount is not specified in the peremptory writ. This position is not tenable. All that is necessary is that the thing to be done should be described with reasonable certainty,—with such certainty that the defendant will know what is required of him. This rule is peculiarly applicable to public officers who are commanded to perform a public duty, and especially where the facts constituting the act are within their personal knowledge." After citing many authorities in support of this view, the court proceeds to say: "These and other authorities establish that it is sufficient to inform public officers in a general way what their duty is, and to command its performance, unless they can justify or excuse the neglect. They cannot shield themselves behind technical objections to the descriptive part of the act to be done."

Numerous other authorities might be cited in support of the general proposition that on an application for a writ of habeas corpus to be discharged from commitment for contempt, it cannot be shown that the proceedings out of which the action for contempt proceeded were irregular. Cooley, Const. Lim. 348, and cases cited. And in support of the proposition that a proceeding by mandamus is not void by reason of mere irregularity, but that it may be good as to part, and bad as to part, we cite: Ex parte Parks, 93 U. S. 18; Ex parte Rowland, 104 U. S. 604; Ex parte Clark, 100 U. S. 399; and Ex parte Siebold, Id. 371. Assuming, however, for the purpose of the argument, that the relator did not properly comprehend the terms of the mandate addressed to him; assuming that, in the presence of rival claimants for the office, he was at a loss to know how he should proceed; assuming that he honestly believed that the petitioners in the mandamus proceeding had not been elected, and were not therefore entitled to exercise the functions of the office,—what, then, was his plain and unmistakable duty? Was it his province to make an issue with a court of competent jurisdiction, and, after having the questions thus presented decided against him, to defy the power of the court? Can he escape now the rightful consequences of his contumacy by pretending that he did not understand what was required of him? On this point the case already referred to in 46 N. Y. is instructive. It was there said, (page 378:) "If he desired in good faith to comply with the writ, but was unable to do so from the uncertainty of the mandate, the court would doubtless relieve him. But in this case there was no room for doubt. The act to be performed was specifically described, and there is no pretense that the appellant did not know what was required, or that he was unable to perform it." In view of these considerations, and in view of the opinion of this court already expressed in the case referred to of Sloan and Martinez, we are of the opinion that the writ must be dismissed, and the relator remanded to the custody of the sheriff to be confined in the county jail until he purges himself of the contempt for which he was committed; and it is so ordered.

O'BRIEN, C. J., (dissenting.) I regret my inability to agree with the disposition made of this case as announced in the foregoing opinion. It would serve no useful purpose to repeat the facts in the brief statement of the reasons that compel me to dissent. In the alternative writ the relator is required to act as follows: "Now, therefore, you, the said Pedro Delgado, probate clerk of the county of Santa Fe, and ex officio clerk of the board of county commissioners of said county, are hereby commanded that, immediately after the receipt of this writ, you produce the books in which are kept the records of meetings and proceedings of the board of county commissioners of Santa Fe county, and to record therein the records of the meetings of said board and the proceedings thereof held on the 2d day of January, 1891, and record in said record of minutes and proceedings the record of minutes and proceedings of all other meetings heretofore had by the board of county commissioners which may not have been recorded in said records, and also record all the proceedings of said board which hereafter may be had, and that in doing so you act as the ex officio clerk of the board of county commissioners, of which said board said Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt are members, and that you act with no other persons whatever pretending or claiming to act as a board of county commissioners of the county of Santa Fe, and that you make regular entries of all their resolutions and decisions in all questions concerning the raising of money, and that you record the vote of each commissioner on any question submitted to the board, if required by any member; that you sign all orders issued by the said board for the payment of money, and record in a book printed for that purpose the receipts of the county treasurer of the receipts and expenditures of the county, and that you do and perform all acts required of you by law as ex officio clerk of the board of county commissioners of Santa Fe county, in connection with said Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt, as the proper and only persons composing the board of county commissioners of Santa Fe county, and that you do recognize the said Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt as the only lawful county commissioners of Santa Fe county, and as composing the only lawful board of county commissioners of said county, and that you do furnish to said board all the books, records, files, and papers of your said office for their use, inspection, information, and government in the discharge of their duties as the board of county commissioners of said county, and that you do not furnish them to any other person or persons except as the law may require you to do for the inspection and information of private individuals, or that you show cause, before the first judicial district court of the territory of New Mexico in and for the county of Santa Fe, at chambers, in the federal building in the city of Santa Fe, N. M., on Wednesday, January 14, 1891, at 9 o'clock A. M., why you have not done so," etc.

On the return-day of the writ, the relator, Delgado, appeared and filed his answer thereto, as follows: "Territory of New Mexico, county of Santa Fe. In the district court of Santa Fe county. The territory of New Mexico, on the relation of Abraham Staab and others v. Pedro Delgado. Mandamus. No. 2,838. The above-named defendant, Pedro Delgado, now and at all times hereafter reserving unto himself all manner of objections and exceptions to the many uncertainties, imperfections, and insufficiencies in the alternative writ of mandamus issued in the above-named cause, for answer thereto, or so much thereof as he is informed and advised that is necessary for him to make answer unto, answers and says that he admits that at the general election held in the said county of Santa Fe on the 4th day of November, 1890, he, the said defendant, was duly elected clerk of the probate court of the said county, and that on the 1st day of January, 1891, he duly qualified as such clerk, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of such office, and that he has continuously since said last-mentioned date been in the possession of such office, and has been ex officio clerk of the board of county commissioners of said county, and has had and held possession of the records and books, which by law he is made the custodian of. Said defendant admits that in the month of November, 1890, and for a long time prior thereto, and until the 1st day of January, 1891, George L. Wyllys, Teodoro Martinez, and John H. Sloan were the legally-elected and lawfully-acting members of the board of county commissioners of the county of Santa Fe, in said territory; but he denies that the said Wyllys and Martinez, or either of them, were ever removed from their said offices, or that the office held by either of said persons became vacant prior to the expiration of their terms, to-wit, on the 1st day of January, 1891; and he denies that either of the said persons abandoned their said offices, or that they, or either of them, refused to perform the duties and functions thereof; and he denies that George W. North and Frederic Grace, or any other persons, were ever legally appointed by the acting governor of the territory of New Mexico, or any other person, as members of the board of county commissioners of said county; and he denies that said George W. North and Frederic Grace, or either of them, were ever members of the board of county commissioners of said county, or that they, or either of them, ever had any power or authority to perform the duties or exercise the functions of said offices. And this defendant avers the fact to be that on the 4th day of November, 1890, and for many months prior thereto, and continuously until the 1st day of January, 1891, John H. Sloan, George L. Wyllys, and Teodoro Martinez were the duly elected and qualified members of the board of county commissioners in and for the county of Santa Fe, in said territory, and that they, each and all of them, continued to hold such office, and were in the actual possession thereof, and performing all the duties and functions of such offices, during all of the year 1890, and until the 1st day of January, 1891. This defendant denies that at the election held in the county of Santa Fe on the 4th day of November, 1890, Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt, or either of them, were elected as members of the board of county commissioners of said Santa Fe county; and he denies that the said Staab, Garcia, and Nesbitt ever obtained, or that they now have or hold, any certificates showing that they, or either of them, was at said election elected as members of the board of commissioners of said county; and said defendant also denies that the said Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt, or either of them, have ever qualified as members of said board of commissioners; and he denies that the said Staab, Garcia, and Nesbitt, or either of them, have, by virtue of any such election, had or held possession of the office of a member of the board of county commissioners of said county, or that they, or either of them, have held any session as members of said board of county commissioners by virtue of such election, nor have they, or either of them, by virtue of such election performed any of the duties pertaining to such office; but he alleges the fact to be that at the general election held in and for said county of Santa Fe, in said territory, on the 4th day of November, 1890, George L. Wyllys, Charles M. Creamer, and Eugenio Martinez were each duly elected as members of the board of commissioners in and for the county of Santa Fe, and territory of New Mexico, the said Wyllys, Creamer, and Martinez receiving at said election the greatest number of legal votes cast at said election in said county for said offices of county commissioners for said county, and after said election returns thereof were made as required by law, and the board of county commissioners then in office for said county met as a canvassing board of election for said county, and duly counted and canvassed all the votes cast in the several precincts in said county at said election, returns of which were before said board, and after counting and canvassing said votes and returns, the said board of commissioners, as such canvassing board, ascertained that the said George L. Wylls, Charles M. Creamer, and Eugenio Martinez had been and were duly elected as members of the board of county commissioners for said county of Santa Fe at said election, all of which was duly entered of record; and thereupon said board of commissioners, as such canvassing board, issued under their hands and the seal of said board certificates to said Wylls, Creamer, and Martinez, setting forth that they had been duly elected at said election as members of the board of county commissioners of said county of Santa Fe, which said certificates were duly attested by the probate clerk of said county; and afterwards, to-wit, on the 1st day of January, 1891, the said Charles M. Creamer and Eugenio Martinez, each having duly qualified as members of the board of county commissioners of said county of Santa Fe, they entered into possession of, and assumed the duties of, their said offices, and met together in the courthouse of said county, in the city of Santa Fe, as the board of county commissioners of said county, and proceeded to transact business as such, and the said Creamer and Martinez have continuously from said 1st day of January, 1891, had and held possession of said offices, and at the present time, and at the date of the issuing of the alternative writ of mandamus in this action, the said Creamer and Martinez were and are holding and are in the possession of said offices, and are now, and have at all times since the 1st day of January, 1891, been, the legal, acting members of the board for the said county of Santa Fe, and have during all of said time been transacting the public business of said county as such commissioners. Said defendant states that he is not informed as to what acts or proceedings were done or had by one Frederic Grace and one George W. North, pretending to act as members of the board of county commissioners in reference to the counting and canvassing the returns of election of the general election held in said county on the 4th day of November, 1890, but he states whatever they may have done in that respect was wholly illegal, and of no effect, for said Grace and North were not, at the time of their said pretended action and the counting and canvassing of said votes, members of the board of commissioners of said county of Santa Fe. Said defendant admits that he has refused to recognize Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt as members of the board of commissioners of said Santa Fe county, for the reason that they have never been elected and qualified as such officers, and because they have not been in the possession of said offices, and have never acted as members of such board, and denies that said Staab, Garcia, and Nesbitt have ever met as such board, or held any session as such, as set forth in the alternative writ of mandamus herein, but he says that since the 1st day of January, 1891, Charles M. Creamer and Eugenio Martinez have been the legal and acting board of commissioners of said county. As to all the allegations and statements set forth in said alternative writ, not herein expressly admitted or denied, the said defendant states that he has not sufficient information upon which to form a belief, and he therefore denies all of said allegations. PEDRO DELGADO." "Pedro Delgado, being duly sworn, on his oath states that the facts set forth in the foregoing answer are true to his best knowledge, information, and belief. PEDRO DELGADO. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 15th day of January, 1891. N. B. LAUGHLIN, Notary Public."

Thereupon, on the motion of Staab, Garcia, and Nesbitt, the three alleged county commissioners before mentioned, without further hearing or proceedings, the alternative writ was made peremptory; and thereafter, on the affidavit of said William H. Nesbitt, filed January 19, 1891, the following order was entered: "It being shown to the court by the petition and affidavit of William H. Nesbitt, filed this 19th day of January, 1891, in the cause lately pending in said district court, in which Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt were relators, and Pedro Delgado was respondent, that the said defendant, Pedro Delgado, has refused, and still does refuse, to obey the peremptory writ of mandamus issued out of this court in said mandamus proceeding on the 15th day of January, 1891, it is ordered by the court that an attachment for contempt, returnable at five o'clock this afternoon, issue for the arrest of said defendant, Pedro Delgado. EDWARD P. SEEDS, Associate Justice, &c. Santa Fe, New Mexico, January 19, 1891." Thereafter, on January 20, 1891, the following final judgment was entered: "It is considered and adjudged by the court that said defendant, Pedro Delgado, is guilty of contempt of this court in refusing to obey and in disobeying the command of said writ of mandamus; and it is further adjudged by the court that said Pedro Delgado stand committed to the common jail of Santa Fe county until he purge himself of such contempt, and that a warrant of commitment issue against him. EDWARD P. SEEDS, Associate Justice, &c. Santa Fe, New Mexico, January 20, 1891." In pursuance of this judgment, a commitment issued, and Delgado was imprisoned in the county jail. To be relieved of such imprisonment, he instituted his present habeas corpus proceeding before this court.

In this connection, I cite chapter 60, Laws 1887, § 1: "That in all cases of proceedings by mandamus in any district court of this territory, the final judgment of the court thereon shall be reviewable by appeal or writ of error, in the same manner as now provided by law in other civil cases, except that such appeal or writ of error shall not operate as a supersedeas of any judgment of the district court." The judgment of the district court was the imprisonment of Delgado until he obeyed the commands of the peremptory writ; and, according to the provisions of the statute above cited, no appeal or writ of error could release him from such imprisonment, no matter how erroneous or illegal the judgment authorizing it might be, until the final determination of the appeal or writ of error in this court. The gist of all the orders contained in the alternative and peremptory writs of mandamus is that Delgado recognize Abraham Staab, Juan Garcia, and William H. Nesbitt as the only persons composing the lawful board of county commissioners of Santa Fe county. All other acts commanded are the mere incidents of this recognition. The answer of Delgado to the alternative writ showed in apt terms why he did not so recognize them. Without admitting or denying the validity of this writ, I am clearly of the opinion that Delgado's answer thereto raised a material issue of fact. The motion of the county commissioners to make the writ peremptory, notwithstanding the answer, was in the nature of a demurrer to its sufficiency; and the judgment of the court, in granting that motion, was, in effect, an order sustaining such demurrer. This, in my judgment, was substantial error, from the consequences of which Delgado cannot be relieved by appeal or writ of error. He is in jail, and has no adequate remedy against such illegal imprisonment unless it may be afforded him in this proceeding. I do not overlook the provisions of section 2013, Comp. Laws 1884. It must not be forgotten, however, that that section contains the following qualification: "But no order of commitment for any alleged contempt, or upon proceedings as for contempt to enforce the rights or remedies of any party, shall be deemed a judgment, conviction, or decree, within the meaning of this section; nor shall any attachment or other process issue upon any such order be deemed an execution, within the meaning of this section." I hold, then, if substantial error, prejudicial to the rights and liberty of the petitioner herein, appears upon the record of these proceedings, that the same are reviewable, although contained in the final judgment, declaring him in contempt. Believing, then, that such judgment was entered in violation of law, and that the relator is deprived of his liberty in consequence thereof, I hold that he is entitled to his discharge from this illegal imprisonment. The record in this case contains, in my opinion, other errors especially fatal to the legality of the petitioner's confinement, but it would answer no useful purpose to consider them in connection with this opinion. A labored citation of authorities from states each having peculiar statutes regulating the procedure of the courts, and the rights of the parties seeking relief from restraint deemed illegal, might show a great deal of legal research, but would throw little or no light upon the case under consideration. I cannot close this hastily written opinion more appropriately than by citing the language of the court of appeals in the state of New York in the historic case of People v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 539: "Jurisdiction of the person of the prisoner and of the subject-matter are not alone conclusive, but the jurisdiction of the court to render a particular judgment is a proper subject of inquiry; and while the court cannot, upon a return of the writ, go behind the judgment, and inquire into alleged error and irregularities preceding it, the question is presented, and must be determined, whether, upon the whole record, the judgment was warranted by law, and was within the jurisdiction of the court.'

OF LOSS—INTEREST.

1. Though a fire policy stipulates that in case of a failure to agree upon the amount of damage it shall be ascertained by appraisers, and that until the required proofs are produced and appraisals are permitted the loss shall not be payable, the assured, having offered proofs of loss that are rejected by the company, which does not demand an appraisal nor dispute the amount of damage as shown in the proofs, may sue for the loss without himself first offering to have the property appraised, or requesting the appointment of appraisers.

2. The retention by the company of proofs of loss containing a statement that the loss was estimated by persons selected by agreement between the agent and the assured would in no way prejudice the company's rights, whether the statement were true or false.

3. Where by its terms a policy is payable 60 days after proof of loss, the insured, who has delivered proofs of loss that are rejected by the company because they contain a clause stating that the estimate of value was made by persons agreed upon, can recover interest from the date of the delivery of the proofs.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clarke county; THOMAS J. GALBRAITH, Judge.

Bach & Buck and B. P. Carpenter, for appellant. Toole & Wallace, for respondents.

HARWOOD, J. The cause of action herein is founded upon an insurance policy, whereby appellant insured and agreed to indemnify respondents against loss which might happen by the destruction or damage of appellant's building, situate at Moreland, Gallatin county, Mont., known as the "Moreland Hotel," and certain furniture therein contained, by fire, to the extent of $1,500; the sum of $1,125 being placed upon said building, and the sum of $375 upon the said furniture. There were also in force during the same period three other policies of concurrent insurance issued by certain other companies in favor of plaintiffs upon the same property, each in the sum of $1,500, and distributed in like amounts on said building and furniture as aforesaid. While said insurance contracts were in force, all of said property, except a small portion of the furniture, was destroyed by fire. This action was brought to enforce payment of said $1,500 indemnity, and the trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiffs in said sum, with interest and costs; whereupon defendant moved for a new trial upon a statement of the case, on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that the same is against law; and also errors of law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the moving party. Said motion being overruled, the case is brought up by appeal from the order overruling the same, as well as appeal from the judgment.

The insurance policy involved provides, among other conditions, as follows: "The amount of loss or damage to be estimated according to the actual value of the property at the time of the loss, and to be paid within sixty days after the loss shall have been ascertained in accordance with and within the terms and conditions of this policy, and proof of the same, satisfactory to the said company, shall have been made by the assured, and received at the office of the company in Philadelphia. It shall be, however, optional with the company to repair, rebuild, or replace the property destroyed or damaged with other of like kind and quality, within a reasonable time, giving notice of its intention so to do within sixty days after receipt of proofs herein required; and, in case the company elects to rebuild, the assured shall, if required, furnish plans and specifications of the building herein described. The assured sustaining loss by fire under this policy shall forthwith give notice in writing of said loss to the company, and within thirty days thereafter render a particular account, by separate items, and proof thereof, signed and sworn to by the assured, setting forth: (1) A copy of the written portion of this policy, and all indorsements hereon; (2) other insurance, if any, on same property, or any portion thereof, with copies of written portions of each policy, and indorsements thereon; (3) the actual cash value of the property described at the time immediately preceding the fire; (4) the ownership of the property described, and the interest of assured in same; (5) for what purposes, and by whom, the building herein described, or containing the property herein specified, and the several parts thereof, were used at the time of the fire; (6) the date of the loss, and the amount thereof; (7) how the fire originated, as far as the assured knows or believes." The amount of sound value and of damage to the property may be determined by mutual agreement between the company and the assured; or, if they fail to agree, the same shall then, at the written request of either party, be ascertained by an appraisal of each article of personal property, or by an estimate in detail, if a building, by competent and impartial appraisers, one to be selected by each party, and the two so chosen shall first select an umpire to act with them in case of disagreement; and if the said appraisers fail to agree they shall refer their differences to such umpire; and the award of any two, in writing, under oath, shall be binding and conclusive as to the amount of such loss or damage, but shall not decide the validity of the contract, or any other question except the amount of such loss or damage. It is further provided in said policy that "the company shall have the right to take any of the articles damaged at their appraised value; and, until such proofs as above required are produced, and examinations and appraisals are permitted, the loss shall not be payable." The plaintiffs, in their complaint, set up the contract of insurance, alleged the destruction of the property by fire, and "that plaintiffs' loss thereby was $6,164 on said Moreland Hotel, and $1,851.14 on said furniture and fixtures contained in said hotel." Plaintiffs further allege that they furnished defendant notice of said loss, and that "defendant, by its adjusting agent, made a personal examination into the circumstances of said loss and fire, and made a request of plaintiffs that the value of said building be ascertained by arbitrators to be mutually chosen." That on the 10th day of September, 1887, plaintiffs and defendants did so refer the question of value of said building to arbitrators mutually agreed upon, John Ketchum and R. W. De Noille, of Helena, aforesaid, who reported and decided the value of said building at the time of said fire to be $7,179. "That on the 14th day of September, 1887, the plaintiffs furnished the defendant with proofs of said loss, and of their interest in said property, and otherwise fully performed all the conditions of said policy on their part. That on the 15th day of September, 1887, the defendant returned said proofs of loss to plaintiffs, and declined to pay said loss, assigning as the single ground therefor that said proofs were not satisfactory, for the reason that they referred to the estimate made by said arbitrators. That no demand has been made by defendant for a further or any other reference of said loss on building or furniture, since said proofs of loss were so furnished; nor has defendant requested any further proofs of loss; nor did the defendant, within sixty days after receipt of proofs, give notice of their intention to rebuild or restore any of said property." Defendant, by answer, denied the value of said building to be the sum alleged by plaintiffs, or any sum exceeding $3,250; and denied the value of said furniture to be the sum alleged by plaintiffs, or any sum exceeding $900; and said answer further put in issue all the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint except the existence of said insurance policy, the destruction of said property by fire, save a small portion of the furniture, and some other allegations not necessary to notice at this time. In addition to the specific denials of plaintiffs' allegations, defendant alleged by way of new matter of defense that the plaintiffs left at the office of defendant's agent in the city of Helena, while said agent was absent therefrom, on or about September 15, 1887, "some paper, which falsely stated that arbitrators had been agreed upon by plaintiffs and defendant;" that plaintiffs' attention was called to this fact by defendant's agent on the same day, and thereupon plaintiff asked permission to retain said paper, stating that said paper should not be regarded or treated as having been tendered to defendant, to which defendant by its agent assented. The answer further averred that plaintiffs on or about September 14, 1887, "fraudulently, and with intent to deceive and obtain an unfair advantage over defendant in the settlement of said claim, falsely represented to defendant's agent that two certain persons had been agreed upon by plaintiffs and defendant as arbitrators to determine and decide upon the value of said building and the cost of rebuilding the same, and that such arbitrators had determined and decided that the value of said building was at the time of the fire $7,179; whereas in truth and in fact, as plaintiffs well knew, such persons had never been agreed upon or selected as arbitrators, and, as plaintiffs well knew, such persons had never determined, as arbitrators or otherwise, that said building was of the value of $7,179, or that it would cost said sum, or any other particular sum, to rebuild the same." The answer further averred that defendant requested plaintiffs to furnish it with plans and specifications of said building so destroyed by fire, but that plaintiffs neglected and refused to furnish the same; and that no proofs, plans, and specifications, declarations or certificates have been furnished, and no examination or arbitration has been permitted or furnished by plaintiffs, or had, as required by the conditions of said policy of insurance. This new matter of defense was controverted by plaintiffs' replication.

The first and main point insisted upon by appellant is that this action is brought upon an alleged award by arbitrators, and that no evidence of value of the property destroyed, except to establish an award, was admissible. This point was raised by defendant in the lower court at the trial, and objection was made to the introduction of any evidence as to the value of the property or the amount of said loss, except to establish an award. This objection was overruled, and the court admitted, over the objection and exception of defendant, evidence offered by plaintiffs tending to prove the allegations of the complaint as to the value of the property destroyed and the loss sustained by plaintiffs, independent of the appraisal or award of arbitrators as alleged in the complaint. Proof was also admitted on behalf of plaintiff in respect to the alleged submission of the question of the value of said building and plaintiffs' loss by the destruction thereof to arbitrators, and the alleged award by them made. Appellant's objection and exception aforesaid is based upon the terms of the policy and the clause which provides that "until such proofs as above required are produced, and examinations and appraisals are permitted, the loss shall not be payable." Appellant's position is that, until such appraisal and award is made by arbitrators or appraisers chosen and acting as provided by the terms of the policy, the claim of plaintiffs is not matured for action, unless plaintiffs allege and prove that they demanded such arbitration or appraisal, and the failure to arbitrate was without the fault of plaintiffs. Appellant further contends that plaintiffs failed to prove the selection of arbitrators or appraisers, and the appraisal by them and award of the value of the property destroyed, in the manner provided by said policy. We think, without doubt, plaintiffs failed in this particular, for the evidence does not show a compliance with the terms of the policy as to the selection of appraisers, or a compliance with its terms by them in appraising the property, and making an award of value. For a proper understanding of the case and the application of our conclusion herein it is necessary to make a brief summary of the conduct of the parties from the time the loss occurred until the action was brought. The evidence shows that immediately after said property was destroyed by fire plaintiffs notified defendant's agent thereof by telegram. Soon after this, defendant's agent visited the place of fire, inspected and listed the furniture saved, took rough measurements of the foundation of the building, and then proceeded to Bozeman, where he was joined by Flowers, one of the plaintiffs, who brought with him the manager who was in charge of said hotel at and previous to the time of said fire. There the plaintiff Flowers, with said agent, obtained from stores certain lists and prices of furniture bought to furnish said hotel. The manager of said hotel assisted in giving said agent information of the articles in said hotel at the time of the fire. The agent says in his testimony: "We had Barrett [the manager of said hotel] take the rooms, one by one, and had him designate all articles of furniture in each room, and, by means of invoices which we had, put the prices of the articles. This list of articles here was obtained from Barrett, and the prices were obtained from the invoices, and these invoices were obtained at the stores in Bozeman where the goods were bought." Said agent of defendant also testified that while Barrett was thus giving a list of the furniture in said hotel "Flowers was occupied giving particulars of the building, and the construction of it, to Mr. Crook and a builder we had secured at Bozeman to make an estimate." After such inquiries, estimates, and lists were made at Bozeman, defendant's agent returned to Helena, and on the following day met said Flowers at Helena, and handed him a letter, in which said agent informed Flowers that he would "understand that the inquiries made do not in any respect supersede or waive any of the conditions or requirements of the policies; but they have the same force, and call for the same full compliance, as if nothing whatever had been done by us in the premises." A few days thereafter two of the assured came to the office of the said agent, and one of them delivered to the agent a paper intended as a proof of loss. Thereupon said agent called the assured's attention to some particulars in which said paper did not comply with the terms of the policy as a "proof of loss." One of the assured then asked said agent for a blank used for the purpose of making proof of loss, which was furnished. Then one of said assured commenced to fill up such blank, when said agent informed assured that it would be necessary to have a builder "make an estimate on the building;" and, in reply to an inquiry by the assured as to names of some builders who would be competent to make such an estimate, said agent named three different builders or firms of builders as "reliable builders" for the assured to apply
